SERVICE et al. v. BEDROS. (Sac. 2738.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑901—BURDEN TO SHOW ERROR.

The burden is upon appellant to show that there has been a miscarriage of justice to justify a reversal.

2. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑129—CONTRACT BY AGENTS—IRRIGATION DITCH.

Where two plaintiffs verbally agreed with defendant's predecessor and with other plaintiffs that a ditch should be constructed through defendant's land, through that of the other plaintiffs, and through that of the two plaintiffs, in order, defendant cannot interfere with the ditch on the ground that the agreement was made by defendant's predecessor with the two plaintiffs first specified, and not with the other plaintiffs; the first two plaintiffs having acted as agents for all in securing from defendant's predecessor the right to construct the ditch.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. H. Langdon, Judge.

Action by John Service and others against K. Bedros. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph M. Cross and Francis O. Hoover, both of Modesto, for appellant.

Hawkins & Hawkins, of Modesto, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. Respondents brought an action against the appellant to prevent him from interfering with a certain ditch furnishing water for irrigation of respondents' land, which ditch runs through the appellant's land. This ditch, about 10 feet wide at the bottom and 5 feet deep, had been constructed by Maze and Wren about 15 years before this action was brought, for the purpose of conducting water from lateral No. 3 of the Turlock irrigation district to a colony tract belonging to Maze and Wren, and ran through the land of the several respondents. In order to procure rights of way for said ditch, Maze and Wren entered into a verbal agreement with appellant's predecessor and with the several respondents. The respondents gave the right of way for said ditch through their property below the lands of the appellant and above the lands of Maze and Wren, and co-operated in the construction of the ditch, upon consideration of their being allowed to use the ditch for the purpose of conducting irrigating water to and upon their own lands. Maze and Wren paid Mollard, the then owner of the Bedros land, $120 for the right of way and in consideration of Mollard enlarging the ditch and extending the same about 100 feet. In pursuance of this arrangement the ditch was constructed, and for more than 15 years the water has flowed across the land of the appellant to and through and sometimes upon the lands of the various respondents.

Respondents base their claim to the ditch upon the executed oral agreement. Mollard, it should be noted, after having sold the land now owned by Bedros, title to which has vested in the latter by mesne conveyances, purchased or theretofore owned one of the pieces of property below the Bedros land irrigated from the ditch in question. Appellant contends that the agreement made by Mollard does not make the tenement owned by him a servient one, for the reason that in the agreement in question no dominant estate is pointed out, and that Bedros, at the time he purchased, had no notice or knowledge of the rights of the respondents. The portion of the record printed by the appellant in his brief is very meager. In the opening brief, while in the statement of facts appellant inserts frequent parenthetical references to the typewritten transcript, only one short excerpt of 25 lines from the testimony is printed, and this consists of quotations from the testimony of Mollard with relation to his agreement with Maze and Wren.

The quotation, taken alone, is unintelligible, as there is nothing to show the connection of Maze and Wren with the various parties to the transaction. No portion of the pleadings, findings, or judgment is printed in the opening brief, and in appellant's reply brief, after his attention had been called by respondents to the statutory requirement that parties must print in their briefs "such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court" (section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.), he contents himself, so far as the judgment roll is concerned, with the following quotation from the findings:

> "That the plaintiffs were at all times mentioned in the complaint and are now the owners of a certain irrigating ditch and the right of way therefor situated," etc.

In the reply brief appellant also prints testimony indicating that Foster had never used any water from the ditch except for watering stock; that Service never used any of the water to irrigate with; that Carter never used any water from the ditch on his land; that Mollard never used any of the water to irrigate his land east of the ditch; and that Farr never used any of the water for irrigation purposes. The typewritten transcript contains 176 pages.

[1] The burden is upon the appellant to show that there has been a miscarriage of justice, in order to justify a reversal of this case. Instead of that, it is fairly apparent that he is seeking to take advantage of the fact that the parties wrote their agreement on the ground instead of on paper.

[2] The principal contention of the appellant is that the agreement relied upon by respondents was made by the appellant's predecessors with Maze and Wren, and not with respondents. That portion of the record printed in the briefs does not make the situation clear, but an inspection of the typewritten transcript, the findings and opinion of the trial court, discloses the fact that Maze and Wren, so far as the rights of the parties to this case are concerned, were the agents of all of the parties, securing from Mollard the right to construct the ditch and to supply water to the lands below, and communicated that consent to the owners of the lands below, who, for the purpose of securing the benefits promised by Mollard, joined in the construction of the ditch and gave the right of way through their respective premises. There is nothing in the proposition advanced by appellant that the dominant estate was not sufficiently indicated by the agreement, for Mollard testified that it was his understanding that the water was to be used upon the particular parcels of land then owned by the respondents or their predecessors. These lands were identified at that time merely by the names of the owners, their contiguity to the ditch, and their location below the land of Bedros. They are, however, identified in the complaint, findings, and judgment by complete description. The court does not specifically find that Maze and Wren were the agents of the various parties for the purpose of securing the rights of way and constructing this ditch, but in finding 7 the relation of Maze and Wren to the parties to the transaction is fully set forth. This finding is not printed in the briefs, and we need not incorporate it here, but it is fully justified by the evidence. There is no merit in the point that Bedros had no notice of the rights of the respondents. Pollard v. Rebman, 162 Cal. 633, 124 Pac. 235.

We agree with the statement of the trial judge contained in his opinion set out in the typewritten transcript, as follows:

> "It would be an exceedingly technical construction of the law that would deprive Service, Foster, and others of the use of this ditch under the circumstances of this case."

While we would be justified in affirming the judgment of the trial court on the ground that, by the meager and confusing portions of the evidence and record in the briefs, appellant has failed to show any miscarriage of justice, we are satisfied from an examination of the typewritten transcript that there has been no miscarriage of justice.

The judgment is affirmed.

CHRISTERSON v. FRENCH. (L. A. 4782.)

1. Pleading 🔑199, 360(2) — Demurrer — Motion to Strike—Time for Filing—Default.

In action for damages for breach of covenant where default was entered upon defendant's failure to answer within required time, the filing of demurrer and motion to strike subsequent to entry of default and prior to entry of judgment did not affect clerk's ministerial duty to enter judgment; he having no discretion in the matter and having duty under Code Civ. Proc. § 585, subd. 1, of entering judgment immediately after default.

2. Judgment 🔑111 — Default — Effect.

A defendant against whom a default is entered is out of court and is not entitled to take any further steps in the cause affecting plaintiff's right of action.

3. Judgment 🔑18(2)—Validity of Judgment—Sufficiency of Complaint.

A judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter, irrespective of whether the complaint states a cause of action, so long as it apprises defendant of the nature of plaintiff's demand.

4. Executors and Administrators 🔑222(2) — Claims Against Estate — Vacated Judgment.

Where judgment against defendant was erroneously set aside, plaintiff was not required, upon defendant's death, to present claim to estate for allowance under Code Civ. Proc. § 1502; the action not pending at such time, and plaintiff's rights being covered by section 1505.

5. Judgment 🔑174 — Default — Erroneous Vacation—Effect.

Where default judgment was erroneously vacated and set aside, the case, as far as plaintiff's rights are concerned, stands as if judgment had never been disturbed; for, unless default is set aside in a proper proceeding, it is the court's duty to immediately render another judgment of like effect.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by J. E. Christerson against William D. French, as administrator of the estate of L. B. French, deceased. From an order setting aside a judgment entered by default against L. B. French, plaintiff appeals.

Reversed, with directions to re-enter judgment.

Frank C. Hoyt, Henry Wetherhorn, and Charles J. Kelly, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, Robert T. Linney, and Gordon L. Finley, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order setting aside a judgment entered by default against L. B. French. The plaintiff agreed to purchase, and L. B. French agreed to sell, a certain tract of land in Los Angeles county. French covenanted to pipe water to the said land for domestic and irrigating purposes. This, it was alleged, he failed to do, and upon the breach of the covenant this action was brought by the plaintiff to recover damages in the sum of $5,800, together with costs.

On July 17, 1915, L. B. French (who died on May 17, 1916) was personally served with complaint and summons. On July 28, 1915, at 10 a. m., upon the failure of the defendant to answer, and the time within which to answer having expired, the clerk of the court, upon the application of the plaintiff, entered the default of the defendant, and on August 2, 1915, entered judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. Between the entry of the default and the entry of the judgment, namely, on July 28, 1915, at about 11 a. m., the defendant served and filed in the clerk's office a demurrer and notice of motion to strike out.

On March 14, 1916, the defendant served and filed his notice of motion to vacate the default and to set aside the judgment. The court refused to vacate the default, but did set aside the judgment upon the ground that—

> "The clerk did not have any jurisdiction on the 2d day of August, 1915, to enter the said judgment because of the fact that said demurrer and said motion to strike out were on file in said action and undisposed of."

1. Respondent contends that the judgment is void because the clerk had no authority to enter it. Subdivision 1 of section 585, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

> "In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if the defendant has been personally served and no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court within the time specified in the summons, or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint, including the costs, against the defendant, or against one or more of several defendants, in the cases provided for in section four hundred and fourteen."

[1] This being an action based on contract for the recovery of damages only, the case comes clearly within the provisions of this subdivision. The respondent does not question this; but, admitting that the default was entered before his demurrer and motion to strike out were filed, he urges that the filing of the demurrer and motion to strike out raised a question of law for the court to decide, and that the clerk, therefore, had no authority to enter the judgment. This contention is without merit. In the matter of entering judgment the clerk had no discretion; but, having entered the default, he was bound under the said subdivision to enter judgment "immediately thereafter." The fact that he did not enter judgment "immediately thereafter" in no way prejudiced the rights of the plaintiff and conferred no right on the defendant, whose default had been regularly entered. Edwards v. Hellings, 103 Cal. 204, 37 Pac. 218; Beck v. Pasadena Water Co., 130 Cal. 50, 62 Pac. 219.

[3] 2. The respondent contends further that the judgment is void because the complaint fails to state a cause of action. It is well established that a judgment is not void if the court has jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter, irrespective of whether the complaint states a cause of action or not, so long as it apprises the defendant of the nature of the plaintiff's demand. Blondeau v. Snyder, 95 Cal. 521, 31 Pac. 591; Mayo v. Ah Loy, 32 Cal. 477, 91 Am. Dec. 595; In re James, 99 Cal. 374, 33 Pac. 1122, 37 Am. St. Rep. 60; Canadian, etc., Co. v. Carlita, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 672, 74 Pac. 301; Brush v. Smith, 141 Cal. 466, 75 Pac. 55; Crouch v. Miller, 169 Cal. 341, 146 Pac. 880; Gillespie v. Fender, 180 Pac. 332; Cal. Casket Co. v. McGinn, 10 Cal. App. 5, 109 Pac. 1077, 1079. We think the complaint herein sufficiently states a cause of action to inform the defendant of the nature of the claim against him and to give the court jurisdiction of the cause.

[4, 5] 3. The respondent makes a further objection that no judgment can be entered or reinstated in this case because the plaintiff's claim was not presented to the estate for allowance. It is his position that, the judgment having been set aside, the action is still pending within the meaning of section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that, as the appellant did not file his claim against the estate, no judgment can be rendered or re-entered in his favor. The appellant contends, on the other hand, that this is not an action pending at the time of the death of the decedent, but that the judgment had been rendered in the action during his lifetime, and that no claim could be presented to the estate of a person while he himself was in esse, and that this brings the case within the provisions of section 1505 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In our view, the fact that the judgment having been rendered in the lifetime of the decedent the case comes within the provisions of section 1505. The judgment was erroneously vacated and set aside, and, so far as the rights of the appellant are concerned, the case stands as if it had never been disturbed; for until the default is set aside in a proper proceeding it is "the duty of the court immediately to render another judgment of like effect." Title Ins. Co. v. King, supra.

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the court to re-enter the judgment.

WILLIAMS v. MacDONALD et al.

1. JUDGMENT ⚷562—BAR—MERITS.

A judgment to operate strictly as a bar to a subsequent action must have gone to the merits of the subsequent action.

2. JUDGMENT ⚷587 — CONCLUSIVENESS — ISSUES DECIDED—FORM OF ACTION.

Where, in an action on an express contract for dental services defended on ground that work was not done at her request or that it was of any value, court adjudged that work was done so carelessly as to be worthless, such judgment was a bar to an action for reasonable value of such services.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Frank A. Williams against Annie MacDonald and another. Judgment for defendant named, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. Hocker and Robert E. Austin, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Anderson & Anderson and T. G. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action to recover the reasonable value of dental services rendered the defendant by the plaintiff.

The complaint alleges in brief that the plaintiff is a licensed and practicing dentist, that at the request of the defendant and upon her promise to pay the reasonable value thereof, he performed certain dental work for her, that such work was of the reasonable value of $550, and that plaintiff has not been paid.

The answer of the defendant denied that the work was done at her request or that it was of any value. It also set up that the plaintiff had brought a previous action against the defendant on the same demand, and that after trial final judgment had gone against the plaintiff.

On the trial in this action the judgment roll in the former action between the parties was introduced in evidence. It showed that the plaintiff had commenced an action to recover, not the reasonable value of, but the agreed price for the same dental work, that the defendant answered, denying that any contract was made or that the work was of any value, that a trial was had, and that judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant.

Upon this showing and without evidence other than the judgment, the lower court directed judgment for the defendant in the present action. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff contends that the first action was one upon a contract for an agreed price, that the second and present one is upon a contract for the reasonable value of the work, that the two causes of action are not the same, and that the judgment against the plaintiff in the first is not a bar to the maintenance of the second. This is the plaintiff's sole contention.

[1] If the fact were that judgment went against the plaintiff in the first action on the sole ground that there was no contract for the work at an agreed price, or even if the fact were that the judgment might have gone against him on that ground alone and the judgment roll did not show the contrary, it might well be that the plaintiff's contention would be correct. A judgment in order to operate strictly as a bar to a subsequent action must have gone to the merits of the subsequent action. This is the full extent of the doctrine of such cases as Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367; South San Bernardino, etc., Co. v. San Bernardino Bank, 127 Cal. 245, 59 Pac. 699, and Heilig v. Parlin, 134 Cal. 99, 66 Pac. 186, cited on behalf of the plaintiff. If, for example, the plaintiff has mistaken his legal remedy or the proper form of action, and judgment goes against him for that reason, the judgment is no bar to a second action rightly brought.

On the other hand, if the judgment roll shows that the judgment did go to the merits of the second action, either in regard to some matter which the plaintiff must make out in order to entitle him to a recovery, or in regard to some affirmative defense, which is a defense to the second action as well as to the first, then the judgment is a bar. Toomy v. Hale, 100 Cal. 172, 34 Pac. 644; Reed v. Cross, 116 Cal. 473, 485, 48 Pac. 491; Green v. Thornton, 130 Cal. 482, 62 Pac. 750; Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66; Koehler v. Holt, etc., Co., 146 Cal. 335, 80 Pac. 73; Estate of Harrington, 147 Cal. 124, 81 Pac. 546, 109 Am. St. Rep. 118.

[2] In the present case the judgment roll in the first action shows that a defense, good as to the second action as well as to the first, was presented by the pleadings in both actions, passed upon by the court in the first, and there determined in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff. In response to a defense specially pleaded, the court found that the plaintiff's work had been done in so careless and negligent a manner as to be worthless to her. This fact, if true, was a good defense, not only to the first, but to the second action, and its truth having been established as a finality between the parties, the judgment so establishing it is a bar to the second action, or, possibly putting it more accurately, although the difference is here immaterial, is a final and conclusive defense to the second action.

Plaintiff's counsel in support of his position quotes the following from Phelan v. Quinn, 130 Cal. 374, 378, 62 Pac. 623, 624:

> "Respondent correctly states the rule that in order to constitute matter res judicata there must be certain enumerated existing identities. Mr. Freeman is cited to the effect that a judgment is conclusive only upon the issues tendered by the plaintiff's complaint. Freeman on Judgments (4th Ed.) § 249; 2 Black on Judgments, §§ 731–733; Lillis v. Emigrant Ditch Co., 95 Cal. 558 [30 Pac. 1108]; Cromwell v. County of Sacramento, 94 U. S. 353 [24 L. Ed. 195]. The test is also claimed to be: 'Would the same evidence support and establish both the present and former action?' If so, it is conceded the former recovery would be a bar; if otherwise, it does not stand in the way of the second action (citing Freeman on Judgments, § 259; 2 Black on Judgments, § 726; Taylor v. Castle, 42 Cal. 367)."

In Phelan v. Quinn the cause of action involved in the second action was very clearly the same as that involved in the first, and the court so held. The decision itself, therefore, does not immediately touch the point here. It may be worth while, however, to discuss briefly the two references to Freeman. It is said:

> "Mr. Freeman is cited to the effect that a judgment is conclusive only upon the issues tendered by the complaint."

But this is not what Mr. Freeman said. He was discussing the question as to when an issue is deemed to be concluded by a judgment, even though such issue was not actually made in the first action. His language is (section 249):

> "The general expression, often found in the reports, that a judgment is conclusive of every matter which the parties might have litigated in the action is misleading. What is really meant by this expression is that a judgment is conclusive upon the issues tendered by the plaintiff's complaint."

This language has no reference to the case of an issue tendered by the answer as distinguished from the complaint. That Mr. Freeman has no such distinction in mind is evident from his language a few sentences later when in summing up his discussion he says:

> "Neither party can decline to meet an issue tendered by the other, and then maintain that it has not become res judicata."

As to the test, "Would the same evidence support and establish both the present and the former action?" It is necessary only to point out that the issue here adjudicated was one tendered by the answer by way of defense, and not one tendered by the complaint. Such defense would be supported and established by exactly the same evidence both in the present and in the former action. The test is one which in principle is as applicable to an affirmative defense as to the issues tendered by the complaint. It was certainly very far from Mr. Freeman's intention to say that an affirmative defense once litigated and determined between the parties is not conclusive between them, and yet this is necessary if the language referred to is to be taken as supporting the plaintiff's position.

Judgment affirmed.

WERINGER v. RUTLEDGE. (L. A. 4650.)

1. TRIAL 🔑253(3)—INSTRUCTIONS—AGREED BOUNDARY LINE.

Instructions, in an ejectment suit, relative to an agreed boundary, which failed to contain the necessary element that there must be uncertainty as to the true line before coterminous owners can agree upon a boundary, held erroneous.

2. NEW TRIAL 🔑71—GROUNDS—POWER OF TRIAL COURT.

It is the duty of the trial judge to grant a new trial whenever he is not satisfied with the verdict if tried by a jury, or with the findings if tried by the court, and he is not bound by the rule of conflicting evidence.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Ejectment by Joseph Weringer against F. A. Rutledge. Judgment for defendant on a verdict, a new trial was granted, and defendant appeals. Order affirmed.

Thomas Scott, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Kaye & Siemon, Alfred Siemon, and W. W. Kaye, all of Bakersfield (Henry Harmeling, of Bakersfield, of counsel), for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action in ejectment brought by the plaintiff against the defendant in which the controversy was over a disputed boundary line. The case was tried by jury, a verdict rendered in favor of defendant, and judgment entered accordingly. Thereafter the plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was granted, and the defendant appeals.

The defendant answered plaintiff's complaint, denying the allegations thereof, and for further defense alleged that the predecessor in title of plaintiff, and the defendant, being coterminous owners, agreed upon a boundary between their adjoining lands. In his cross-complaint the defendant alleged that he and his predecessors in interest had been in the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession of the land in question for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action, and that they had paid all taxes thereon.

Mary A. Rutledge conveyed by deed to Eugenia M. Hooper, on May 30, 1893, a tract of land, being a portion of the land now in dispute, upon the southern boundary of which there was constructed by Eugenia M. Hooper a wooden building 32 feet long by 22 feet wide, wherein has been conducted ever since a general store; a portion thereof being used for many years as a United States post office. During 1893 a well was sunk to obtain water for domestic purposes, the well from that time having been in continual use. The defendant testified that in 1895 or 1896 he went into possession of the land and continued in possession until the commencement of this action. The deed conveying the land from Eugenia M. Hooper to the defendant bears date of February 7, 1898.

The plaintiff alleges that the disputed boundary line runs about 1 foot and 3 inches north of the northeast corner of the store, directly east and west, which puts the store and well upon the strip of land in controversy. The defendant alleges that the true line runs several feet south of the store, and that the disputed line was established by him and his coterminous owner approximately 38 feet from where plaintiff claims it runs, and that this was done in 1896 or 1897.

A general verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant that he was the owner in fee simple of the land in question. A special verdict was also rendered by which the jury found that the defendant had agreed upon a boundary with the predecessor in interest of plaintiff, one Joseph Julian, and that the parties fixed their boundary line at a point 38 feet south of the line between sections 3 and 34 established by the government survey.

In ordering a new trial the court did not state the grounds on which the motion was granted. However, the notice of intention to move for a new trial, and the exceptions in the bill of exceptions, show that the motion was made on the grounds of errors of law occurring at the trial and insufficiency of the evidence.

1. The plaintiff has reserved some 26 exceptions as to the admissibility of certain evidence. We have carefully examined the record touching these exceptions and find that they are without merit. No useful purpose would be served by specifically mentioning or discussing any of them.

[1] 2. Exceptions 27, 28, and 29 are addressed to instructions 1, 2, and 3. The plaintiff contends the jury was told, in effect, that a mere agreement was all that was necessary to make the transaction valid, and that the requirement of uncertainty as to the true boundary as a basis for such an agreement was omitted. It was said in Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 741, 130 Pac. 1061:

> "The doctrine of an agreed boundary line and its binding effects upon the coterminous owners rests fundamentally upon the fact that there is, or is believed by all parties to be, an uncertainty as to the location of the true line."

The instructions in question do not contain the necessary element that there must be uncertainty as to the location of the true line before the coterminous owners can agree upon a boundary. This omission rendered the instructions erroneous, and it will serve no useful purpose to touch upon the other objections to them.

3. The plaintiff claims that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. He contends that the defendant knew that the line he claims to have agreed upon with Julian was not the true one, that the true line was known to the defendant, and that the record shows there was no uncertainty in relation to the true line. The pleadings of the defendant show that the agreement fixing the boundary was based upon and made with reference to the line as established by the government survey. As to the uncertainty of the true line, the county surveyor, a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, testified:

> "Many of the monuments that were necessary to run accurate lines and make an accurate survey concerning the land in question have been obliterated or destroyed. I do not think that any one can tell within 25 or 30 feet where the dividing line really is between the lands in dispute."

[2] In Condee v. Gyger, 126 Cal. 546, 59 Pac. 26, it was said:

> "It is the duty of the judge of the trial court to grant the new trial whenever he is not satisfied with the verdict, if tried by a jury, or with the findings, if tried by the court; * * * and he is not bound by the rule as to conflicting evidence as is this court."

See, also, Churchill v. Flournoy, 127 Cal. 355, 59 Pac. 791; Byxbee v. Dewey, 128 Cal. 322, 60 Pac. 847; Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 78 Pac. 337; Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 560, 69 Pac. 294; and Shilling v. Dodge, 22 Cal. App. 517, 135 Pac. 299.

The evidence as to the boundary lines was in sharp conflict, and in the face of this conflict we may assume, in the absence of any specified ground for the order granting a new trial, that in weighing the evidence the court was not satisfied with the verdict of the jury. The order must stand. Hitchcock v. Rooney, 171 Cal. 285, 152 Pac. 913.

Order affirmed.

I concur: OLNEY, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the opinion of Justice LAWLOR and in the judgment of affirmance. But the instructions numbered 1, 2, and 3 would not be full or complete with the addition of the single statement that the parties must be uncertain as to the location of the true line at the time they agree upon a line between the lands occupied by them, respectively. The instructions lacked other elements essential to such a fixing of the boundary and to the proper information of the jury. There should be no difficulty in framing a correct and full instruction on the subject. The law has been the subject of many decisions and will be found fully stated in Schwab v. Donovan, 165 Cal. 363, 132 Pac. 447; Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 486, 119 Pac. 893; Loustalot v. McKeel, 157 Cal. 641, 108 Pac. 707; Lewis v. Ogram, 149 Cal. 508, 87 Pac. 60, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 610, 117 Am. St. Rep. 151; Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 481, 95 Pac. 888; and Grants Pass, etc., Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 459, 143 Pac. 754.

1. Gas 🔑20(2)—Explosion and Fire—Contributory Negligence—Evidence.

Evidence that the owner of a house, in the face of warnings of danger from fire, insisted on having the gas drip pipe placed in the basement instead of outside, did not compel a finding that he was guilty of negligence contributing to destruction of his house from an explosion and fire when the drip pipe was being cleaned.

2. Gas 🔑20(2)—Explosion—Presumption—Evidence.

In an action against a gas company for the destruction of a residence by fire from a gas explosion when a drip pipe in the basement was being cleaned, evidence held to justify finding that the presumption of the gas company's negligence through its employé from the happening of the accident stood unrebutted and unbalanced.

3. Evidence 🔑577 — Testimony on First Trial—Absence of Witness.

Plaintiff's absence from the state and temporary residence in another state in search of health was sufficient ground for admitting in evidence on second trial her testimony given at the first trial.

4. Evidence 🔑171, 582(1)—Secondary Evidence—Retrial—Memorandum.

Where a memorandum of personal property, whose loss was sued for, made by plaintiff, and used by her when giving testimony on the first trial of case, was incorporated in the record of her testimony on first trial, not as an independent document, but as part of her testimony, it was properly introduced on second trial despite the objection that plaintiffs were permitted to use secondary documentary evidence without showing loss or destruction of the original.

5. Evidence 🔑474(19)—Opinion—Value—Person Not Owner.

The husband of a wife, whose house and goods were destroyed by a gas explosion and fire, being qualified to testify as to the value of the goods destroyed, was a competent witness in that behalf, though he was not the owner of the goods.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Willard and the London Assurance Corporation against the Valley Gas & Fuel Company. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Waterman & Green, Denis & Loewenthal, and Jesse F. Waterman, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs in an action instituted to recover damages for the destruction of a dwelling house by a fire alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant.

The gas meter in the plaintiff Willard's house was below the level of the defendant's street mains. Water and naphthalene crystals accumulate at low points in gas mains and are collected in drip pipes which are cleaned as occasion demands. Such a pipe was installed in a basement room of the Willard home. In this room there was also a gas plate for laundry purposes and a Ruud water heater. It became necessary to clean the drip pipe. This the defendant's workman, one Mills, undertook to do. The fire in question followed an explosion which occurred while Mills was occupied with his work and alone in the basement. The house and its contents were destroyed in the ensuing conflagration. Plaintiff's damage was found and fixed by the trial court, sitting without a jury, in the sum of $13,000— $6,500 for the house and $6,500 for the personal property contained therein.

The two contentions of the appellant are: (1) That the finding of negligence is not supported by the evidence; and (2) that the finding as to the value of the personalty destroyed rests in part upon incompetent evidence and erroneous computations.

[1] Plaintiffs' case was presented and rested practically upon proof of the happening of the explosion and the presumption of negligence arising therefrom as a matter of law. In an endeavor to meet and balance this presumption, the defendant relied on the testimony of Mills and the claimed contributory negligence of the plaintiff Willard in insisting that the drip pipe should be located in the basement of the house rather than out of doors, despite the warning of the defendant that such a location of the drip pipe was fraught with danger. Responsive to the defense of contributory negligence, the defendant introduced evidence tending to show that the plaintiff Willard had been warned of the danger of fire as a result of cleansing a drip pipe so located, but had nevertheless insisted upon having the pipe placed in the basement rather than out of doors. But even so, the court was not compelled to find therefrom that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. "There was no evidence that there was any inherent danger of explosion of gas due to the placing of these appliances indoors." Willard v. Valley Gas & Fuel Co., 171 Cal. 9, 13, 151 Pac. 286, 288. And, moreover, it appears from the testimony of Mills that the entire gas supply of the house could be cut off by closing a stopcock in the service pipe thereby obviating all possible danger of fire in the course of cleaning the drip pipe. It was also made to appear in evidence that, when ordinary care was used to keep flames away from the vicinity of the drip pipe, there was so little danger of fire that the gas was often left on when the pipe was being cleaned in order that the gas pressure might assist in eliminating the naphthalene crystals. It was also shown in evidence that the drip pipe in the house in question had been cleaned on numerous occasions without accident.

[2] Coming now to a consideration of the issue, evidence, and finding of the defendant's negligence, we find from the testimony of Mills that it is fairly inferrable that he deliberately assumed the risk of leaving open the stopcock in the service pipe while cleaning the drip. He was bound, therefore, to use care commensurate with the risk assumed. Nevertheless, he opened the drip while there was a flame burning in the room, that is to say the pilot light of the Ruud heater, which stood about six feet from the drip pipe. He had no means of knowing whether the obstruction in the drip was caused by water which might speedily run out and be followed by a flow of gas, or whether it was caused by crystals through whose interstices considerable gas might, as the evidence shows, escape into the room. Surely this was not the act of a careful workman. As it turned out, there was about half a teacup of water in the drip pipe. The main obstruction, however, was caused by the naphthalene crystals. When Mills discovered this condition of the pipe, he replaced, so he testified, the plug loosely and proceeded to examine the room for flames. He turned off the pilot light in the Ruud heater, and then opened the lower doors of the heater to make sure it was out. There is some evidence to the effect that a Ruud heater gathers soot about the pilot light and around the hot water coils in which a spark might remain alight for several moments after the gas was turned off. In spite of this fact, Mills neither examined the coils nor waited for so much as a moment before proceeding to clean the drip. He immediately unplugged the pipe and began hitting it in an endeavor to jar loose the crystals. There was at once a terrific explosion from the direction of the heater and the flames therefrom started and spread the conflagration from which the damage complained of arose. Clearly, in the presence of this evidence, it cannot be fairly said that the trial court was not justified in finding that the presumption of negligence from the happening of the accident stood unrebutted and unbalanced.

The finding that the value of the personal property destroyed by the fire was the sum of $6,500 does rest in part upon an erroneous computation. The plaintiff admits that a reduction of $82.50 should be made, but the calculation upon which this admission is based shows a mistake in addition and subtraction which calls for a further and additional reduction in the sum of $87.50.

Three of the rulings of the trial court are assigned as error: (1) Receiving in evidence the testimony of the plaintiff Mrs. Willard given at a former trial; (2) permitting in evidence the reporter's transcript of the evidence taken at the former trial of the case, which embodied a memorandum made by Mrs. Willard of the articles of personal property destroyed in the house; and (3) admitting in evidence the testimony of Mr. Willard, given at a former trial, concerning values, against the objection that he was not qualified to express an opinion thereon.

[3] It was shown at the trial that Mrs. Willard was then absent from the state of California and was temporarily residing in the state of Arizona, where it appears that she had gone in search of health. Her absence from the state was a sufficient ground for admitting in evidence her testimony given at the first trial of the case. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 8; Hicks v. Lovell, 64 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. 942, 49 Am. Rep. 679; Benson v. Shotwell, 103 Cal. 163, 168, 37 Pac. 147. See, also, Meyer v. Roth, 51 Cal. 582; Butcher v. Vaca Valley R. R. Co., 56 Cal. 598.

[4] The reporter's transcript which contained the memorandum of the lost personal property made by Mrs. Willard, and which was used by her when giving her testimony at the first trial of the case, was properly received in evidence upon the trial herein. This memorandum was not used by the witness merely for the purpose of refreshing her memory. The transcript of the testimony of the witness given at the first trial shows that this memorandum was in effect stipulated to be the testimony of Mrs. Willard; that is to say, upon the first trial, it was, in effect, stipulated as a matter of convenience and for the purpose of saving time, that Mrs. Willard would testify that every item in it was true and correct, and that counsel for defendant might thereupon cross-examine her concerning the same. The memorandum was then, it appears, incorporated in the record of the testimony of the witness upon the first trial, not as an independent document, but as part and parcel of the witness' testimony. This being so, there is obviously no merit in the objection that the plaintiffs were permitted the use of secondary documentary evidence without first showing the loss or destruction of the original.

[5] No question is presented as to the admissibility of the transcript of the testimony of Mr. Willard given at the former trial, but it is insisted here, as it was specifically objected in the lower court, that his opinion as to values was permitted at the first trial solely upon the theory that he was the owner of the property, and that, inasmuch as it was conceded upon the second trial that he was not in fact the owner of the property, no foundation was laid for his opinion. Aside from all question of ownership, there is sufficient evidence in the transcript consisting of the testimony of Mr. Willard, adduced by preliminary questions, to show in effect and substance that he had an intimate and adequate knowledge of the character of the contents of the house, a knowledge gained by association with and observation of the various articles of personal property contained therein. It is evident that his opinion as to the value of these articles was based, in part at least, upon such observation and knowledge. The rule is that—

> "The knowledge of values in most cases does not depend upon professional or other skill; and witnesses, without having any special experience or training as would entitle them to be called experts, may yet have gained such a knowledge of the * * * subject under inquiry as to aid the court * * * in arriving at a conclusion. * * * Practically, the chief qualification is that the witness should have an intelligent idea of the value, founded on reliable observation, and capable of being conveyed by him in the form of an estimate and its basis to the court." 2 Jones on Evidence, Blue Book, § 363.

Measured by this rule, the objection as to the admissibility of Mr. Willard's testimony was correctly overruled.

The judgment appealed from is modified by deducting therefrom the sum of $170 erroneously included therein, and, as thus modified, the judgment will stand affirmed.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CORPORATION, Limited, v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

1. Master and Servant 🔑415—Workmen's Compensation Act — Proceedings—Hearing—Reopening Case.

A case under the Workmen's Compensation Act, heard before a referee without notice to the insurance carrier and without its being represented or given an opportunity for cross-examination, and introduction of testimony, should be reopened unless there is no possibility of changing the result.

2. Master and Servant 🔑375(1) — Workmen's Compensation Act—Injuries Arising in "Course of Employment."

An employé of a company, injured in attempting to prevent a child from being run over on its premises by an automobile driven by an officer who was there on the company's business, was injured in the "course of his employment," within the Workmen's Compensation Act.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Course of Employment.]

3. Master and Servant 🔑415—Workmen's Compensation Act — Reopening Case—Deposition—Lack of Counter Evidence.

An insurance carrier, which had received no notice of, and was not represented at, the hearing is not entitled to a reopening of the case on the ground that a deposition introduced at the hearing was inadmissible as hearsay, where it did not offer to rebut the matters contained in the deposition.

4. Master and Servant 🔑404—Workmen's Compensation Act—Proceedings—Deposition—Admissibility.

The deposition of a physician as to a servant's injuries for which compensation is sought, although hearsay, as to the employer and the insurance carrier who were not parties to the proceeding in which the deposition was taken, is admissible under Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 60, subd. a, providing that no award shall be invalidated because of admission of evidence inadmissible under common-law or statutory rules.

In Bank.

Proceedings by O. N. Nelson against the Sibley Grading & Teaming Company, employer. The Industrial Accident Commission awarded compensation, and the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, Limited, insurance carrier, petitioned for a writ of review. Writ denied.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Christopher M. Bradley, of San Fransciso, for respondent Industrial Accident Commission.

Robinson & Brown, of San Francisco, for respondent Nelson.

OLNEY, J. This is a hearing upon an order directed to the Industrial Accident Commission and the respondent Nelson, requiring them to show cause why a writ of review should not be issued annulling an order of the Commission awarding compensation to Nelson for injuries sustained by him in the employ of a corporation known as the Sibley Grading & Teaming Company. The petitioner for the writ, the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Corporation, is the insurance carrier for the Sibley Company, the employer.

The essence of the complaint of the petitioner, both as set forth in its petition, and as presented in argument at the hearing, is: First, that a referee of the commission held a hearing without notice to the petitioner, and without its being represented, at which hearing testimony directly controverting the contention of the petitioner was presented without any opportunity for cross-examination, and that the commission subsequently refused to reopen the case to permit of such cross-examination and the introduction of counter testimony; and, second, that a portion of a deposition taken in an action to which neither the petitioner nor the Sibley Company was a party was admitted in evidence before the commission.

[1] The return of the commission to the order to show cause discloses a case where in all fairness, to say the least, the hearing should not have been proceeded with by the referee in the absence of the petitioner or some one representing it. This being true, and the hearing having been nevertheless proceeded with, the commission in its turn should have reopened the matter for such cross-examination or counter testimony as the petitioner might properly desire, except upon one contingency, namely, that there was no possibility of such cross-examination or counter testimony changing the result.

In this connection, the return of the commission shows that its order refusing to reopen the case was in fact put upon the ground that upon the facts as contended for by the petitioner the result would be the same, and at the hearing counsel for the commission frankly conceded that unless this were so the award should be annulled and a further hearing had by the commission. The essential question is therefore whether or not a different result might have been arrived at had the petitioner been given an opportunity for cross-examination and counter testimony.

[2] An examination of the proceedings before the commission shows that the fact of the accident was undisputed, as was also the fact that Nelson was an employé of the Sibley Company. The contentions were: First, as to whether or not the accident occurred to Nelson in the course of his employment; and, second, as to the extent of his injuries. The evidence, other than the deposition, received at the hearing complained of, was concerned with the first question only, and it is as to this question—one as to any liability on the part of the employer—that the possible effect of cross-examination or counter testimony must be considered.

The evidence shows without dispute that Nelson when hurt was at the entrance of the barn of the Sibley Company engaged in stabling a team of the company's horses which he had been driving, and that while so engaged he was struck by an automobile accidentally backed upon him by one Sibley the president of the company. It is contended by the insurance company that the automobile was the property of Sibley personally and not of the Sibley Company; that Sibley was at the barn on his own personal business, or rather for his own pleasure, and not on the business of his company; and that Nelson was hurt in an endeavor to rescue a child which was about to be run over by the backing automobile. From these facts, for which it contends, the insurance company claims that it follows that Nelson was not hurt in the course of his employment. For the purposes of this discussion, we must take the foregoing facts as contended for by the insurance company to be true with a single exception. The claim that Sibley, the president of the Sibley Company, was not at the barn on business of the company, is not substantiated by the record and is directly contrary to his own testimony given on behalf of the insurance company. That testimony given under examination by counsel for the insurance company is as follows:

> "Q. What brought you to the city that day? A. Well, I come to the city quite often on Sundays.
> "Q. Just for pleasure? A. Partly pleasure and partly to see how things were going.
> "Q. What was the nature of this trip? Did you have any particular duty in the yard that day? A. Nothing particular, just to see how things were going along."

The testimony introduced on behalf of Nelson at the hearing later, when the insurance company was not represented, was not concerned with this phase of the case, but only with the phase as to whether or not Nelson was hurt in attempting to rescue a child, and no evidence counter to that above quoted was sought to be introduced by the insurance company. Under these circumstances, the insurance company cannot claim that the fact as to the occasion for Sibley being present at the barn is any more favorable to it than is disclosed by the testimony quoted. That testimony makes it plain that, while Sibley may have come to the city partly for his own pleasure, he was at the barn partly at least on his company's business, to see, as president, "how things were going along."

The utmost, therefore, that the insurance company can properly contend for as the facts, are that Nelson was in the employ of the Sibley Company, that he was at the latter's barn at the time of the accident stabling horses in the course of his employment, and that he was injured in an attempt to rescue a child that was in danger of being run down on the company's premises by an automobile driven by the president of the company, who was there on company business.

We have no hesitation in saying that upon these facts—and, as we have said, they are the most favorable that can be properly contended for by the insurance company—Nelson was injured in the course of his employment. To be sure, he was not employed to rescue children. But certainly it was reasonably within the course of his employment, within the scope of those things which might reasonably be expected of him as an employé, that he should attempt to prevent an accident on his employer's premises, particularly where the employer would not improbably be responsible for the accident. It is not difficult to imagine how summarily the services of an employé would be dispensed with, who, seeing that such an accident was about to happen, held back and did nothing to prevent it on the excuse that it did not come within the scope of his employment. If, in this case, Nelson, instead of being injured in an attempt to prevent a child being run over on his employer's premises by an officer of his employer there on his company's business, had been injured in an attempt to put out an incipient fire accidentally started in the barn, it is hardly possible that any question would have been made. Yet there is no real distinction between the two cases. Nelson was no more employed to put out fires than he was to rescue children. The point is that the danger which threatened, and in attempting to remove which he was hurt, was one which threatened his employer and directly concerned it, and with which Nelson was confronted in the discharge of his customary duties.

If authorities are needed in support of what seems to us so obvious, we would refer to Dragovich v. Iroquois Iron Co., 269 Ill. 478, 109 N. E. 999; Waters v. Taylor, 218 N. Y. 248, 112 N. E. 727, L. R. A. 1917A, 347; and United States, etc., Co. v. Industrial Accident Com'n, 174 Cal. 616, 163 Pac. 1013.

It follows that the petitioner was not, in fact, prejudiced by the holding of the hearing in question without the petitioner being present or represented or having an opportunity to be present or represented.

[3] There remains for consideration the matter of the admission in evidence of the deposition. It was taken, as we have said, in an action brought by Nelson to which neither the employer nor the insurance company was a party. As to them it was hearsay and not within any of the exceptions to the hearsay rule. It was the deposition of one Dr. Eaves. A portion only was admitted, and that concerned solely the extent of the injuries suffered by Nelson.

It is also the fact that it was admitted in evidence at the hearing at which the insurance company was not represented nor given an opportunity to be represented. This last fact, however, is immaterial. This would not be true if the insurance company, on learning of the deposition, had asked for permission to introduce counter evidence, and had been refused. If such a request had been made, it certainly should have been granted. But the fact is that, while the company petitioned for a reopening of the case to permit it to introduce further testimony, the testimony sought to be introduced was not in rebuttal of the deposition or at all concerned with the only point touched upon by it. This being true, the only thing which the insurance company could have done to better its situation, if it had been represented at the hearing, would have been to have made and reserved an objection to the introduction of the deposition. This it may be considered as having done. The question, therefore, is one simply as to the validity of such objection, or, in other words, as to the admissibility of the deposition.

[4] That the deposition, although hearsay as to the parties against whom it was introduced and not within any exception to the hearsay rule, was yet admissible, is settled by section 60, subdivision a, of the "Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917" (Stats. 1917, p. 831), which reads:

> "All hearings and investigations before the commission or any member thereof, or any referee appointed thereby, shall be governed by this act and by the rules of practice and procedure adopted by the commission, and in the conduct thereof neither the commission nor any member thereof, nor any referee appointed thereby, shall be bound by the common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure, but may make inquiry in such manner, through oral testimony and written and printed records, as is best calculated to ascertain the substantial rights of the parties and carry out justly the spirit and provisions of this act. No informality in any proceeding or in the manner of taking testimony shall invalidate any order, decision, award, rule or regulation made, approved or confirmed by the commission; nor shall any order, award, rule or regulation be invalidated because of the admission into the record, and use as proof of any fact in dispute, of any evidence not admissible under the said common law or statutory rules of evidence and procedure."

It follows that the writ should not issue on either of the grounds advanced, and it is therefore denied.

BAILLARGEON v. MYERS. (L. A. 4762.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1002—Review—Conflicting Evidence—Jury's Finding.

Where the evidence is conflicting, jury's finding is binding on appeal.

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑705(4)—Use of Streets — Violation of Ordinance—Negligence Per Se.

Where defendant was driving an automobile on the wrong side of a street in violation of an ordinance, he is guilty of negligence per se, and if injury to another proximately results from such negligence defendant is liable if plaintiff was not negligent.

3. Negligence 🔑56(1) — "Proximate Cause."

The "proximate cause" of an injury is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, and without which the result would not have occurred, and which is the efficient cause, the one that necessarily sets the other cause in operation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proximate Cause.]

4. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(5)—Collision in Street—Proximate Cause—Evidence.

In an action for injuries received in collision between plaintiff's bicycle and defendant's automobile, jury's finding that the driving of the automobile on the left-hand side of the street, in violation of a city ordinance, was the proximate cause of the injury, held warranted by the evidence.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(5)—Negligent Driving of Automobile—Contributory Negligence—Evidence.

In action for injuries received by a newsboy on bicycle in colliding with defendant's automobile, which was driven on the wrong side of the street, jury's finding that plaintiff was not negligent held supported by the evidence.

6. Trial 🔑295(6)—Instructions—Misleading Jury—Charge as a Whole.

Objection to an instruction that under it the jury could find for plaintiff if they found defendant's chauffeur was negligent in any particular regardless of the pleadings, held not warranted, in view of the entire charge.

7. TRIAL 🔑244(4) — INSTRUCTIONS — UNDUE PROMINENCE TO DUTY OF DEFENDANT.

An instruction interpreting an ordinance as applied to the operation of automobiles held not erroneous as singling out the defendant as owing a special duty to plaintiff, and thus ignoring the equal rights of the parties in this respect.

8. TRIAL 🔑234(3) — INSTRUCTIONS—INVADING PROVINCE OF JURY.

Objection to an instruction that it invaded the province of the jury, in that it, in effect, directed a verdict for plaintiff, held without merit, in view of the introductory words, "If you believe from the evidence," in all the instructions given.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1064(4)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTION—USE OF TERM "TESTIMONY."

In an action for injuries received in a collision between plaintiff's bicycle and defendant's automobile, where the bicycle had been admitted in evidence, an instruction which used the term "testimony," instead of "evidence," was not prejudicial error, though the term "evidence" should have been used.

10. TRIAL 🔑260(1)—INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

Refusal to give instructions covered by instructions which were given is not error.

11. TRIAL 🔑62(2)—TESTIMONY IN REBUTTAL —PROPRIETY.

In action for injuries received in collision with defendant's automobile, admission of testimony in rebuttal by a witness for plaintiff, as to the number and position of vehicles on the street when the accident occurred, was not error, where defendant in presenting his case went into the subject of the number of vehicles, and his chauffeur testified as to the position of the machines on the street.

12. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1047(4) — HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

In action for injuries received in collision with defendant's automobile, admission of testimony in rebuttal by witness for defendant as to the number and position of vehicles on the street when the accident occurred, if error, was harmless; defendant in presenting his case having gone into the subject of the number of vehicles, and the chauffeur having testified as to their position.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by David Baillargeon, a minor, by Marietta Baillargeon, his guardian ad litem, against J. H. Myers. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry A. Hollzer and W. W. Butler, both of Los Angeles, and F. P. Deering, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Isidore B. Dockweiler and Dockweiler & Mott, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment entered against him in favor of the plaintiff, a minor, in an action to recover damages for personal injuries received in a collision which occurred between an automobile owned by the defendant and a bicycle on which the plaintiff was riding.

The accident occurred on June 26, 1911, in the city of Los Angeles, at the intersection of Clay and West Fourth streets. Plaintiff had ridden down on the right-hand side of Clay street, which runs north and south at a grade of about 14 per cent. and has its southern terminus at West Fourth street. He had made the turn into West Fourth street and was proceeding east when he collided with defendant's machine, being struck by the left front fender with such force as to be thrown to the ground and so injure his left leg as to necessitate its amputation just below the knee.

The automobile, a Winton Six, driven by defendant's colored chauffeur, was coming up West Fourth street, which at this point has a grade of 10 per cent. going west on the south side of the street, or on the left-hand side for a vehicle moving in that direction; making a speed of about eight or ten miles an hour. At the moment of the collision, the machine had reached what would be the east line of Clay street, if extended across West Fourth street, and was anywhere from six to fifteen feet from the south curb of West Fourth street.

The plaintiff seeks to recover on the alleged negligence of the defendant, in that at the time of the accident the automobile was so negligently managed, directed, and propelled that it was driven with great force against and over the plaintiff, and that he was driving his automobile on the left-hand side of the street in violation of a certain ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, which makes it a misdemeanor to drive a vehicle other than upon the right-hand side of the street, and as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible.

The defendant in his answer denied that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by the negligence of the defendant in violating the city ordinance, or other negligence, and alleged that the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were caused by his own fault, carelessness, and negligence and failure to exercise ordinary care in the operation of the bicycle.

The case was tried by a jury and a verdict of $5,750 awarded the plaintiff. Judgment was entered accordingly, and from this judgment the defendant appeals. An appeal was taken from a judgment of nonsuit in a former trial of this action. Baillargeon v. Myers, 27 Cal. App. 187, 149 Pac. 378.

[1] 1. The first point relied upon by the appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The plaintiff relied for recovery on the alleged violation of sections 2 and 3 of Ordinance No. 21552, new series, which read as follows:

> "Sec. 2. Every person riding, driving, propelling or in charge of any vehicle in or upon any street within the city of Los Angeles shall ride, drive or propel such vehicle upon such street in a careful manner and with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians and all other vehicles upon said street.
> "Sec. 3. Every person riding, driving, propelling or in charge of any vehicle, upon meeting any other vehicle at any place upon any street within the city of Los Angeles, shall turn to the right and on all occasions travel on the right hand side of such street, and as near the right hand curb thereof as possible."

With the exception of the chauffeur, the witnesses on both sides agreed that at the time of the accident the automobile was on the left-hand side of the street, their testimony varying only as to the distance of the machine from the south curb; none of those witnesses, however, estimating it at more than 15 feet. The chauffeur testified:

> "At that time there were autos parked on both sides of West Fourth street. Some of them were backed up with their backs against the curb, and some were run in with their fronts to the curb. That was the condition on West Fourth street clear up to Clay. I drove as close as I could to the autos parked along the right-hand side of the street. * * * Just before coming to the intersection of Clay and West Fourth streets, I was traveling about the center of the street."

[2] The appellant contends that, even if it be found that his automobile was on the left-hand side of the street in violation of the city ordinance, such violation was excusable because the condition of the traffic was such that it was impossible to drive the machine on the right-hand side. On this point the testimony of the chauffeur stands alone. Taking the most extreme view of the situation, and granting that the right-hand curb was solidly parked with automobiles and other vehicles, and that they were run in or backed in at right angles to the curb, and further that the machines were all the length of the one owned by the defendant, 14 feet, still there would have been room for the defendant's chauffeur to have driven his machine on the right-hand side of the street. For the street is 40 feet wide and the width of the automobile was 5 feet. In view of the conflict in the evidence in this behalf, we must assume in favor of the judgment that the jury found that at the time of the collision the ordinance was being violated by the chauffeur, and that the condition of the traffic was not such as to excuse such violation. This being so, the defendant was guilty of negligence per se, and is liable for the injury to the plaintiff, if such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury, and if the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence. Fresno T. Co. v. Atchison, etc., Ry. Co., 175 Cal. 358, 165 Pac. 1013; Simoneau v. Pacific Elec. Ry. Co., 166 Cal. 264, 136 Pac. 544, 49 L. R. A. (N. S.) 737; Siemers v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418; Stein v. United R. R., 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Fenn v. Clark, 11 Cal. App. 79, 103 Pac. 944; Scragg v. Salle, 24 Cal. App. 133, 140 Pac. 706; Connell v. Harris, 23 Cal. App. 537, 138 Pac. 949.

> "You are instructed that the 'proximate cause' of an injury is that cause which in natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any efficient intervening cause, produces the injury, and without which the result would not have occurred; it is the efficient cause, the one that necessarily sets the other cause in operation."

The plaintiff had come down on the right-hand side of Clay street, had made the turn into West Fourth street, and was proceeding east along this street on the right-hand side within a few feet of the south curb when he collided with the defendant's machine.

[4] The jury was warranted in finding that the presence of the automobile on the left-hand side of the street, under the circumstances detailed in the evidence, was the proximate cause of the injury, for the reason that if the machine had been on the right-hand side of the street, where it belonged, the accident could not have happened; in other words, the connection between the violation of the ordinance and the accident was "unbroken by any efficient intervening cause." The question of proximtae cause, however, is not to be confused with the defense of contributory negligence.

[5] Appellant's contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is based upon the evidence in regard to the manner in which the plaintiff rode his bicycle down Clay street to the intersection of West Fourth street. It appears that the plaintiff was a newsboy, and that on the day of the accident he was taking over a new route. Ferdinand Fisher, a boy 15 years of age, who had the route up to this time, was breaking him in. As the two boys were coasting down the Clay street hill into West Fourth street, delivering their papers on the way, having started from the top at a speed of 5 miles an hour, Ferdinand noticed, as he stood by his bicycle after delivering a paper, that the plaintiff's bicycle was gaining speed; that, as he testified, the plaintiff "was going very fast" when he approached within 20 or 30 feet of the north line of West Fourth street. He testified further that he saw the plaintiff try his brake and that it did not work; whereupon he called to him to jump off, that he repeated the call, but the plaintiff answered, "I can't."

In his own behalf the plaintiff testified that he was traveling at about 10 or 15 miles an hour when he entered West Fourth street; that he had completed the turn and was proceeding east along West Fourth street within a few feet of the south curb when he collided with the defendant's machine; and that he thought he was going at about 10 miles an hour at that time. He admitted that Ferdinand had called to him to jump off while he was still on the Clay street hill, and also admitted that he had answered, "I can't," because, as he said, he was going too fast and that he was afraid. He testified further that he did not see the defendant's automobile until he had made the turn and was starting east along West Fourth street. He stated that he did not remember whether he at any time attempted to apply his brake.

The defendant's chauffeur testified that he did not see the plaintiff until he came into West Fourth street, that the boy "was riding very fast," and that he stopped his machine instantly and was standing still when the plaintiff ran into him. There was counter testimony tending to show that the machine was in motion at the time of the collision, and that it was not stopped until it passed over the body of the plaintiff.

The court instructed the jury on the subject of contributory negligence, which we will hereinafter discuss in detail. We have reviewed the evidence on this point as the most effective way of showing that it presented a substantial conflict, and that this court is bound by the implied finding of the jury that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

We think there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict: First, that the defendant was guilty of negligence per se; second, that the violation of the ordinance was the proximate cause of the injury; and, third, that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence.

2. The appellant claims that the court erred in giving certain instructions, and in refusing to give others. In our discussion the instructions given will be numbered in Roman numerals and those refused in Arabic. Of those given he cites numbers I, VI, VII, and XI as being erroneous.

[6] The point to the criticism of instruction I is that—

> "The jury were allowed to wander over the entire field of negligent conduct irrespective as to whether or not any issue was presented thereon by the pleadings."

Or, stated in other words, that the instruction authorized the jury to find a verdict in favor of the plaintiff if they concluded that the chauffeur "was negligent in any particular whatsoever, and even though nothing had been charged in that respect by the pleadings." We perceive no ground for this objection, and it would be idle to assume that the jury did not understand from the tenor of the entire charge that any verdict rendered must be based on the issues raised by the pleadings.

[7] Instruction VI is alleged to be misleading, in that, in defining the duty of persons in the operation of automobiles within the meaning of the ordinance, the court singled out the defendant as owing a special duty to the plaintiff, thus ignoring the elementary rule of law that the rights and obligations of the parties were in this respect equal and reciprocal. The court in that particular instruction interpreted the ordinance as applied to the operation of automobiles, so that the jury might be advised of the duty the defendant owed to the plaintiff in applying the law to the evidence. We cannot see that the instruction is susceptible of the construction sought to be put upon it.

[8] The objection to instruction VII is to the same effect, and, in addition, it is claimed that the court allowed the jury to decide without proof that the chauffeur failed to drive the automobile in a careful manner, and that the court assumed as proved that the chauffeur drove the machine along the left-hand side of the street, thereby invading the province of the jury, and in effect directing a verdict for the plaintiff. The objection is without merit. In this, as in all other instructions given, which referred to the evidence, the court was careful to use the introductory formula, "if you believe from the evidence," and to in no manner usurp the prerogative of the jury.

[9] It is urged that the use of the term "testimony," instead of "evidence," in instruction XI, was erroneous and had the effect of excluding from the consideration of the jury the bicycle which had been formally admitted into evidence. It is true that the term "evidence" should have been used, but we do not think that the failure to do so had the effect claimed by the appellant, or that it was prejudicial. To hold otherwise is to impute to the jury a wider knowledge of the niceties of legal terminology than should be reasonably expected. In Mann v. Higgins, 83 Cal. 66, 23 Pac. 206, referring to the use of the word "testimony," where "evidence" was meant, the court said:

> "In common language, and sometimes even among lawyers, the two words are frequently used synonymously; and it is entirely improbable that the jury was misled in the premises."

[10] It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to give eighteen requested instructions which were proposed by the appellant. No. 1 reads: "You are instructed to find a verdict for the defendant." Under the state of the record, such an instruction could not properly have been given. Nos. 2 and 3 deal with the burden and measure of proof. These subjects were fully dealt with in instruction I. The subject of proximate cause, embodied in Nos. 4 and 5, was also included in instruction I.

Appellant contends that Nos. 6, 7, and 8 should have been given in response to "one of the theories of the defense, namely, that this accident belonged to the category of inevitable casualty." The instructions read as follows:

> "6. The mere happening of this accident does not raise any presumption that the plaintiff was injured through any alleged negligence of the defendant's chauffeur. That fact must have been proved by a preponderance of the evidence. You cannot find a verdict for the plaintiff unless you are first satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant's chauffeur failed to exercise reasonable care to avoid colliding with the plaintiff's bicycle. If you believe that such collision was unavoidable, it will be your duty to return a verdict for the defendant.
> "7. If you believe that the accident was unavoidable, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and you should return a verdict for the defendant.
> "8. If the defendant's chauffeur used every reasonable precaution to avoid the collision, then the plaintiff cannot recover, and you should return a verdict for the defendant."

The substance of the first three sentences of No. 6 was embodied in instruction I, except that it was made to apply to both parties instead of to the defendant alone. It is proper to mention that the evidence offered by the plaintiff in proof of negligence on the part of the defendant was confined to the violation of the ordinance. The defense was threefold—that the ordinance was not violated by the chauffeur, that if it was the violation was excusable because of the state of the traffic at the time, and that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. Paragraph III of the complaint, without alluding to the ordinance, did allege that the chauffeur while in the performance of his duty as such and acting within the scope of his employment, so negligently managed, directed, and propelled the automobile, by driving it on the left-hand side of the street, that it was driven with great force and violence over the plaintiff. It is alleged in paragraph IV that by reason of the violation of the ordinance the defendant did so negligently drive, direct, and propel the automobile that it collided with and ran into and over the body of the plaintiff. The record shows that no evidence was offered in support of paragraph III, and this is confirmed by the statement in the brief of the appellant that—

> "No attempt was made, much less any proof offered, to establish any other allegation of the complaint, pertaining to the question of liability."

The court gave the following instruction proposed by the defendant and modified by the addition of the portion which we have placed in parenthesis:

> "While as a general rule, the operator of a vehicle is required to drive along the right-hand side of the highway, yet there may be circumstances under which it is legally proper to drive on the left-hand side. The fact that the right-hand side of the street may be obstructed does not require one seeking to drive thereon to abandon such street, but on the contrary, it is legally permissible for such person to use the left-hand side of the highway where it is obstructed on the right-hand side, and no negligence could be predicated upon such use (providing in so doing he exercises the care that an ordinarily prudent person in the same situation would use)."

From these facts we think it must have been the view of the trial court that the evidence relating to the subject of an unavoidable accident had reference only to the position of the machine at the time of the collision, and not to the manner in which it was operated. If this be true, the law on the subject of unavoidable accident was sufficiently stated in the instruction just quoted. Assuming, therefore, that instructions 6, 7, and 8 were properly proposed on the subject of unavoidable accident, the failure to give them, when considered in the light of the one that was given, could not have caused any prejudice to the rights of the defendant. The latter instruction stated that under certain circumstances it would be legally permissible to use the left-hand side of the highway when it is obstructed on the right-hand side. According to the testimony of the chauffeur, the machine was near the center of the street at the time of the collision and could not be driven on the right-hand side without colliding with the automobiles which were on that side. Hence, if this version were accepted, the jury, under the instructions, would have been required to find that the accident was unavoidable and render a verdict for the defendant. The proposed instructions could have accomplished no more than this. We think, moreover, that the proposition of law was inadequately stated in the proposed instructions 6, 7, and 8.

Claim of error is predicated on the refusal of the court to give instructions 9 to 16, inclusive, as proposed by the defendant. These instructions are rather prolix, and hence we will not set them out here in full. In substance they are as follows:

9. Even though you believe that the defendant's chauffeur may have been negligent proximately causing the injury complained of, still if you further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff himself was guilty of any negligence, even in the slightest degree, which directly or indirectly, caused or contributed to the injury complained of, then your verdict must be for the defendant.

10. The law will not excuse a person in failing to make such use of his faculties as will enable him to discover plain and obvious dangers, and if the plaintiff in this case could, with the exercise of reasonable care, have discovered the danger and could have avoided it, he cannot recover.

11. If the plaintiff was riding a bicycle down Clay street hill at such a rate of speed that he was unable to stop it in time to avoid colliding with another vehicle, and that in so acting he was guilty of negligence proximately contributing even in the slightest degree to the injury, then he cannot recover and you must return a verdict for the defendant.

12. If the plaintiff should have known that it was dangerous to ride a bicycle down hill on Clay street into West Fourth street in the manner in which he did, and that such conduct on his part was a failure to exercise the care and prudence which a person of his age and experience would ordinarily exercise, and that such failure proximately contributed in any degree to his injury, then he cannot recover.

13. If at the time of the accident the plaintiff was riding his bicycle down hill on Clay street at such a rate of speed that he was unable to control it, and that he failed to give such attention to his surroundings, including the section of the city in which he was and the condition of the traffic, to avoid danger as may be reasonably expected from a person of his age and experience, he was guilty of negligence, and if such negligence contributed in any degree, however slight, to his injury, then you must return a verdict for the defendant.

14. The fact that the plaintiff is a minor does not raise any presumption that he was free from contributory negligence. (Then follows a statement of the degree of care required of a minor).

15. The plaintiff must be presumed to have all the qualities ordinarily belonging to a person of his age. Therefore, if you believe that the plaintiff failed to give such attention to his surroundings as may be reasonably expected from the average boy of his age, experience and capacity, then he was guilty of negligence, and if such negligence contributed in any degree, however slight, to the accident, then he cannot recover.

16. The minority of the plaintiff does not raise a presumption that he did not have the capacity to understand the danger of coasting down hill on Clay street at a time of the day when vehicles were likely to be traveling along the street, and contributory negligence, on his part, if any, however slight, which proximately contributed toward causing the accident, is a good defense to this action and would necessitate a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Instructions I, VII, VIII, and IX on this subject were given by the court of its own motion, and III and V at the request of the defendant. They read as follows:

"I. By this action the plaintiff seeks to recover compensatory damages for injuries which the plaintiff alleges he sustained as a direct or proximate result of negligence on the part of the defendant. The burden is on the plaintiff to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant through his chauffeur was negligent at the time and place in the controversy, and likewise to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that such negligence was a proximate cause of the collision and of the injury to the plaintiff. Unless he make such proof in both of these particulars, he is not entitled to your verdict. If he has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was negligent and that such negligence was a proximate cause of the collision and of injury to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict unless it shall also have been established by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff was himself guilty of negligence which contributed directly or proximately in some manner or degree to the collision and to the injury.

"The happening of the accident raises no presumption either of negligence on the part of the defendant or of negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Each of these must be proven and proven by a preponderance of the evidence. As I have said, the burden of proving negligence on the part of the defendant rests on the plaintiff. On the other hand, the burden of proving contributory negligence of the plaintiff rests upon the defendant. If upon either issue the proof is equally balanced, then the party having the burden of making proof by a preponderance of the evidence has not sustained the burden that the law imposes upon him."

"VII. * * * And if you further believe from the evidence that a violation of said ordinance was the proximate cause of said accident and plaintiff's injuries, and that plaintiff was not guilty of any negligence on his part that contributed to said accident or to his said injuries, then it becomes your duty to return a verdict in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant. If the plaintiff was guilty of negligence that contributed proximately to the collision, then plaintiff cannot recover.

"VIII. If you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff at the time of the collision in question was upon the south side of West Fourth street in the city of Los Angeles, proceeding in an easterly direction thereon and that the said collision between defendant's automobile and the plaintiff occurred upon the south side of the said street when defendant's automobile was proceeding in a westerly direction on said street and upon and along the south side thereof, then you are instructed that the plaintiff was upon the side of the street where he was entitled to be when proceeding in an easterly direction upon and along said street.

"IX. You cannot find in this case that the plaintiff was guilty of fault, carelessness, or negligence that contributed to or caused his injuries, unless you believe from the evidence that he did something which an ordinarily careful and prudent person of the same age and experience, acting under the same or similar circumstances, would not have done, or that he failed to do something which an ordinarily careful and prudent person of his age and experience would have done under those circumstances."

"III. The plaintiff must be presumed to have had such discretion and to have taken such notice of patent and obvious dangers at the time of the accident complained of as would be reasonably expected of a person of his age and experience; therefore, if you believe that he was injured partially through a failure on his part to take such care of himself as a person of his age and experience would ordinarily exercise, then you must return a verdict in favor of the defendant."

"V. If you find from the evidence that the accident would not have happened if the plaintiff had exercised such care for his own safety as may fairly be expected from the average person of his age and capacity, then you are instructed to return a verdict in favor of defendant."

We have thus elaborately stated the tenor of the requested instructions and quoted the instructions that were given on the subject, in order that any difference between them may readily appear. This difference is apparent that the refused instructions called attention in detail to the specific acts or omissions which would constitute negligence upon the part of plaintiff. Appellant based his defense of contributory negligence upon the ground that, taking into account the speed of the bicycle and the manner of its operation, the section of the city in which the accident occurred, the state of the traffic in that vicinity at the time, and the other surrounding circumstances, the plaintiff, by reason of a want of ordinary care for one of his years, brought the injury upon himself. The evidence before us on this subject was addressed to these various aspects. We must conclude therefore that, when the jury was instructed as shown, they must have had actively in mind every aspect of the issue. Clearly, the instructions given to the jury sufficiently stated the law, so as to enable them to determine from the evidence whether the plaintiff, notwithstanding the fact that the chauffeur was guilty of negligence per se, could have, with the exercise of reasonable care, avoided the accident. This is all the defendant was entitled to. By varying the phraseology, by repeating, by segregating the items of evidence into separate charges, the rejected instructions were prolix and to some extent involved and went more into detail than was necessary. The questions of fact were not intricate, and hence a general statement of the law pertinent to the issue was all that was required.

[11, 12] 3. Appellant contends that the court erred in permitting Frank Pierce, a witness produced by the plaintiff in chief, to testify in rebuttal as to the number of vehicles on West Fourth street at the time the accident occurred. The witness did testify on the point as follows:

"Q. How many autos, if any, do you recollect, were on the north side of West Fourth street between Hill street and Clay just before the collision?

"Counsel for the defendant: I object to that as not rebuttal.

"The Court: Answer the question.

"A. There was one wagon on the north side of the street having a horse attached. It was lengthways against the curb a few feet from Clay street. I don't believe, as I remember, there was any other. There might have been, but I don't remember it."

But he also gave testimony in rebuttal as to the position of the vehicles on the street:

"Q. Are you certain that there was not a large number of machines on the north side of the street, backed up against the curb?

"A. No, they didn't back up against the curb themselves. They ran parallel with the curb."

The examination continued as to the number and position of the machines.

The following testimony was given by the plaintiff on his direct examination:

"There was an automobile standing still near the south curb of West Fourth street about here (witness indicating by square and figure 1). There was another automobile going westerly on West Fourth street which collided with me as I was completing making the turn on West Fourth street going easterly and toward Hill street."

This is all the testimony on this subject given on the direct examination of the plaintiff. On cross-examination he admitted that on the former trial he had testified "that there was quite a number of machines all along on the south side of West Fourth street," and that he had testified also on cross-examination at the former trial "that there was quite a few on the north side of Fourth street between Clay and Hill."

The defendant in the presentation of his case went into the subject of the number of vehicles that were on the street at the time of the accident in support of his claim that, even if the chauffeur was on the left-hand side of the street, his action was excusable. In addition, and for the same purpose, the chauffeur testified as to the position of the machines with reference to the curb. whether parallel to it or at right angles with it. The latter was an entirely new inquiry, and the testimony of Frank Pierce in rebuttal on this subject, concerning which no evidence was given before the plaintiff rested, was therefore competent. And while it is true that the subject of the number of machines was made a part of the plaintiff's case in chief, and that Pierce's testimony on the point in rebuttal may have exceeded the proper limits of preliminary inquiry as to their position, yet we are not prepared to hold that this testimony, even if erroneously admitted, prejudicially affected the rights of the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: OLNEY, J.

SHAW, J. (concurring). Instruction I, given by the court of its own motion, directed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict "if he has proven by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant was negligent and that such negligence was a proximate cause of the collision and of the injury to the plaintiff," unless it was also established by a preponderance of the evidence that the plaintiff's own negligence contributed proximately to the injury. The instruction did not in any respect limit the negligence which it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove, to that which was alleged in the complaint. If this had been the only instruction given on the subject, I think it would be true, as claimed by the defendant, that it authorized the jury to find for the plaintiff if they concluded the defendant was negligent in any particular whatever, although the negligence was not charged in the complaint. The failure thus to limit the field of inquiry is emphasized somewhat by the refusal of the court to give instructions 3 and 5, asked by the defendant, which confined the negligence to be considered by the jury to that which was alleged in the complaint. But I do not believe the defect in the instructions could have prejudiced the defendant in any way. There was no attempt to prove any negligence other than that which was alleged, and none other was discussed throughout the case. The instructions given directed the attention of the jury specifically to the particular acts of negligence charged in the complaint. It cannot be supposed that the jury would find a verdict for the plaintiff because they imagined the defendant may have been negligent in a manner not disclosed at the trial.

In other particulars I concur in the opinion of Justice LAWLOR.

1. Negligence 🔑83—Last Clear Chance.

The doctrine of last clear chance does not apply where the injured person was never in danger from, and not touched by, the instrumentality over which the individual charged with negligence had control.

2. Street Railroads 🔑93(4)—Injuries on Tracks—Duty of Motorman.

A motorman discovering a pedestrian's peril on the tracks is bound to use only the degree of care which a reasonably prudent and skillful motorman would have used under all of the circumstances with which he was suddenly confronted, and which were visible to him only from the platform of his car, and he is not negligent because he did not make the best choice.

3. Street Railroads 🔑114(7)—Injuries on Track—Negligence of Motorman—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action against a street railway for death of a pedestrian caught between east and west bound cars, so that she stepped back from the west-bound car, which had been stopped by its motorman, and was struck by the east-bound car, evidence held not to warrant finding that the motorman of the west-bound car was guilty of negligence in stopping his car across decedent's path.

4. Street Railroads 🔑114(7)—Injuries on Track—Negligence of Motorman—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action against a street railway for death of a pedestrian caught between east-bound and west-bound cars, finding that the motorman of the east-bound car was negligent in not stopping his car sooner held supported by evidence.

5. Evidence 🔑140—Similar Facts.

The action of the trial court over objection in discussing with plaintiff's counsel, and in ultimately receiving and reviewing, evidence adduced in another case tried before the same court relative to the distances within which cars of a company other than defendant street railway could be stopped, was error.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1054(3)—Harmless Error—Evidence.

In an action against a street railway for a death on its tracks, error in receiving evidence adduced in another case tried before the same court, relative to the distances within which cars of another company could be stopped, held not cured by the court's certificate that its decision was based on other and competent evidence.

7. Witnesses 🔑372(1) — Cross-Examination of Own Witness—Bias.

Despite Code Civ. Proc. § 2049, in an action for personal injuries, plaintiff's counsel did not have the right to cross-examine his own witness merely for the purpose of showing bias.

8. Witnesses 🔑391—Impeachment—Inconsistent Statements.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2052, an impeaching question involving claimed inconsistent statements, and which in the first instance had been put to the witness sought to be impeached, should be propounded precisely or in substance to the impeaching witness, and a categorical answer, as to whether such statement was made, asked for.

Jones & Evans and Mattison B. Jones, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in the sum of $750, entered in favor of the plaintiffs, who sued as the children and sole heirs of Mrs. Adelia Ackerson, to recover damages for her death, which was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in the operation of two street cars on East Seventh street in the city of Los Angeles. The action was tried by the court without a jury.

The undisputed facts are these: Mrs. Ackerson started to cross from the south to the north side of East Seventh street at a point between San Julian and Wall streets at about 6 o'clock on the evening of January 15, 1915. The defendant was operating a street car line with a double track on this street. At the time in question cars were approaching from opposite directions along these tracks at a reasonable rate of speed. No other vehicles were present. It was after nightfall, but the street was artificially lighted, and the headlights and interior lights of both cars were burning brightly. The deceased, although she was 66 years of age, was an active woman, in full possession of her faculties save for being a little hard of hearing. Both motormen saw her and sounded their bells vigorously. Nevertheless the deceased did not hesitate in her course across the street. She looked neither up nor down the street. When the motorman on the west-bound car realized that she was evidently bent upon going upon and across the tracks, he brought his car to a stop so that the rear portion thereof stood across the path which the deceased was pursuing. Meanwhile, when the deceased was within two or three feet of the south rail of the east-bound track, the motorman on the east-bound car cut off his current and put on his air brakes. The deceased entered upon the east-bound tracks, and, seeing the west-bound car in her path, hesitated and stopped, and as she did so was struck by the east-bound car, sustaining injuries from which she died.

The trial court found that the deceased, under all of the circumstances, was guilty of negligence in entering upon the east-bound tracks. It is not disputed that this finding is supported by the evidence. Nor is it disputed that, up to the time when the deceased came within two or three feet of the south rail of the east-bound track, both motormen were justified in believing that she would avoid danger by exercise of due care. Nor can the finding be disputed that the deceased was not guilty of negligence in hesitating and stopping when she discovered the west-bound car in front of her. The undisputed situation, therefore, at the time it became evident that the deceased was going to attempt to cross the tracks, was this: (1) She had negligently placed herself in a place of danger from which it was apparent that she could not or would not extricate herself; and (2) this fact was realized by both motormen. Inasmuch as the deceased was, admittedly, guilty of no further negligence contributing to her injury and death, the doctrine of "last clear chance" comes into play, and must cover and control the determination of the only question involved in the claimed insufficiency of the evidence to support the court's findings of negligence. That question is this: Were the motormen, or either of them, guilty, after the time referred to, of a failure to use due care to avoid the accident? Responding to this question, the trial court found as a fact that both motormen were guilty of negligence after the discovery of the predicament of the deceased, and apparently rested its judgment for the plaintiffs upon this finding.

We will first consider and discuss the question of the negligence charged against the motorman on the west-bound car. Upon this phase of the case the finding of the trial court was:

> "That the defendant, through its motorman in charge of its west-bound car running on its track on East Seventh street, carelessly and negligently stopped said car in front of and in the direct path of the said deceased without any cause or reason therefor, and the said deceased was prevented, through said negligence and carelessness of the defendant and its said servant, from passing in the rear thereof in safety and without injury to her; that if said west-bound car had not been stopped in front of and in the direct path of said deceased, as aforesaid, she would have passed in safety over the south track and out of the zone of danger from the defendant's car running east on its said south track; that because of said west-bound car being carelessly and negligently stopped and operated as aforesaid, the said deceased, when at a position between the said tracks of the said defendant, and while in the danger zone of the defendant's east-bound car, hesitated and stopped and was instantly struck by one of the electric cars of the defendant, which was then and there operated east on said south track by the defendant and its servants in charge of said car at a reckless rate of speed, and the said deceased was thereby thrown violently to said street, and was then and there seriously injured from which injuries she died in about four hours thereafter. * * *"

[1-3] The correctness of the fundamental facts found by the trial court concerning the operation of the cars and the movements and conduct of the deceased are not disputed; but it is earnestly insisted, and justly so, we think, that these fundamental facts neither warrant nor support the finding that the motorman on the west-bound car was guilty of negligence in bringing his car to a stop across the path of the deceased. Practically the only evidence upon this phase of the case is to be found in the testimony of the motorman on the west-bound car, and the admitted fact in the case that there was a space of about three feet between the cars in which the deceased could have stood in safety. The motorman testified as follows:

> "Relative to the south track, she [the deceased] was, I suppose, two or three feet from the south track—she hadn't stepped over the rail yet, or on either track, when I last saw her. As to the east-bound car's front end at that instant—well, I suppose he was somewhere between half a car's length, maybe a little over, in front of me. The woman was still walking north when I last saw her—hadn't slowed up a bit, coming in the direction of my car. I stopped my car as soon as I could, and that was pretty quick. I had an idea—I was pretty near positive that she was going to come on, and with my car stopped she could get up to the side of it and be out of the way of the other; of course, if they were both going, she couldn't so well. I think I stopped before the impact—before she got in there."

It being conceded that the deceased was negligent, the negligence of the west-bound motorman can justify the judgment only upon the theory that he, as well as the east-bound motorman, had a last clear chance to avoid injuring the deceased. It would be without precedent, so far as we are aware, to apply the doctrine of "last clear chance" where, as here, the injured person was never in danger from, and not touched by, the instrumentality over which the individual charged with negligence had control. Conceding that the west-bound motorman did have a last clear chance of avoiding injuring the deceased, the fact remains that he did avoid injuring her. She was imperiled in the first instance, and ultimately injured and killed, by the impact of the east-bound car. We should hesitate to hold that it was negligent to stop a street car in a situation where a collision was imminent between a pedestrian and some other moving vehicle which was completely under the control of a third person. Ordinarily, a street car standing still can hurt nobody. On the other hand, if it be kept in motion, in the presence of an impending crisis involving possible injury to a pedestrian by other vehicles in the immediate vicinity, there immediately arises the peril of the pedestrian's being thrown under the wheels of the moving car. Particularly is this so in a situation such as that presented in the instant case. The deceased was, to the knowledge of the west-bound motorman, about to step upon the east-bound track, thereby placing herself in immediate peril from a car approaching on that track, and a few feet to her left. Under these circumstances the west-bound motorman, we think, was justified in anticipating that while the speed of the east-bound car might be checked to the extent of avoiding striking a fatal blow, nevertheless that car might very possibly throw the deceased under the trucks of his own car. There were, then, two courses open to him to avoid the peril made possible by such a situation. He could either have stopped the car, as he did, or he could have speeded up his car in an attempt to get it completely out of the danger zone. The first course and the course actually adopted would ordinarily result in safety. The latter course would very likely be fraught with peril. A slight miscalculation of the rate of speed of either car or of the deceased might perchance result fatally. We do not think that the motorman of the west-bound car was required to assume any such risk. True, the court below found that if the motorman had speeded up his car the deceased would have passed across the tracks in safety. But that fact alone is not sufficient to charge said motorman with negligence. It must further appear that a reasonably prudent and skillful motorman would not have done as he did. The court's conclusion obviously was based upon a last analysis of the peril of the situation as revealed by the testimony of the numerous witnesses who had viewed the accident from various positions. Clearly, the motorman cannot be held to have been negligent merely because he did not make the choice which such an analysis perhaps shows would have been the best choice. He was bound to use only that degree of care which a reasonably prudent and skillful motorman would have used under all of the circumstances of a situation with which he was suddenly confronted, and which were only visible to him from the platform of his moving car. Assuming that the motorman was bound to surmise that the deceased might have succeeded in crossing the east-bound track ahead of the on-coming car, still he can only be held negligent in stopping upon the theory that he was bound, in addition, to anticipate that the deceased would hesitate and step back upon seeing his car in her path. True, the court found that the deceased was not negligent in so stepping back; but that is a very different thing from finding that the motorman was bound to anticipate that she would do so. Clearly, it would have been the wise and prudent thing for the deceased to have stopped and stood in the clear space between the cars until the east-bound car had stopped or gone by. The motorman was justified, we think, in assuming that the deceased would thus have endeavored to save herself from injury.

[4] This brings us to a consideration of the negligence charged and found against the motorman of the east-bound car. Upon this phase of the case the finding of the trial court was as follows:

> "That the said defendant, through its motorman in charge of said east-bound car, carelessly, negligently, recklessly, and wantonly ran said car against the said deceased while she was between the said tracks of the said defendant, and known to said motorman in charge of said east-bound car to be in a dangerous position; that the said motorman in charge of said east-bound car, after discovering and knowing that the said deceased was in a dangerous position, had ample time and distance within which to stop his said car by the exercise of ordinary care before striking the deceased; that the said motorman did not exercise ordinary care in operating said east-bound car to avoid injuring her, but, on the contrary, recklessly and wantonly ran said car against her, and thereby caused her death as aforesaid; that the said motorman in charge of said east-bound car saw said deceased from the time she left the south curb until she was struck, as aforesaid, and knew when she was approaching the danger zone of his car; that when deceased was two or three feet south of the south rail of the east-bound track the motorman threw off his current and applied his brakes in an endeavor to stop said car, but that he did not stop said car as soon or as quickly as he should and could have stopped said car; that at said time the deceased was a sufficient distance in advance of the car so that the same should and could have been stopped by the exercise of ordinary care in operating said car; that the motorman had a clear opportunity to avoid injuring the deceased after he knew her to be in a place of danger, but recklessly and wantonly failed to operate his said car to that end; that the said deceased was not careless or negligent in hesitating and stopping as aforesaid."

The sum and substance of these particular findings is that while the motorman of the east-bound car was seasonably vigilant in an endeavor to bring the car to a stop, and thereby avoid the accident, nevertheless he was guilty of negligence in failing to fully avail himself of the last clear chance to avoid injuring the deceased, in that he failed, with the means at hand, to effectively stop the car at a distance from the deceased at which it could and should have been so stopped. Of course, if this be so, it must follow that the negligence of the deceased in going upon the east-bound track did not ultimately contribute proximately to her injury and death. A review of the evidence upon this phase of the case compels the conclusion that the findings, in so far as they declare that the motorman did not stop the car as quickly as he could and should have done must have been made and based upon one of two theories: (1) That although the motorman threw off the current and applied the brakes in an endeavor to stop the car when the deceased was two or three feet of the south rail of his track, nevertheless he did not apply the brakes as vigorously and as effectively as might and should have been done; or (2) that the motorman should have used the reverse instead of the brakes, or that, simultaneously and in conjunction with the use of the brakes, he should have resorted to the use of the reverse.

The evidence of the plaintiff responding to this phase of the case is to be found in the testimony of two passengers on the east-bound car and the testimony of two expert, or rather opinion, witnesses. One of these opinion witnesses was a policeman who had formerly been a motorman, while the other was a laborer who at one time had operated a street car for the period of 11 months. Neither of these witnesses had ever been in control of a car of the type which struck the deceased and caused the injuries resulting in her death. These witnesses, in effect, testified that it was their opinion that the east-bound car, under all of the shown circumstances, might have been stopped sooner than it was. From a perusal of their testimony it appears that their opinions were not based upon any experiment made with the car in question, similarly loaded, on a similar grade, and with the same air pressure. To the contrary, it appears that their opinions were based wholly upon their experience in the handling of different cars, differently loaded, on different grades, with different amounts of air pressure, and with different circumstances calling for the sudden stoppage of the car. One of these witnesses stated that he was merely giving estimates of the distances within which a car might be stopped, and that he could not tell with any degree of precision the distance within which a car might be stopped when going at a specified speed. The other witness gave it as his opinion that there was not any given distance in which a car might be stopped. Both witnesses were practically agreed that the same car will stop within different distances under apparently the same operation and conditions. With reference to the method of effectively stopping in an emergency a car going from 8 to 10 miles an hour within a distance of 20 feet, one of these witnesses declared that he would, in addition to the use of the air, resort to the reverse—that is to say, he would throw off the current, pull the reverse lever, and then feed the current back slowly, during which operation the car would continue its forward movement until checked by the gradual extinguishment of its momentum. This witness, however, admitted that a sudden resort to the reverse was fraught with difficulty, and very likely to result in failure. Finally, he gave it as his opinion that "in 99 out of 100 cases the air will stop quicker and better than the reverse. * * * A person gets excited, and they throw the controller too far and it throws the overhead. If you throw your overhead you are powerless, if your wheels don't freeze to the rail. The brake is the best thing to stop the car, provided your air is all right. Assuming the brake is working and the air is all right, the brake is the best and safest means to make a service or emergency stop." The other witness was also of the opinion that the reverse should be resorted to for an emergency stop, and, in this behalf, testified: "I would use the reverse in an emergency if the track was kind of bad, and I saw that I was going to hit the person, I believe that I would reverse—I don't know whether it would do much good. At times it does, and at times it don't; at times if you slug a car it will slide before it takes effect. You have got to reverse it, and then throw your controller clear around, that throws your overhead; then it takes probably a second or two to take hold." We shall consider elsewhere the testimony of the passengers on the car.

The evidence offered upon behalf of the defendant upon this phase of the case was elicited from several witnesses—motormen and instructors of motormen actively and daily engaged for many years in their respective occupations—whose testimony, in substance, was that there was not a grade at the scene of the accident sufficient to make any appreciable difference in stopping a car going either way; that a quicker and better stop could be made with the air than with the reverse; that if the air was working right the reverse should never be used in an emergency stop; that a better stop would be obtained by using either the reverse or the brakes rather than by using both at the same time; that the brakes stopped the car by retarding the revolutions of the wheels, while the reverse would stop it by revolving the wheels in an opposite direction from that in which the car was first proceeding; that the result of the use of the air and of the brakes together was to reduce the effect of each; and that, while the brakes will produce a stop much quicker than the reverse, the reverse alone will result in a stop quicker than when it is used in conjunction with the brakes. Three of these witnesses were in substantial accord in the opinion, based upon many years of experience and actual tests made, that a loaded car of the type in question could not be brought to a full stop in any distance short of from 50 to 60 feet. During the examination of one of these witnesses it was developed that the defendant, as a result of a series of experiments, had issued to its employés written instructions, which were in force at the time of the accident, designating the method and means to be employed by motormen when required to make emergency stops. These rules, which were produced and admitted in evidence upon the demand of the plaintiff, provided that, "in making emergency stops for any purpose, always rely on your air brakes. Never reverse unless you have less than 30 pounds of air. (Or brakes become useless or ineffective.)" Again, one of defendant's bulletins, introduced in evidence under similar circumstances, states that "in making tests it has been found that the quickest and shortest stops can be made with the air brakes." It was also shown in evidence upon behalf of the defendant, and not disputed by the plaintiff, that the car in question was, at the time of the accident, equipped with an air gauge carrying minimum 45 and maximum 65 pounds pressure, and that the air was working right, carrying pressure within the minimum and maximum limits.

Considering this evidence as a whole, there is not, we think, any substantial conflict existing between the opinions of the witness for the plaintiff and those for the defendant as to the wisdom of using the reverse alone, or in conjunction with the air brakes, for the purpose of making an emergency stop. To the contrary, it would appear, it seems to us, that all of the witnesses were substantially agreed that the use of the brakes alone in an emergency was the best way to stop a car, and all that an ordinarily skillful and prudent motorman was required to do.

This brings us to a consideration of the question of whether or not, by a proper use of the brakes alone, the car could and should have been stopped, considering the speed at which it was going, within a distance sufficient to have avoided striking the deceased. While it is true that the testimony of the two opinion witnesses of the plaintiff consisted largely of estimates, based solely upon their general experience as motormen, of the distance within which the car should and could have been stopped by the use of the brakes while going at a given rate of speed, still this testimony, having been offered and received without objection, was some evidence of the fact in dispute, and the court might have considered it, and doubtless did consider it and give it some weight, when it made its findings. Further support of the finding relative to the effective use of the brakes is to be found in the testimony of the plaintiffs' witnesses Setchell and Pistonetti, who, at the time of the accident, were riding on the front of the east-bound car. Setchell testified, in substance, that he felt the impact of the car against the body of the deceased; that he could not say from the "feeling" of the car that the brakes had been set prior to the collision of the car with the deceased, and that he "felt the brakes set after the lady had been struck." The inference naturally and necessarily deducible from this testimony was that the brakes were not set at all, or, if set, were not so set as to make their operation effective until after the deceased had been struck. While it is true that the testimony of this witness, in so far as it related to the timely application of the brakes, was, as is clearly indicated by the findings, rejected by the trial court, nevertheless it does not appear, and we cannot say, that the testimony in question, in so far as it related to the effective operation of the brakes, was also rejected by the trial court. The inference that the brakes, though set, were not effectively set, finds further support in the testimony of Pistonetti, who testified that "the car stopped rather gently—it didn't stop with a jerk; it slowed up and stopped rather gently." The testimony of Setchell and Pistonetti, considered in conjunction with that of the opinion witnesses, creating, as it clearly did, a conflict in the evidence, concerning the proper and efficacious use of the brakes, sufficed to support the finding that the motorman of the east-bound car was negligent in not bringing his car to a stop sooner than he did.

[5, 6] It appears from the record that, during the argument of the case, the trial court, in the face of objection, discussed with counsel for the plaintiff, and ultimately received and reviewed, the evidence adduced in another case, which had been tried before the same court, relative to the distances within which cars of a company other than the defendant could be stopped. This was error, and was not cured by the certificate of the court that its decision was wholly based upon other and competent evidence. Peck v. Pierce, 63 Conn. 310, 28 Atl. 524; Rapson v. Leighton, 187 Mass. 432, 73 N. E. 540; Jaques v. Bridgeport, etc., Co., 41 Conn. 61, 19 Am. Rep. 483. That this error contributed to the judgment, and was therefore prejudicial, seems clear when viewed in the light of the fact the evidence upon which rests the finding of negligence in the east-bound motorman was little better than meager. Our conclusion in this behalf is fortified by the fact that when the plaintiffs and defendant had both rested their case, and before the extraneous evidence complained of had been considered at all, the trial court announced, as shown by the bill of exceptions, that "there was the gravest doubt as to whether it was possible for the motorman to have stopped his car sooner than he did."

[7] The trial court also erred, to the prejudice of the defendant, in its ruling, in the face of specific and sufficient objection, permitting the cross-examination by plaintiffs' counsel of plaintiffs' expert witness Lacher. Plainly the purpose of this cross-examination was to show that the witness was biased in favor of the defendant. It tended to, and doubtless did, discredit the witness to the extent that this testimony was favorable to the defendant. This the plaintiffs were not entitled to do. If the witness in question, having been called by the plaintiffs, had unexpectedly given damaging testimony against them, it would have been permissible, under the provisions of section 2049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to show that the witness had previously made statements inconsistent with his testimony upon the theory that the plaintiffs were taken by surprise by the adverse testimony of their own witness. People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 75 Pac. 101. Assuming that the witness in question did give testimony against the plaintiffs, and conceding that counsel for the plaintiffs was, as he stated when insisting upon the right to cross-examine his own witness, surprised at the testimony of the witness, still this fact did not give him the right to cross-examine merely for the purpose of showing bias. The general rule is that, where a witness is unexpectedly hostile to or biased against the party by whom he is called, such party cannot introduce evidence tending to show such hostility or bias. In re Mellen's Estate, 56 Hun, 553, 9 N Y. Supp. 929; Wise v. Wakefield, 118 Cal. 107, 50 Pac. 310.

[8] Subsequently counsel for the plaintiffs endeavored to impeach the testimony of this same witness by proof of previous inconsistent statements. As a foundation for the attempted impeachment, the witness in question was asked if he had not made certain statements to a man named Miller at a certain time and place. The witness having denied making the statements contained in the impeaching question, Miller was called and sworn by the plaintiffs as an impeaching witness. The record shows that the trial court, over objection, permitted Miller to be interrogated as to what he said to the witness sought to be impeached, rather than what the latter said. In short, the impeaching question, involving the claimed inconsistent statements, and which, in the first instance, had been put to the witness sought to be impeached, was not propounded, precisely or in substance, to the impeaching witness. "The proper method of impeachment is to formulate the question so as to embrace the very statement, at least in substance, which the witness whom it is desired to impeach has denied making, and to ask the impeaching witness for a categorical answer whether the statement was made, giving 'the circumstances of times, places, and persons present.' Section 2052, Code Civ. Pro." Norris v. Crandall, 65 Pac. 568, 570.[1] See, also, People v. Nonella, 99 Cal. 333, 33 Pac. 1097.

This disposes of all of the points made in support of the appeal which we deem worthy of discussion.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

We concur: WILBUR, J.; MELVIN, J.

1. Executors and Administrators 🔑315(6)—Decree of Distribution—Collateral Attack.

A decree of distribution is not subject to collateral attack no matter how erroneously it may appear to depart from the terms of the will, if all of the interested parties have had due notice of the petition.

2. Executors and Administrators 🔑314(4)—Petition for Final Distribution—Notice.

It is not necessary that personal notice be given of presentation and pendency of a petition for final distribution, and, where there is no claim that the notice required by law was not given, it will be presumed that such notice was given.

3. Executors and Administrators 🔑315(5)—Decree of Distribution—Construction.

A decree of distribution disposing of the residue of decedent's estate, described as "all of said property," to his widow, naming her, meets the requirements of Code Civ. Proc. § 1666, and distributes all of estate to her without limitation.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑843(2)—Matters Not Necessary to Dispose of Case—Review.

Since neither the pleadings nor proof of plaintiff suffice to support their action to quiet title, the question of the statute of limitations put in issue by the pleadings need not be considered.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by John E. Miller and another against Albert Sidney Pitman and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Kendrick & Ardis, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. Moore, of Whittier, and R. A. Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment quieting the plaintiffs' title to an undivided one-fourth of a certain tract of land situate in the county of Los Angeles and awarding to the plaintiffs the sum of $1,750 for the use and occupation of said lands for the period during which the trial court found the plaintiffs were entitled to the possession thereof.

The facts of the case, as revealed by the pleadings, proof, and findings, are generally these: In February, 1888, Elias W. Pitman died seized of a tract of land which included the land in suit. By his will, he left a life estate in the said land to his wife Charlotte Pitman, whom he named as executrix, with remainders in fee to their children and to the heirs of the children's bodies. Under the terms of this will, the plaintiff, John E. Miller, the orphaned grandson of Elias W. and Charlotte Pitman, who was at the time eleven years of age, was entitled to an undivided one-sixth interest in the total remainder, his sister to one-sixth, and the defendants Albert S. Pitman and Mary Cole, née Pitman, to one-third each. In March, 1888, the defendant Albert S. Pitman, son of Elias W. and Charlotte Pitman, was duly appointed the guardian of the plaintiff John E. Miller and of his sister, Mary Miller, and acted as such during their minority and, in fact, never was discharged. The will of Elias W. Pitman was duly admitted to probate upon the petition of Charlotte Pitman, as executrix. In due tme, she petitioned the probate court for a decree of final distribution wherein she alleged, among other things:

> "That the said Charlotte Pitman, your petitioner, is, by reason of the provisions of the last will of said deceased, now on file in this court, entitled to the whole of the residue of said estate during her lifetime, and after her death to be equally divided among his said children."

In November, 1891, the probate court made and entered its decree in the estate of Elias W. Pitman finally distributing "all of the said property to Charlotte Pitman, the widow of said Elias W. Pitman, deceased." Charlotte Pitman entered into possession of the land in suit under this decree of distribution and subsequently deeded a portion of it to the defendant Albert S. Pitman absolutely leaving approximately two-thirds of the original acreage standing in her name. In 1900, the said Albert S. Pitman, desiring to sell the one-third so conveyed to him, requested the plaintiff Miller to join in the deed. Miller did so, as he testified, upon the representation of Pitman that if he would do so he, Pitman, would take this one-third of the land as his full share of the real property in the estate of Elias W. Pitman. In 1907, Charlotte Pitman deeded the remaining two-thirds to the defendants Albert S. Pitman and Mrs. Cole, reserving, however, unto herself a life estate therein. Charlotte Pitman died in March, 1909, on December 18, 1909, the defendant Albert S. Pitman purchased the interest of Mrs. Cole; Charles Cole, her husband, joining in the deed. Since that time Pitman has been in possession of the land, claiming title thereto under the conveyances to him from Charlotte Pitman and the Coles. The plaintiffs' complaint alleged, and the trial court found that the defendants knew the terms of the will of Elias W. Pitman at all times the probate thereof and "willfully and fraudulently concealed said facts from the said John E. Miller" and, in effect, that said concealment was successful down to 1914. The court found that the plaintiff Miller was absent from Los Angeles county and resided in Oregon, Washington, and Canada from 1907 to the spring of 1915, and, in the latter year, ascertained for the first time that his grandfather, Elias W. Pitman, had made him one of the devisees in his will. The plaintiff Moore clams title to a portion of the land in suit under a deed from the plaintiff Miller.

A first impression created by a cursory reading of the record is that the plaintiffs' cause of action proceeds in part upon the theory of a trust arising in favor of the plaintiff Miller as the result of a fraudulent concealment by Charlotte Pitman and the defendant Albert S. Pitman while standing in the relation of fiduciaries to the said Miller. A closer scrutiny of the record discloses that the plaintiffs' complaint is framed, as were the findings and judgment of the trial court, upon the theory that the probate court had no jurisdiction, under the issues presented by the petitions for the probate of the will of Elias W. Pitman and for the final distribution of his estate, to distribute to Charlotte Pitman any interest therein greater than a life estate, and that, as a consequence, the decree of distribution did not divest the plaintiff John E. Miller of the interest in the estate of Elias W. Pitman devised to him by the terms of the will and did not distribute to Charlotte Pitman the fee simple title to the lands in suit. With this theory as a basis, the plaintiffs contended, and the tral court in effect further found, that the only interest, namely, a life estate, which Charlotte Pitman took under the decree of distribution, terminated at her death, thereby vesting the remainder over, to the extent of an undivided one-fourth, in the plaintiff Miller in fee simple. Of course, if this theory were correct, it would follow, as the trial court ultimately concluded, that the defendants, as grantees of Charlotte Pitman, acquired no interest in or title to the lands in suit. In view of the evident and undoubted theory of the plaintiffs' case, as thus outlined, it is obvious that the facts relative to the alleged fraudulent concealment were pleaded, proven and found solely for the purpose of tolling the statute of limitations and need not, therefore, be considered for any other purpose.

[1, 2] It thus appears that the paramount point presented upon the appeal involves the scope, effect, and finality of the decree of distribution which was made and entered in November, 1891, and never appealed from. The fundamental finding of the trial court to the effect that Charlotte Pitman took no more than a life estate by the decree of distribution is not supported by the evidence. The only evidence responding to this phase of the case consists of the will of Elias W. Pitman, the petition for its probate, the petition for the decree of distribution, and the decree itself. Neither extrinsic fraud nor mistake in the procurement of the decree was alleged, shown, or found. The decree is valid on its face. Clearly the probate court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the decree of distribution, and the fact that the decree erroneously construed the terms of the will did not operate to render the decree void. The time for appeal from the decree has long since expired. It is well settled that a decree of distribution is not subject to collateral attack, no matter how erroneously it may appear to depart from the terms of the will devising and bequeathing the estate distributed, if all of the interested parties have had due notice of the petition. The law does not require personal notice to be given of the presentation and pendency of a petition for final distribution, and, the complaint in the present case failing to allege that the notice required by law was not given, it will be presumed that such notice was given. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1666, 1668; Daly v. Pennie, 86 Cal. 552, 25 Pac. 67, 21 Am. St. Rep. 61; Lynch v. Rooney, 112 Cal. 279, 44 Pac. 565; William Hill Co. v. Earl, 129 Cal. 148, 61 Pac. 914, 79 Am. St. Rep. 100; Mulcahey v. Dow, 131 Cal. 73, 63 Pac. 158; Keating v. Smith, 154 Cal. 191, 97 Pac. 300; Estate of Learned, 156 Cal. 309, 104 Pac. 315; Rountree v. Montague, 30 Cal. App. 170, 157 Pac. 623; Beltran v. Hynes, 180 Pac. 540.

[3, 4] This brings us to a consideration of the legal effect of the language of the decree. In our judgment, it is susceptible of no construction save that it purports to, and does in fact, distribute all of the estate of Elias W. Pitman to Charlotte Pitman, without limitation. In this behalf, it will be noted that the decree in terms declares that it is disposing of the "residue of the estate" thereinafter "particularly described" as follows: "All of said property to Charlotte Pitman, the widow of said Elias W. Pitman, deceased." Section 1666 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides the requirements of a decree of distribution, declares that it "must name the persons and the proportions or parts to which each shall be entitled. * * *" Viewed in the light of this Code section, there is no escape from the conclusion that the decree in controversy, in express terms distributed all of the property of the estate to Charlotte Pitman without limitation and thereby confirmed in her an estate in fee simple absolute. This decree, in the absence of a showing or claim of extrinsic fraud or mistake, was irrevocable save upon appeal within the time provided by law, even though it was in contravention of the terms of the will. McKenzie v. Budd, supra; Mulcahey v. Dow, supra. So long as this decree stands unimpeached by such fraud or mistake, and it has not been so impeached herein by any fact alleged in the pleadings, developed in the proof or found by the court, there is no theory upon which any right or title of the plaintiffs to the land in question can be predicated and sustained. It follows that neither the pleadings nor proof of the plaintiffs suffice to support an action to quiet title, and, consequently, the question of the statute of limitations, which was put in issue by the pleadings, need not now be considered.

This opinion might with propriety and perhaps in strictness should end here, but we do not wish to be understood as holding that the plaintiffs in the presence of the potential equities of their case are entirely without remedy. Therefore, we are constrained to say that, if time has not confirmed a wrong, the plaintiff's case might very readily be made to proceed through the medium of appropriate pleadings upon the equitable theory which, while recognizing, as a matter of law, the finality of the decree as a muniment of title in the defendants, nevertheless impresses such title with an involuntary trust in favor of the plaintiffs by reason of extrinsic fraud, or mistake superinduced by such fraud, in the procurement of the decree coupled with the breach of a fiduciary relationship. Estate of Walker, 160 Cal. 547, 117 Pac. 510, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89. In this behalf, it may not be amiss to note again that at the time of the presentation and granting of the petition for the decree of distribution the defendant Albert S. Pitman was the duly qualified and acting guardian of the person and estate of the plaintiff Miller. The decree being obviously erroneous, it was the undoubted duty of the defendant Pitman, as such guardian to have instituted and prosecuted appropriate proceedings by appeal, or otherwise, to remedy the error. His failure as guardian to thus protect and preserve the interests of his ward having ultimately resulted to his own advantage, it would seem to be but just to make him a trustee to the extent that he profited by his default. True, the defendant Pitman did testify that he never knew that the plaintiff Miller was entitled to anything under the will, but, obviously, it was his business and duty as guardian to know the terms of the will.

The appellant assigns error in several of the rulings of the trial court concerning the admissibility of certain evidence. No argument, however, is made in support of these assignments, and therefore we do not deem them worthy of discussion and decision.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

HOGAN v. ANTHONY et al. (Civ. 2798.)

1. SALES ⚿92—RESCISSION BY CONSENT.

Where plaintiff on discovery of the fraud refused to pay monthly installments for truck he had been induced to purchase by false representations of defendant seller and returned truck in compliance with defendant's demand, there was a rescission by consent. Civ. Code, §§ 1689, 1691.

2. SALES ⚿456—SALE OR LEASE—STATUTE.

Defendants cannot, by designating a contract a lease, take from it its true character as a contract for the conditional sale of truck which it was in fact, in view of Civ. Code, § 1648.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by James P. Hogan against Earle C. Anthony, doing business under the fictitious name of the Chalmers-Los Angeles Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

A. D. Laughlin, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff, upon the judgment roll alone, appeals from a judgment entered in favor of defendant.

As appears from the second amended complaint, filed after the decision of this court in a former appeal had by defendant wherein the judgment in favor of plaintiff was reversed (Hogan v. Anthony, 34 Cal. App. 24, 166 Pac. 861), the parties, on August 13, 1914, executed a contract, the designation of which is "Lease and Conditional Sale of Automobile" (the subject thereof being an auto truck), upon which plaintiff at the time paid $500 in cash, and for the balance of the purchase price or rental of $1,150 he executed his promissory notes, one of which was for the sum of $100 and by its terms due and payable on September 13, 1914. The writing contained a provision to the effect that the instrument should be construed as a lease with an option on the part of the plaintiff to acquire title to the truck for the sum of one dollar, subject to compliance with his covenants therein contained and payment of the notes according to the terms and conditions thereof.

The complaint embraces two counts, in one of which plaintiff alleges facts which, if true, he insists show a rescission of the contract, under and by virtue of which he is entitled to recover judgment for the $500 paid. The other is a common count for money had and received by defendant for the use and benefit of plaintiff.

On the former appeal the judgment was reversed for the reason that, as shown by the complaint upon which the case was tried, the subject of the action was not the contract, designated "Lease and Conditional Sale of Automobile," under and in accordance with which possession of the truck was by defendant delivered to plaintiff, but a preliminary agreement in the course of the transaction, made the preceding day, and as to which the court, in distinguishing such preliminary and informal contract which contemplated the execution of the lease and conditional-sale agreement here involved, says:

> "The facts * * * disclose a situation, during the period between the execution of the contract and the execution of the lease, in which the parties were engaged in closing a single transaction. Of this transaction, the lease was the conclusion and the culmination, and by it must the rights of the parties be judged. The respondent does not claim to have rescinded the lease. He denies its existence and expressly relies upon an alleged rescission of the contract, a paper merely preliminary to the lease and which was abrogated by it." See Hogan v. Anthony, supra.

It thus appears that on the former appeal the court had before it a case the subject of which was the rescission of a different instrument from the one here involved.

On this appeal, in the absence of the evidence, the sole question presented is whether or not the findings, deemed to be fully established, support the judgment. The court found:

> That on the 12th day of August, 1914, defendant agreed to sell and plaintiff agreed to buy the truck in question for the sum of $1,650, at which time plaintiff paid the sum of $500 to be applied upon the purchase price of the vehicle, and agreed to pay the balance thereof in eleven monthly installments of $100 each, and one, the last, of $50, all of which should be evidenced by promissory notes due and payable in accordance with the agreement. That on the next day, August 13th, plaintiff and defendant executed the contract, designated "Lease and Conditional Sale of Automobile," to which we have hereinbefore referred, and plaintiff made and executed the promissory notes in accordance with his agreement made the day before; whereupon the truck was delivered to plaintiff who continued in possession thereof until September 18, 1914. That "at the time of entering into said contract * * * plaintiff had no knowledge regarding such trucks and so informed defendants and told defendants that he would have to rely entirely upon their representations * * * and * * * informed defendants the nature of his business and for what purpose he desired to use the said truck, and that he needed a truck * * * with a capacity of and capable of carrying and conveying from one to one and one-quarter tons of freight. * * * That he must have a truck that would haul and carry not less than from one to one and one-quarter tons, and that he could not use a truck of a less carrying capacity. That said defendants then and there represented to plaintiff that the truck so leased by plaintiff, as aforesaid, was a ton truck, and that the same * * * had a hauling capacity sufficient for plaintiff's business, * * * and that said truck would easily carry and haul one and one-quarter tons of freight." "That plaintiff relied upon each and all of said representations so made by defendants and believed them to be true and believed that the truck which said defendants were then offering to sell to him was a truck, with a hauling capacity of not less than one and one-quarter tons. * * * That, if it had not been for said representations so made by defendants, plaintiff would not have entered into said agreement and that it was by reason of said representations so made by defendants to plaintiff that plaintiff did enter into said agreement as hereinbefore found, and paid to defendants the said sum of $500. That each and all of the representations so made by defendants to plaintiff with reference to said truck and its carrying capacity, as aforesaid, were and are false and fraudulent, and the said truck so leased by said defendants to plaintiff, as hereinbefore set out, was in truth and in fact a 1,500-pound truck * * * and did not have a carrying capacity of 1 ton or of 1¼ tons. That said defendants knew that said representations so made by them, as aforesaid, were false and fraudulent at the time they were made and said representations were so made by said defendants for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding said plaintiff, and for the purpose of causing him to enter into said contract, as hereinbefore found, and to pay to defendants the sum of $500 and to cause plaintiff to agree to pay the balance thereof in monthly payments. * * * Possession of said truck was delivered to said plaintiff on the 13th day of August, 1914, and thereafter plaintiff attempted to use the same in his business, but said truck could not be used successfully in his said business. * * * When plaintiff first began to use said truck he attempted to haul thereon about one ton of freight. When so doing said truck would heat up to such an extent that it could not be successfully used. Plaintiff thereupon complained to defendant regarding such condition and defendant assured plaintiff that such condition was caused solely by the fact that said truck was new. Plaintiff relied upon such statement of defendant that such heat was being caused by the fact that said truck was new, and continued to use the same; but said truck continued to heat and could not be successfully used by plaintiff in his said business. That plaintiff did not discover the fact that said truck was not a ton truck and was only a truck of 1,500 pounds capacity until on or about the 26th of August. That immediately after discovering said fact plaintiff notified said defendant that said truck was not a ton truck and was not of a capacity which defendant had represented it to be. That plaintiff refused to make any further payments upon said contract solely by reason of such facts.

"That on the 18th of September, 1914, defendant * * * at the city of Upland demanded payment of the note then due. That plaintiff then refused to pay said note and also refused to make any further payments pursuant to said agreement unless defendant furnished plaintiff with a ton truck. That on the said 18th day of September, 1914, plaintiff, at the request of defendant, returned said truck to defendant and said truck has been in the possession of defendant ever since. That plaintiff returned said truck to defendant because of the fact that the same was not as it had been represented to be and because of the fact that it could not be successfully used by plaintiff in his said business. That defendant never * * * furnished plaintiff with a truck of a ton capacity or of any other capacity, and on demand made by plaintiff, prior to the commencement of this action, for a return of said $500, refused to repay the same. That defendants did not at any time receive for the use and benefit of plaintiff the sum of $500 or any sum whatsoever. That no part of the $100 note which matured on September 13th, and for which defendants by answer sought to recover, had been paid."

Upon the foregoing facts the court concluded, as a matter of law, that plaintiff was entitled to nothing, and that defendant Earle C. Anthony was entitled to recover upon the $100 note, and gave judgment accordingly.

The facts are quite similar to those involved in Pepper v. Vedova, 26 Cal. App. 406, 147 Pac. 105, and Hackett v. Lewis, 173 Pac. 111, in both of which cases plaintiffs recovered money the payment of which was induced by like deceit. Indeed, the findings quoted show that, as a means of wrongfully obtaining plaintiff's money, defendants knowingly perpetrated the grossest fraud, and to uphold the judgment entered thereon would render the language of the Legislature, that "for every wrong there is a remedy" (section 3523, Civ. Code), and "no one can take advantage of his own wrong" (section 3517, Civ. Code), idle and meaningless declarations.

[1] The acts of the parties had and taken, as shown by the findings herein, present a different case from that involved on the former appeal. That, as shown by the findings, plaintiff was entitled to rescind the contract of sale, admits of no controversy. Were the acts had and taken by the parties sufficient to constitute a rescission? The promised payment of the note as to which default was made was predicated upon the precedent promise of the defendants to furnish him with a truck of a ton or a ton and a quarter capacity. Defendants neglected and refused to comply with their promise, thus dispensing with any obligation of performance on plaintiff's part to pay the note. Mansfield v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co., 102 N. Y. 205, 6 N. E. 386. When for nonperformance defendants requested that plaintiff return the truck, he complied therewith, not because he was under obligation to do so, since he might have affirmed the contract and sued for damages, but, as found by the court, "because of the fact that the same was not as it had been represented to be." A rescission may be accomplished by consent. Section 1689, Civ. Code. When defendants, without performance of their promise, in the absence of which no duty was imposed upon plaintiff to pay the note, demanded the return of the truck and plaintiff complied therewith, a rescission by consent was implied from such acts. Assuming, however, that defendants did not consent to the rescission, nevertheless the act of plaintiff in refusing to pay the note on account of the fraud and returning the truck was all that he was required to do by section 1691, Civil Code, to accomplish a rescission. That section provides that, in order to effect a rescission other than by consent, the party rescinding must—(1) upon discovery of the facts which entitle him to rescind, act promptly, with which provision plaintiff complied. "(2) He must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract." With this provision, waiving his right to exact restoration of the money paid as a condition of delivering the truck, he also complied, the result of which is that defendants have the truck and the $500 so wrongfully obtained from him.

Respondent argues that the instrument was merely a lease for a stipulated monthly rental for the use of the truck, and that for default in the payment of such installments of rent they were entitled to and did retake the truck into their possession. Even were the instrument conceded to be a lease, the law applicable to the case is the same.

[2] By the contract the parties clearly contemplated a sale by the one and a purchase by the other. Respondent cannot, by designating the contract a lease, take from it its true character as a contract for the conditional sale of the truck, which it was in fact. "However broad may be the terms of a contract, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract." Section 1648, Civ. Code.

The judgment is reversed, and upon going down of the remittitur the trial court is instructed to enter a judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff for $500, together with interest thereon from August 12, 1914, and costs.

JOHNS v. BAENDER et al. (Civ. 2657.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 26, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 23, 1919.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑197(3)—Objections in Lower Court—Pleading.

In a suit by judgment creditor to set aside a conveyance for fraud, where demurrer to the complaint was general, and defendants did not object to evidence introduced on the ground of failure to allege that defendants had no other property subject to execution, such point will be deemed to have been waived, and cannot be considered on appeal.

2. Fraudulent Conveyances 🔑58 — Intent to Defraud—Other Property Sufficient to Pay Debts.

A conveyance made with intent to defraud creditors is void regardless of whether the debtor has other property ample in amount to satisfy his creditor.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑169—Questions Raised in Oral Argument.

A point which was made for the first time upon oral argument cannot be considered on appeal.

4. Witnesses 🔑191—Privileged Communications—Husband and Wife—Divorce Complaint.

In a suit by a judgment creditor to set aside a conveyance by a husband and wife as being fraudulent, a divorce complaint of the wife against the husband in which she claimed the property involved to be community property was not privileged so as to exclude its admission in evidence.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑204(1)—Review—Admission of Evidence—Failure to Object.

Where appellants failed to object to the admission of evidence in the court below, they cannot on appeal be heard to complain.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Arthur T. Johns against Charles L. Baender and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

L. W. Jefferson, of Oakland, for appellants.

St. Sure & Rose, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against defendants in an action instituted by the plaintiff to vacate and set aside a conveyance of real property alleged to have been made to obstruct and prevent plaintiff from satisfying a certain money judgment which he had theretofore obtained against the defendants Charles L. Baender and Lillie M. Baender, his wife.

The evidence abundantly supports the finding that the conveyance of the property here assailed was made to defraud, hinder, and delay the collection of plaintiff's claim.

It appears from the record that in the latter part of the year 1908 the defendants, Charles L. Baender and his wife, had falsely represented in several material respects a certain business transferred by them to the plaintiff in consideration of a conveyance of real property, by reason of which misrepresentations plaintiff, in the month of June, 1910, obtained judgment against said defendants, which he now seeks to satisfy out of the property described in the complaint, the ownership of which in defendants arises from the original transfer to them by plaintiff of the real property above referred to as the consideration for plaintiff's acquisition of said business, and which, with the intent of concealing their ownership thereof, they transferred to Charles P. Baender, the father of the defendant Charles L., who subsequently conveyed the same to R. M. Meeker. It appears that later it was exchanged for what is called in the record the Fruitvale lot, which in turn was exchanged for the property described in the complaint, and that the deed thereto was taken in the name of the mother of Charles L. Baender, in whom the record title remained until it was conveyed to defendant Niels Gostave, which conveyance was made for the purpose of enabling Gostave to qualify as a bondsman for said Charles L. Baender, at that time charged with the offense of grand larceny.

After obtaining the first judgment plaintiff caused an execution to issue thereon, but neither by this means or in any other way was he able to collect the amount thereof, not learning of his debtors' interest in the real property concerned in this action until early in the year 1915, when Lillie M. Baender commenced an action for divorce against her husband, and alleged in her complaint that it was the community property of herself and husband.

It is also in evidence that shortly after the commencement of the divorce proceeding Charles M. Baender met the plaintiff one day, and tried to effect with him a compromise of his claim. On that occasion Baender not only admitted that he had obtained the first conveyance by fraud, but also that the title to the property here involved was taken in the name of his relative, as already mentioned, for the purpose of obstructing and defeating any claim which the plaintiff had or might have against him and his wife. It further appears that Charles L. Baender and wife were at all times in possession of the property, paid the taxes thereon, and expended money for its repair and improvement, but paid no rent therefor.

The testimony on behalf of the defendants was weak, evasive, and unsatisfactory. The case shows plain indications of fraud.

[1, 2] Defendants, in support of their appeal, urge that, this being an action in equity to set aside a transfer of property on the ground of fraud, facts must be alleged showing that the conveyance was made in such manner and under such circumstances as to show its fraudulent intent, and accordingly that it must appear that at the time it was made, and also when this action was commenced, said defendants had no other property subject to execution out of which the plaintiff's judgment could be satisfied, citing Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 631, 634, 22 Pac. 404, 13 Am. St. Rep. 200. Assuming for the moment that appellants' position is sound, still we are of the opinion that the most that can be said against the complaint in this regard is that it is somewhat indefinite; but, as the demurrer was general, and as there was no objection to the evidence introduced to establish the fraud on the ground now urged, the point must be deemed to have been waived, and is now unavailing. Sukeforth v. Lord, 87 Cal. 399, 403, 25 Pac. 497. Moreover, the case on which appellants depend appears to have been overruled; and, according to later cases, if a conveyance be made with the intent to defraud creditors it is void, notwithstanding that the debtor has other property ample in amount to satisfy his creditor. First Nat. Bank of L. A. v. Maxwell, 123 Cal. 360, 371, 55 Pac. 980, 69 Am. St. Rep. 64; Bekins v. Dieterle, 5 Cal. App. 690, 694, 91 Pac. 173.

[3] Defendants also assert that the decree rendered in the present suit goes beyond the issues framed by the pleadings and the prayer, by declaring in effect a second judgment against them arising out of the same cause of action. It is true that a portion of the judgment if detached from the remainder seems to be open to the objection urged by defendants, but we think it sufficiently clear that, when the judgment is read in its entirety, the part objected to amounts to no more than a recital of the amount due to plaintiff on account of the former judgment, and for which the plaintiff is given a lien on the property here involved. But aside from this, the point was made for the first time upon oral argument, and may not for that reason be considered.

The appellants also contend that, even if the transfer of the property were fraudulent, the title of the grantee is good as against all the world except this creditor, and that the court could not deprive the grantee of the title so conveyed to her, but that the judgment should have subjected the property to the lien of the judgment, and directed that any surplus which might remain after sale be paid to the grantee. The court under the issues found a certain amount due plaintiff, and, having also found that the transfers already referred to were void as to plaintiff, impressed the property with the lien of his judgment, directing that it be sold in satisfaction of that judgment. To this much under the issue the plaintiff was clearly entitled. As to what may or should be done with any possible surplus is a matter with which under the pleadings we are not now concerned.

[4, 5] The divorce complaint of Lillie M. Baender against her husband, having been filed, was not privileged; and, moreover, as it was admitted in evidence without objection, said defendants cannot now be heard to complain of its admission.

The record as amended on suggestion of diminution thereof shows that the default against defendant Niels Gostave, sued as First Doe, was valid. Nor did the court err in ordering judgment against him.

No other point urged by appellants requires consideration.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. BARRICK et al. (Civ. 1891.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 30, 1919. Rehearing Denied May 30, 1919; Denied by Supreme Court June 26, 1919.)

1. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION ⚷75, 84—TITLE OF HEIRS—REAL ESTATE—CONVEYANCE.

Title to real estate of deceased intestate vests immediately in his heirs which title they may convey without administration, subject to payment of debts.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION ⚷4—ACQUISITION OF ADVERSE TITLE—HEIRS.

As title descends to an heir of a deceased intestate subject to administration and he may convey the same, an heir may lose title by adverse possession.

3. TENANCY IN COMMON ⚷15(1)—ADVERSE POSSESSION—ADMINISTRATION.

A tenant in common who has acquired his title by descent may be divested of such title through adverse possession during the pendency of proceedings for administration of the estate of the deceased intestate from whom title descended.

4. TENANCY IN COMMON ⚷15(1)—ADVERSE POSSESSION—ADMINISTRATION.

While mere possession of land by a cotenant is not sufficient basis upon which to establish an adverse title as against cotenants, yet adverse title in favor of a cotenant may be established by the taking and recording of deeds and mortgages of the entire premises, together with the retaining of the rents and profits for the whole land for longer than the prescribed period.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Mrs. J. E. Smith, administratrix of the estate of Henry Worrall, deceased, against C. W. Barrick, as the administratrix of the estate of Henry Reece, deceased, and others and Ella Carpenter and others, and also all other persons unknown claiming any right, title, estate, lien, or interest in certain real property. From a judgment for plaintiff the defendants first named appeal. Modified, and as modified affirmed.

Preston & Preston, of Ukiah, and Hennessy & Peterson, of Grass Valley, for appellants.
W. H. Slade and Prewett & Chamberlain, all of Auburn, for respondent.

BUCK, Presiding Judge pro tem. This is an action to quiet title brought by the successor in interest of an heir against the other heirs and the administrator. Plaintiff claims to have acquired ownership by adverse possession, and the suit was commenced under the provisions of section 749a, Code of Civil Procedure. But by the dismissal of the action against all of the defendants except the original heirs and the administrator, the suit has become in fact an action to quiet title. Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 707, 712, 137 Pac. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209. Judgment was given in favor of plaintiff upon the ground that plaintiff and his predecessors had acquired title by adverse possession against the defendant heirs, and also against the administrator. From this judgment all of the defendants appeal. The facts upon which the trial court based its findings and decree are substantially as follows: On September 4, 1876, the ancestor from whom all parties deraigned title, Henry Reece, died intestate in the county of Nevada, leaving as his sole heirs his widow, Amanda Reece, and three children, the defendants herein, aged, respectively, 12, 6, and 3 years, the youngest of whom did not become of age until 1891. With the exception of some personal property of the value of $447, the deceased left no other property except the quarter section of land in controversy of the value, at that time, of $250. The property was the community property of himself and wife. On October 9, 1876, letters of administration were issued to his widow, Amanda Reece. But she took no other proceedings in the estate than to publish the notice to creditors and cause an inventory and appraisement to be made of the property. She died in 1887, and in 1915 letters of administration on the estate were issued to C. W. Barrick, who is made a defendant in his capacity as such administrator. On January 18, 1878, Amanda Reece made a deed of quitclaim to one A. S. Waldo, by which she did "remise, release and forever quitclaim unto the party of the second part and to his heirs and assigns" the property in controversy. This deed was recorded in the records of Nevada county July 3, 1880. Waldo was a son-in-law of Amanda Reece, and had actual knowledge of the family interest in the land. At about the time she made the deed to Waldo, Amanda Reece and her three children moved from the land in Nevada county to Auburn, in Placer county, where they lived for a period of 5 years and then moved to Ukiah, in Mendocino county, a distance of about 400 miles from Nevada county. It does not appear that any of the defendants ever returned to or visited the premises or ever received any income from the property, nor did their mother ever talk to them "about this property," and they never heard about it until the year 1913, when they were asked to give a quitclaim deed of their interest in it. After he obtained the quitclaim deed to the property in 1878, A. S. Waldo "put some stock on it, and put a man there to take care of the stock." He did not live on the property himself. The property was under fence and was cultivated, and no one ever objected to his possession at the time. He leased the property to a third person, and collected the rent for the whole of it and paid taxes on it. On April 11, 1881, Waldo, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, which was recorded on April 23, 1881, conveyed the property to John Davis who took possession of the land, cultivated it, and pastured it, repaired and built fences, and built a dwelling house thereon and occupied it until June, 1900, when by his deed, which was also duly recorded, John Davis conveyed the property to his son, Samuel Davis, who made his home on the property a part of the time, and also leased it to third parties, and received all the rents and profits therefrom. On July 9, 1908, Samuel Davis, by his deed of grant, bargain and sale, which was also recorded, conveyed the property to Henry C. Worrall, who remained in possession of the property 7 or 8 years, and during all that time paid the taxes on the property and farmed and pastured it. Also, on July 9, 1908, Henry C. Worrall gave a mortgage of all the property to Samuel Davis as security for the payment of the sum of $1,200, and on August 9, 1912 Worrall mortgaged all of the property to one Edith B. Poulson as security for the payment of the sum of $600; that both of these mortgages were recorded soon after being executed. Ever since 1890 the property has been assessed in the names of the foregoing record title holders thereof and all the taxes have been paid.

[1, 2] From the foregoing it appears that at the time of the death of their father in 1876 the defendants herein became vested with title to the property in question as cotenants in ownership with their mother, the mother owning an undivided one-half interest therein and each of the three heirs an undivided one-sixth interest therein. As stated in the case of Phelps v. Grady, 168 Cal. 73, at page 75, 141 Pac. 926, 927:

> "Title to the real estate of the deceased intestate vests immediately in his heirs, of a testate in his devisees. That title they may convey without administration, and this they may do whether they be domestic or foreign heirs or devisees. * * * True, the title thus conveyed is not a perfect title, in that the title will always be subject to the right of possession in a local administrator for the payment of claims of local creditors. But with this defect, the heirs who have deliberately parted with their title are not concerned and can find no fault. * * * No case cited by the appellant denies the power of the heirs or devisees so to convey their title. Indeed such a denial would be in the face of our express statutory law. All that such cases as In re Pina, 112 Cal. 14, 44 Pac. 332, Turner v. McDonald, 76 Cal. 177, 18 Pac. 262, 9 Am. St. Rep. 189, Estate of Strong, 119 Cal. 633, 51 Pac. 1078, and Blair v. Hazzard, 158 Cal. 721, 112 Pac. 298, declare upon this matter is that the title thus conveyed is still subject to administration, and is therefore and in this sense only not perfect."

Now, if an heir can convey his interest by deed, it follows that he can likewise lose it by the adverse possession of another under the statute. But the person who takes it by such adverse possession under the statute takes it subject to administration in the same manner that a grantee would. In fact, title by adverse possession at common law was based upon the fictitious assumption of a preexisting lost grant. Bryan v. Tormey, 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 85, 88, 21 Pac. 725.

[3] Therefore, there is no rule of law which prevents a tenant in common who has acquired his title by descent from being divested of his title through adverse possession by his cotenant during the pendency of proceedings in administration. Our Supreme Court, in the case of Cooley v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 510, at page 515, declares the rule as follows:

> "In Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 360, 11 Pac. 727 [105 Pac. 981, 983], the court held that a decree of distribution, made in the usual way, does not in any manner affect the title of one who has held by adverse possession against the heirs a sufficient time to gain title by prescription. The court says: 'It is the estate of the deceased upon which the probate court administers. It is the title which the deceased had in and to the real property at the time of his death, or which has inured to the estate after death and before distribution, which passes to the heirs and devisees.'"

[4] As regards the title by adverse possession, it is true that possession of the land by a cotenant is not alone a sufficient basis upon which to establish title as against his co-owner. But, in this case, there are other elements such as the making and taking and recording of deeds and mortgages by the cotenant affecting the whole of the property and the unquestioned retaining of all the rents and profits for a period of more than 20 years after the attaining of the majority of the youngest of the defendants and the placing of valuable improvements upon the property all under a claim of exclusive ownership.

This case, therefore, comes within the rule laid down by our Supreme Court in the case of Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586, 49 Am. Rep. 100; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. 727; Felix v. Felix, 105 Cal. 1, 38 Pac. 521; Packard v. Moss, 68 Cal. 123, 8 Pac. 818, and cases cited in 2 Corpus Juris, 185, par. 355; Alvarado v. Nordholdt, 95 Cal. 119, 30 Pac. 211.

But under the rule laid down in Blair v. Hazzard, supra, as explained in Phelps v. Grady, supra, the title acquired against the heir or his successor by adverse possession cannot be deemed to divest the administrator of the deceased of his power and duty to proceed with and conclude the administration of the estate. To the extent therefore, that the judgment seeks to declare that the defendant administrator has no interest in the property herein which is still a part of the estate, it is erroneous.

The judgment may, therefore, be modified so as to provide that the right, title, and interest of the plaintiff herein is subject only to the right of the defendant administrator to proceed with and conclude the administration of said estate, and, as so modified herein, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. HINSHAW. (Cr. 463.)

1. Jury ⚷131(15)—Question to Jurors on Voir Dire.

In a prosecution for forgery, a ruling sustaining objections to questions propounded by defendant to prospective jurors on their voir dire, relating to changing their votes during deliberation of the jury, and as to taking instructions from the court or from other jurors, held not error.

2. Jury ⚷131(6)—Examination of Jurors—Reason for Asking Question—Bias or Prejudice.

Where counsel for accused asked prospective jurors on their voir dire questions relating to changing their votes during deliberation of the jury, and as to whether they would take instructions from the court or other jurors, he should have stated to the trial court his reasons for asking the questions, if he desired to show bias or prejudice.

3. Criminal Law ⚷369(4)—Evidence of Another Forgery—Indivisible Transactions.

In a prosecution for forgery, evidence of another forgery, appearing as part of defendant's confession to the sheriff of the commission of the crime charged in the information, and so closely connected with the offense charged as to be indivisible therefrom, was admissible.

4. Criminal Law ⚷371(1)—Evidence—Similar Offenses—Intent.

Evidence of other similar offenses is admissible for the purpose of showing guilty intent and rebutting the theory of accident or good faith.

5. Criminal Law ⚷680(1)—Evidence—Order of Introduction.

In a prosecution for forgery, defendant's confession, which also involved the commission of another forgery, may be introduced in evidence before that of any other evidence relating to the checks forged; the order of proof being a matter within discretion of the trial court.

6. Criminal Law ⚷517(3) — Extra Judicial Confessions—Admissibility.

Extra judicial confessions of one accused of forgery alone are not sufficient evidence of forgeries committed by him to render them admissible in evidence.

7. Criminal Law ⚷1169(11)—Harmless Error—Admissibility of Evidence — Other Similar Crimes.

Admission in evidence, in a prosecution for forgery, of another forgery committed by defendant and embodied in his confession to the sheriff, if error, was cured by the later receipt of other evidence in the nature of exemplars of his handwriting, thereby affording a support for a finding that defendant forged the other check.

8. Criminal Law ⚷611—Refusal of Continuance—Grounds.

In a prosecution for forgery, it was not error to refuse continuance on account of absence of a witness for defendant, where no reason was shown why the application was not made at commencement of trial as required by Pen. Code, § 1052, and the affidavit was defective, and it was not shown that the testimony sought would have affected the verdict.

Thomas R. Hinshaw was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Metzler & Mitchell, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. There seems to be no substantial merit in this appeal from a conviction of the crime of forgery. The evidence was amply sufficient to support the verdict. It consisted in part of the confession of the defendant. This was supplemented by the testimony of a witness who positively identified appellant as the one who cashed the check and by the unequivocal denial of the genuineness of the signature by the purported maker or drawer of the instrument. Indeed, appellant does not claim that the verdict lacks sufficient support, but he relies upon certain alleged errors committed by the court in the progress of the trial.

[1] Of these one relates to a ruling sustaining the district attorney's objection to these questions addressed to the prospective jurors on their voir dire:

(a) "Now if you are accepted as a juror and you enter the jury room to deliberate and find a verdict, and you had once voted 'not guilty,' would you then change your vote to one of 'guilty' and if so, why? (b) When you are discussing the evidence and the law after the case has been put in the hands of the jury to deliberate, and you had forgotten some part or parcel of the evidence, or the jurors did not agree upon what is given in evidence, would you accept the statement of the fellow jurors as to what evidence was given, or would you return to the court and have it read from the record? (c) If at any time during your deliberations, if you are accepted as a juror and you are in doubt as to the law given to you by this court, would you then rely upon the statements of your fellow juror as to what the law is as applied to the facts in this case, or would you return to the court and ask the court to further instruct you?"

Without extended consideration of these questions, we may say that it would be apparently difficult for any juror to answer them definitely and intelligently in advance of the contingencies therein suggested. Moreover, it is a fair inference from the remarks of the court that each of the jurors had stated that he would take the instructions as to these matters "from the court and not anybody else." In fact, it does not appear that the subject was not entirely covered by the other questions and answers which are not disclosed by the record.

[2] Besides, if appellant desired to show bias or prejudice, as he now claims, he should have so stated his reason for asking the questions. Furthermore, it appears that he must have been satisfied with the jurors, since he exercised only three of his peremptory challenges, and in view of the principles enunciated in People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 119 Pac. 920, it must be said that, if error in the ruling was committed, it was without prejudice.

[3-5] As to the admission of evidence of another forgery, it first appeared as a part of the confession of appellant of the commission of the crime charged in the information. It was embodied in his voluntarily statement made to the sheriff, and it was so closely connected with the recital as to the main offense that the confession was hardly divisible. At any rate, in this class of cases, evidence of other similar offenses is admissible for the purpose of showing guilty intent and of rebutting the theory of accident or good faith, and it is not a vital consideration that the admission of the confession was prior to the introduction of any other evidence as to said checks. The order of proof is a matter within the discretion of the trial court. People v. Rushing, 130 Cal. 449, 62 Pac. 742, 80 Am. St. Rep. 141.

[6, 7] It is true that extrajudicial confessions of defendant alone would not be sufficient evidence of the forgeries to render them admissible in evidence. People v. Baird, 105 Cal. 126, 38 Pac. 633. And it may be that the court committed a technical error in overruling the objections of appellant as to the other forgery; but other evidence in the nature of exemplars of his handwriting was subsequently received, so that the error, if any, was cured. We are satisfied that thereby a sufficient support was afforded for a finding that appellant forged the other check.

[8] There is some contention that the court committed error in refusing to continue the trial of the case on account of the absence of a witness for appellant. But the application was made after considerable progress had been made in the hearing of the cause, and no reason was shown why it was not made when it was called for trial as the statute requires. Section 1052, Pen. Code. Besides, it was quite apparent that the affidavit was radically defective, as appellant virtually admits. Moreover, the testimony of the witness, if produced, would be simply cumulative, and there is nothing to show that it would have affected the verdict of the jury.

The only other objection is addressed to the action of the court in reference to the instructions. It seems unnecessary to notice specifically the various instructions offered on the part of appellant which were refused by the court.

After an examination of the record, we are prepared to say that appellant suffered no prejudice by reason of the action of the court. The instructions were full and correct. Every principle of law necessary for the guidance of the jury was announced, and there is no ground for just criticism as to any of the proceedings during the trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CAMP v. BOYD. (Civ. 2784.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 6, 1919.)

1. MONEY RECEIVED 🔑17(1)—PLEADING 🔑192(2) — DEMURRER—COMMON COUNT—UNCERTAINTY.

A common count for money had and received is not subject to demurrer for uncertainty.

2. TRIAL 🔑109—ISSUES—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

Where plaintiff in opening statement stated the issue to be whether "at the time that transfer was made, was T. of sound mind; was that transfer obtained by means of undue influence," and where six of grounds in support of nonsuit were directed to undue influence, and only two to unsoundness of mind, the submitting of question of undue influence to jury, after taking from it the question of unsoundness of mind, was not error; defendant being fully informed as to such issue.

3. CONTRACTS 🔑99(2)—UNDUE INFLUENCE—EVIDENCE—MENTAL CONDITION.

Under Civ. Code, § 1575, subd. 2, evidence of mental condition is admissible upon issue of undue influence, where it is claimed that such influence was made possible by reason of weakened mentality from sickness.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1050(1)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In action by daughter, as administratrix of father's estate, against stepmother for money secured by undue influence, statement by daughter that her mother did her own work was not prejudicial to stepmother.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1047(3)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In action involving question of undue influence upon husband by wife and effect thereof upon transfer of money, where witness, asked concerning husband's health, answered: "He never seemed to know exactly what he wanted to do. When we were riding he always rode with me on the front seat because the wind shield protected him a little more. And I had many talks with him while we were riding"—court's refusal to strike out answer as not responsive was not reversible error.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1064(1)—Harmless Error—Instructions.

In action by husband's administratrix against surviving wife for money claimed by wife to have been transferred to her by husband, instructions that in case of intestacy the law fixed method of distribution, that under such law wife and the two daughters would divide estate, and that jury could consider the disposition as being just or otherwise upon question of undue influence, held not prejudicial.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑762—Objections in Reply Brief.

Objections to instructions raised for first time in the reply brief will not be considered.

8. Appeal and Error 🔑1002—Review—Verdict.

Verdict upon conflicting evidence is conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Helen B. Camp, administratrix, against Elizabeth Jewett Boyd. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ramsey Probasco, Robinson & Sizer, and A. B. Harris, all of Oakland, for appellant.

E. S. Page, of Oakland (E. L. Camp, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. Elizabeth Jewett Boyd, widow of Thomas Boyd, appeals from a judgment in favor of the administratrix of his estate for $4,186.50 and costs upon a complaint for money had and received.

Rev. Dr. Boyd, a Presbyterian clergyman, who had had some education as a lawyer, was a widower with two daughters. When his wife died in 1913 he was 65 years old. He had been a sufferer from nervous attacks and experienced a complete nervous breakdown upon her death. Because of his condition in 1914 he went to a sanitarium, where he met the defendant, who was 20 years his junior. In February, 1916, they were married. In October of that year he was stricken with paralysis. After a stroke of apoplexy on August 23, 1917, he died, from what was diagnosed in May of that year as a progressive and incurable disease of the brain, on August 28, 1917. He engaged in no active work after the death of his first wife, and spent a great deal of time between her death and his own in various sanitariums and in hotels under the care of physicians. He attended to certain matters of business, but after his second marriage usually through the mediation of his wife. He attended church when he was able, and certain functions connected with his former activities. In March, 1917, his deposits in several banks were changed to joint accounts in the names of himself and his wife. At the same time one or more separate accounts in the name of the defendant were changed to joint accounts. There was a wide disparity between the amounts in the accounts; there being much more money in his accounts than in hers. Upon his death the defendant withdrew the money from the banks. One daughter, the plaintiff, and the defendant were appointed the administratrices of the estate. The daughter, as administratrix, sued the widow individually for the money so withdrawn from what had been Dr. Boyd's personal bank accounts. The trial was before a jury, and upon its verdict judgment was rendered against the widow.

[1] A general and special demurrer to the complaint was overruled. Upon the contention that a common count must fall before a special demurrer for uncertainty, the appellant relies upon two cases, Shade v. Sissons, etc., Co., 115 Cal. 357, 47 Pac. 135, and Minor v. Baldridge, 123 Cal. 190, 55 Pac. 783. In a later case the question was decided adversely to the appellant's contention. Pike v. Zadig, 171 Cal. 273, 152 Pac. 923. A common count for money had and received is not subject to demurrer for uncertainty.

[2] At the opening of the trial counsel for the plaintiff said the issues had been narrowed down to two: "(1) Did Dr. Boyd make a transfer of the money to Mrs. Boyd?" and (2) "At the time that transfer was made, was Thomas Boyd of sound mind; was that transfer obtained by means of undue influence exerted upon Thomas Boyd by this defendant?" At the close of plaintiff's case a motion for nonsuit was denied, and this is assigned as error. It is argued that by reason of the opening statement the only issue which the defendant was called upon to meet was that of unsoundness of mind, and that the plaintiff wholly failed to produce evidence upon that issue. It is further argued that since the court expressly took from the jury the issue of unsoundness of mind, there was no issue in regard to undue influence. The position of the respondent is that from the opening statement to the close of the trial the plaintiff did not contend nor attempt to prove that Dr. Boyd was insane, but that his mentality was so weakened by sickness that he was subject to the undue influence of the defendant; that this position was clearly understood by the court and by counsel for the defendant; and that the case was tried upon this theory. The character of the grounds upon which motion for nonsuit was based supports this statement of the respondent's position. Nineteen specific grounds were assigned in support of the motion. Only two of them deal with the question of unsoundness of mind. Six of them were expressly directed to the claimed lack of evidence of undue influence. In denying the motion the court said that under all the circumstances testified to, and other testimony to be produced, he would allow the case to go to the jury upon one point only: "Did the defendant exercise undue influence over the decedent?" The argument presented on this point is not that there was no evidence of undue influence, but that there was no such issue. In view of the grounds specified for the motion it does not appear counsel for the appellant was not fully informed regarding that issue. The record shows that at the time the motion was made there was some evidence to support it. The motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

[3-5] Upon the issue of undue influence, the claim being that Dr. Boyd was of weakened mentality by reason of his sickness, evidence of his mental condition was admissible. Civ. Code, § 1575, subd. 2; Estate of Welch, 6 Cal. App. 44, 91 Pac. 336. It is argued the court erred in rulings upon evidence. One instance given in the brief of the appellant fails to show what objection was made, or to refer to the page of the appendix upon which the objection appears. It does not appear, even if proper objection was made, that the jury was, or reasonably could have been, prejudiced by a statement of the plaintiff to the effect that her mother did her own work. The second objection is to the reply to a question addressed to a witness concerning the condition of Dr. Boyd's health. The witness said:

> "He never seemed to know exactly what he wanted to do. When we were riding he always rode with me on the front seat because the wind shield protected him a little more. And I had many talks with him while we were riding."

The attorneys moved to strike the answer out as not responsive. If the refusal of the court was error, it was of such a character as not to warrant the reversal of the judgment.

[6] Objection is made to certain instructions. In one the jury was informed in effect that in case of intestacy, the law fixes the method of distribution, and in this case the law would distribute the estate equally between the surviving wife and the two daughters. Three other instructions were to the effect that the jury might consider the disposition as being just or unjust, reasonable or unreasonable, as tending to throw light upon the question of whether undue influence was exerted upon Dr. Boyd. In the appendix to the appellant's brief a portion only of the instructions is given. From an examination of the typewritten record it appears that the instructions were clear, full, fair, and not unfavorable to the defendant. The instructions attacked were given in connection with other instructions to the effect that while inequality in the disposition of property is not of itself evidence of unsoundness of mind or of undue influence, it might be considered as a circumstance, together with all other circumstances shown by the evidence, bearing on the question of the weakness of mind of the donor at the time the transfer was made, or undue influence exerted upon him at that time. Considered with all other instructions, it cannot be assumed that the defendant was prejudiced by these instructions, nor that the result of the trial would have been different if they had not been given. An instruction in regard to the rule of descent was similarly attacked, and has been upheld by the Supreme Court. Estate of Snowball, 157 Cal. 315, 107 Pac. 598.

[7] In the appellant's reply brief objections to certain other instructions are presented for the first time. The instructions as an entirety appear to have been correct. No reason is shown for considering objections to specific instructions not mentioned in the opening brief. Under such circumstances objections raised first in the reply brief will not be considered. Kahn v. Wilson, 120 Cal. 643, 53 Pac. 24; Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Farnham, 153 Cal. 578, 96 Pac. 9.

[8] It is contended there was not sufficient evidence to support the verdict. The record is lengthy. On one side the evidence pictured an old man, sick and nervous, it is true, but attending to his business affairs, meeting his friends, writing personal letters, and of his own desire making provision for the future welfare of the wife who was assiduous in rendering affectionate attention to him during his sickness. On the other side, the picture is drawn of a man so shattered in mind and body as to be subject, as he expressed it, to brain storms, unable alone to make any decision, not knowing what he wanted, dotingly fond of his daughters, anxious to make provision for them, yet taking from them their patrimony, dominated by the second wife, and prevented by her from discussing privately his business affairs with his daughters or with others. There was some evidence of her direct interposition in his affairs without his knowledge and against his desire, particularly in the matter of an attempt to negotiate a sale of certain corporation stock owned by him, and later, upon the sale failing, to negotiate a loan upon the stock, in order, as it is claimed, that the proceeds of the sale or the loan might be added to the joint bank accounts, which, it was further claimed, were made available to her by reason of an influence so far in excess of that which may properly be exerted by a wife as to be termed undue influence. The most that can be said on behalf of the appellant upon this phase of the case is that the evidence was conflicting, and, therefore, in the absence of reversible error, the verdict of the jury is conclusive.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BLISS. (Cr. 464.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 30, 1919.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑236(1)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for selling, furnishing, distributing, and giving away alcoholic liquors in no-license territory in violation of Local Option Law, circumstantial evidence held to support conviction.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑156 — VIOLATION OF LOCAL OPTION LAW.

Where owner of whisky jug invites others to drink therefrom, and one or more take drink, in no-license territory, he is guilty of violating Local Option Law, though he does not himself perform physical act of passing jug to the parties who take drink.

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑156 — VIOLATION OF LOCAL OPTION LAW—FURNISHING LIQUOR TO OTHERS.

If a party should place a jug or other vessel containing liquor on a table, bench, floor, or ground within no-license territory, and by words, or acts, or conduct sufficiently indicative of the fact invite others to partake thereof, either in a limited degree or ad libitum, he would be guilty of violating the Local Option Law.

4. INTOXICATING LIQUORS 🔑224, 233(1) — CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for furnishing liquor to others in no-license territory, evidence that others had gone over to store where defendant's jug was stored before defendant himself had gone over there was not inadmissible upon ground that defendant did not know his jug had been left at such store until he himself went over; inference being that defendant had told the others to go over to store and help themselves.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1169(1) — REVIEW — HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for furnishing liquor to others in no-license territory, admission of evidence that the others had gone over to store where defendant's jug had been left by his brother before defendant knew jug was there, was harmless, where there was evidence that others had drunk from jug in defendant's presence.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1170½(1) — REVIEW —HARMLESS ERROR—LEADING QUESTIONS.

Leading questions by state to its witness was harmless to defendant where witness was hostile to prosecution and inclined to tell as little as possible.

7. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑413(1) — EVIDENCE — SELF-SERVING DECLARATION.

In prosecution for furnishing liquor to others in no-license territory, evidence as to defendant's statement previous to purchase of liquor to brother who had purchased it that the liquor was to be taken to and used by defendant in his home was inadmissible, being a self-serving declaration.

8. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑720(1)—ARGUMENT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—EVIDENCE.

In prosecution for furnishing liquor to others in no-license territory, district attorney in his argument to jury properly emphasized the circumstance shown by the evidence that defendant's brother, who had bought liquor for defendant, for use, as claimed by defendant, in defendant's home, passed defendant's home with jug and left it at store, from which defendant secured jug and treated friends.

9. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑552(1) — WEIGHT OF CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Where evidence is sufficient to convince jurors, as reasonable men, of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, it is their duty to convict defendant, though evidence is circumstantial.

10. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑784(5)—INSTRUCTIONS —CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE.

Instruction on circumstantial evidence held not subject to objection that it authorized conviction on evidence not sufficiently convincing to show guilt beyond a moral certainty.

11. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1144(15) — REVIEW —PRESUMPTION.

The jury is always presumed to have considered all the evidence submitted to them, whether they acquit or convict defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

J. Bliss was convicted of unlawfully selling, furnishing, distributing, and giving away alcoholic liquors within no-license territory, and from judgment of conviction and from order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

H. L. Ford, of Eureka, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. An information was filed in the superior court of the county of Humboldt, charging that the defendant, on the 5th day of October, 1918, within no-license territory, "did willfully, knowingly, and unlawfully sell, furnish, distribute, and give away alcoholic liquors, to wit, whisky, * * * to George Normile and Dan Rogers and other persons whose names are unknown." Defendant was convicted of the crime charged in the information and was sentenced to pay a fine of $600, or, if the fine be not paid, to be imprisoned in the county jail one day for each $2 of said fine. The appeal is by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The defendant first contends that the evidence does not support the verdict.

It was stipulated at the trial that the town of Pepperwood, in Humboldt county, was in "no-license territory."

The evidence shows that the defendant lived with his brother, Daniel Bliss, and his sister in a house on the road to Eureka about one mile from the store of one Zecca in Pepperwood, and that defendant always kept intoxicating liquors at his home for his own use. On the 5th day of October, 1918, his supply of whisky being exhausted, he gave some money to his brother, Daniel, who was going to Eureka, with which to buy a gallon of whisky, and told him to leave it at the house; that he bought the whisky to be used at his home. Daniel Bliss bought a gallon demijohn of whisky at Eureka, put it in a suit case belonging to defendant, and in the afternoon started home on a stage. At the town of Loleta he got off the stage, but left the suit case on it. The driver of the stage, when he reached Zecca's store at Pepperwood, left the suit case there, which was the customary place where he left parcels for people in that locality. Daniel Bliss took passage on another stage and arrived at Pepperwood between 9 and 10 o'clock that night.

Defendant reached his home at about 5 o'clock in the evening and saw the stage go by his house, but it did not stop. At about 8 o'clock he attended a dance, at a hall across the street from Zecca's store, in Pepperwood, and his brother, Daniel, also went to the dance when he arrived in town. Defendant asked him if he had sent the whisky, and Daniel said he had, but did not know whether it had been left at the store or not. At about 11 o'clock of that night defendant asked Zecca if there had been a suit case left there for him by the stage driver. Zecca answered that there had, and that, if defendant wanted it, he had better take it, because he (Zecca) was going to close up for the night, and they went over to the store. The only light in the store was a flashlight which Zecca had. Defendant took the demijohn out of the suit case and went out on the porch of the store. He there met Dan Rogers, whom he recognized by his voice, it being a dark night. There were others present whom he did not recognize. Later he recognized Normile by his voice. He stopped to talk with Rogers, set his jug on the porch, and commenced rolling a cigarette.

Up to this point there is no conflict in the evidence, except that the arresting officer, Frank W. Anderson, testified that it was a moonlight night. As to this, the witness was evidently mistaken, for the weather observer at Eureka testified that the moon set that night at 5:34 p. m. Anderson testified that at 11 o'clock at night on the 5th of October, 1918, he saw four or five men, among them the defendant, upon the platform in front of Zecca's store. He said:

> "When I first saw him he was in the act of getting that demijohn from George Normile, and I stepped up and grabbed the demijohn and asked him who that belonged to. He said, 'It belongs to me.'"

The witness said he took the demijohn from the hands of defendant, that he put a seal on it and gave it to the district attorney, and that afterwards he sampled the contents, and found that the demijohn contained whisky. He stated that before he seized the demijohn he saw two men drink from it, one of whom he recognized as George Normile; that the other man smacked his lips and said it was "damned good stuff."

William McKay, an employé of the district attorney of Humboldt county, who was with Anderson at and prior to the time of the arrest, corroborated the latter as to what occurred at the time he took possession of the demijohn.

Ambrose M. Zecca, the owner of the store referred to, testified that he had gone from the dance hall to his store with other men 10 or 15 times that night; that he saw defendant, who said he wanted to go to the store and get his suit case. He was asked what defendant's condition as to sobriety was, and he replied that he "was feeling pretty good." Witness, with defendant and Normile and some strangers, among them Dan Rogers, went to the store. Defendant and Normile went in with him, and defendant got a demijohn from the suit case and took it outside with him. Witness said he had a drink from a jug, but would not say it was the one defendant had; that he was not present when Anderson came up.

Dan Rogers testified that he left the dance hall with defendant to go to the store; that he knew they were going for a drink, although he would not say defendant asked him to go for that purpose; the defendant entered the store and came out with a demijohn; that the jug was passed around, but he would not say that defendant passed it around; that he (witness) had a drink out of a jug, but did not know who handed it to him nor whose jug it was.

George Normile testified that at about 11 o'clock, while in the dance hall, he said to defendant that he wanted to have a glass of beer or something, to which defendant replied that he "did not have any beer; maybe we can find something else"; that they waited until Dan Rogers finished dancing, and the three of them, with some strangers, went across to the store; that defendant went into the store and brought a demijohn out onto the porch; that witness was in the act of taking a drink out of the jug when Anderson's party turned a flashlight on them and came up to the porch.

Edward Bady testified that at the dance hall he smelled liquor upon the defendant; that he was one of the party that crossed the street to the store; that he did not have a drink out of the demijohn, because it did not get around to him; that he saw the defendant pass the jug to some one.

The defendant testified that a man had treated him to whisky before the occurrence at Zecca's store; that when he took the demijohn from the store to the porch he had no drink from the jug that he remembered of; that after he had finished making his cigarette he picked up the jug, and at that time the officer flashed a light upon him and came up; that he had not offered the jug to any one for the purpose of taking a drink; that he did not give his consent to any one taking a drink out of it; and that he did not know the demijohn was making the rounds and that people were drinking from it. He denied having the conversation related by Normile to the effect that defendant told Normile he did not know where there was any beer, but that he had something else.

[1-3] The foregoing synoptical statement of the evidence plainly enough shows that the verdict is sufficiently supported. It is true that much of the evidence was of a circumstantial character, but the circumstances so shown, having been accepted by the jury as proved, were enough to warrant the inference that the defendant owned the jug of whisky; that he invited the parties above named to the store where the jug was to drink therefrom; and that one or more did drink from the jug. Whether actually the defendant himself performed the physical act of passing the jug to all the parties who drank from it or to any of them, in view of the persuasive character of the evidence or the circumstances in support of the theory of guilt, is immaterial. If he by any means or method or in any manner gave or furnished or distributed intoxicating liquor to other persons within no-license territory, he is guilty under the statute. If, for illustration, a party should place a jug or other vessel containing liquor on a table or upon a bench or upon the floor or the ground within no-license territory, and by words or acts or conduct sufficiently indicative of the fact invited others to partake thereof either in a limited degree or ad libitum, he would be guilty under the law as it is written of furnishing intoxicating liquor to others within such territory.

The testimony shows that the defendant owned a jug of whisky which was at Zecca's store, and that he invited several friends to go to the store to get a drink of "something else than beer"; that defendant secured the jug from the store; and that one or two persons drank from it. This testimony falls very little, if any, short of conclusively showing the guilt of the accused under the Local Option Law.

It is next claimed that the court committed prejudicial error in certain rulings on evidence.

Several witnesses were asked as to whether, prior to the time the defendant went to the store, other parties had gone over there. These questions were objected to by counsel for defendant, but the testimony was admitted upon the promise of the district attorney to "connect it up." One of the witnesses replied that he had seen several parties go to the store before the defendant was seen there, and heard one of them remark that it was "damned good stuff." Appellant complains that it was not connected with defendant; that the inference drawn by the district attorney was that these other parties had gone to the store to drink the liquor defendant had there, but that defendant did not know the liquor was there until 11 o'clock, when the storekeeper told him it was.

[4, 5] The objection to this testimony goes more to its weight than to its materiality, relevancy, and competency. It was shown that defendant had requested his brother, Daniel, to procure the whisky for him, and it is a reasonable inference from all the circumstances that he expected it to be left at Zecca's store; he having asked the latter if a suit case in which the whisky had been carried by Daniel had been left at his (Zecca's) store. Of course, the parties referred to might have gone to the store to eat Swiss cheese and crackers or some other article not thus far prohibited to the use of man by the stern mandates of the law, and the party who made such favorable comment upon the quality of the article they had partaken of might have had reference to something other than intoxicating liquor, but this was for the jury to determine when considering it in connection with the evidence showing that the defendant did have whisky at the store and that several persons did subsequently drink from the jug in the defendant's presence. The ultimate significance of the testimony was in the inference to be deduced therefrom that the defendant had told said parties that he had the whisky at the store and that they were at liberty to go to the store and help themselves to it. It is true that the circumstance was of small probative value as in proof of the charge, but, as suggested in a different form of language, this did not render it inadmissible. It is quite manifest, though, that even if we were required to hold that it was improperly admitted, it could not have prejudiced the defendant, since it is very clear that the verdict resulted from the testimony showing that certain parties did drink from the jug in the defendant's presence and that the jug then contained whisky.

[6, 7] Defendant complains of some other rulings respecting the evidence, the objections being that by them the court permitted the district attorney to ask one of his witnesses leading questions and to ask questions upon the assumption that certain facts not in proof had in fact been shown. Also it is objected that the court erred in refusing to permit Dan Bliss, who testified for the defendant, and who, as seen, purchased and had left at Zecca's store the whisky for defendant, to testify as to whether the defendant, previously to the purchase, said to the witness anything "about your obtaining some whisky for his (defendant's) home." The defendant could not have suffered any damage from the leading questions referred to. The witness to whom they were put was one of the parties who were with the accused when whisky was drunk from his jug, and he appeared to be hostile to the prosecution —that is, inclined to tell as little as he actually knew of the matter as possible. A witness in that attitude of mind toward the party calling him would not be likely to tell an untrue story favorable to such party merely because questions suggestive of his answers were propounded to him. The objection to the question by defendant's counsel to Daniel Bliss calling for a declaration by defendant that the liquor he requested said Daniel to procure for him was to be taken to and used at his (defendant's) home was properly sustained on the ground that it was self-serving.

There are very many other assignments involving challenges to the soundness of rulings upon the evidence, but an examination of these has convinced us that they possess no force.

[8] The objection that the district attorney, in his argument to the jury, transcended the record, and thus brought into it matters calculated to prejudice the defendant, is not well taken. This objection arises from the reference to by that officer and his emphasis of the circumstance that, although the stage on which Daniel Bliss carried the suit case containing the jug of whisky passed near the home of the defendant, the whisky was not left there, but taken on to the store of Zecca. This was an important circumstance, was shown by the evidence to have occurred, and, of course, the district attorney was clearly within his rights in making the most out of it in argument that the circumstance would legitimately justify.

In its instructions the court, after explaining the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence, told the jury:

> "There is nothing in the nature of circumstantial evidence that renders it any less reliable than the other class of evidence. All that is required is this: if the testimony is sufficient to convince you as reasonable men beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did commit the act charged, then I charge you that it is your duty to convict, although such evidence may be of a circumstantial nature."

Appellant claims that this instruction was not warranted by the facts in the case, and that it implied "that the jury may act on less than convincing evidence or without the moral certainty required by law."

[9-11] The instruction was not only pertinent to the evidence, but it contains a correct statement of the law. Nor does it warrant the implication that the jury were authorized to convict on evidence not sufficiently convincing to show the defendant's guilt to a moral certainty. Of course, the objection that the instruction implies that the jury may "act on less than convincing evidence" really means nothing; for it is the duty of a jury to act on (or consider) all the evidence submitted to them, and this they always presumptively do whether they convict or acquit.

The following instruction, given to the jury, is also complained of:

> "I instruct you that it is not necessary that the evidence should show that the defendant personally handed this demijohn of whisky, if such it was, to George Normile, Dan Rogers or any other person who then and there drank thereof, to warrant you in finding the defendant guilty of the charge alleged in the information; but it is enough if the evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant owned a demijohn of whisky and placed it in a public place and in the immediate presence of said men, with the intention that they should drink thereof, and that they or one or more of them did drink thereof or that the defendant stood in their immediate presence and saw said men, or some of them, drink thereof, and encouraged or asked them to drink thereof."

That instruction corresponds with the construction above given of the Local Option Law upon which the information against the accused is based, and therefore nothing more need be said about it.

The court modified two instructions proposed by the defendant—one defining the word "gift" and the other defining the word "distribute"—by adding thereto substantially the language which the instruction last above considered contained, which, in effect, is as follows: That if the defendant knew that any person or persons were drinking or did drink from the jug in question, and, so knowing that fact, acquiesced in, consented to, or encouraged such person or persons to drink from said jug, in that case he would be guilty, although he did not personally hand or deliver said jug to such person or persons. What we have said of the complaint against the instruction last above disposed of applies to the objection to the one in hand.

We have now considered herein all the objections against the result arrived at below which in our judgment call for special notice, and our conclusion is that no substantial legal reason has been shown for disturbing the verdict.

The judgment and the order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

CONLIN v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 21, 1919. Rehearing Denied May 19, 1919; Denied by Supreme Court June 19, 1919.)

1. TRIAL 🔑40(2)—SETTLEMENT OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—EXTENSION OF TIME—DISQUALIFICATION OF JUDGE.

Where the judge of the superior court who originally tried the case on request of plaintiff called in another judge to retry it, after such retrial by such other judge the first judge was not disqualified to extend the time within which defendant appellant might prepare and serve its proposed bill of exceptions, so that, though the extension carried the time beyond the period limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 650, the order of extension was not void and the bill was properly presented and settled.

2. RAILROADS 🔑69—DEED OF RIGHT OF WAY—CONSTRUCTION.

Deed to a railroad, conveying to it an estate limited during company's legal existence at the expiration of which the lands should revert, held not to convey a fee on condition subsequent, though it created certain conditions subsequent, but rather to grant an estate or easement limited for years and not in fee.

3. DEEDS 🔑143—CONVEYANCE OF REVERSIONARY INTEREST.

Deed of land wherein an easement for years had previously been conveyed by the grantor's predecessor to a railroad for the term of corporate existence, after which land should revert, held to convey to the grantee land company the reversionary interest reserved by the grantor's predecessor from the railroad.

4. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑268—RAILROADS 🔑64(1)—RIGHT OF WAY—CONTRACTS.

Railroad corporations may contract with reference to land taken by them for rights of way, and such agreements, when made, stand on the same footing as any other contract for the conveyance of land, though where land has been taken without compensation, and its continued possession is necessary to the public use, the owner cannot recover the land itself, but can only compel payment, and his right to compensation is a personal one not running with the land nor passing by conveyance.

5. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑69—RAILROADS 🔑72(1)—RIGHT OF WAY—ACCEPTANCE OF CONVEYANCE—CONDITION.

A railroad may accept a conveyance of land on any condition that lawfully may be annexed to an ordinary grant, and such a contract may create an estate less than a fee in land taken for a right of way, in which case, if, at the expiration of the estate granted, the land is necessary for the railroad for its purposes, it can continue its use for a right of way by compensating the reversioner, but otherwise must abandon and surrender possession to the reversioner.

6. EMINENT DOMAIN 🔑285—RAILROAD RIGHT OF WAY—EXPIRATION OF TERM OF YEARS—DUTY TO COMPENSATE.

Where the owner of land conveyed to a railroad an easement for years for a right of way, and the grantee railroad was succeeded by another, such other road was a privy to the contract between the grantor and its predecessor to subject it to the duty to compensate the grantor for its continued use of the right of way after expiration of the term of years for which the grant was made.

7. PLEADING 🔑274—"SUPPLEMENTAL COMPLAINT"—NATURE.

A complaint, or a complaint as amended, and a supplemental complaint, must be considered as separate pleadings, the office of the "supplemental complaint" being merely to bring to the notice of the court and the opposite party matters occurring after the commencement of action and which may affect the rights asserted and the rule originally asked.

8. EVIDENCE 🔑158(15) — FORFEITURE OF CHARTER—PROOF BY PAROL.

In an action by a landowner against a railroad to recover the value of land, easement in which for a right of way was conveyed to the railroad's predecessor for a term of years, testimony of a deputy of the secretary of state, that he had made due search of the records of the office of the secretary and found that no franchise tax had been paid by the railroad's predecessor for a particular year, was incompetent to show forfeiture of the charter of such predecessor.

9. TRIAL 🔑251(1) — INSTRUCTION — IRRELEVANT ISSUE.

The refusal of the trial court to instruct on a question which was irrelevant to any issue of the case was correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; John L. Hudner, Judge.

Action by Henry Conlin against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 182 Pac. 71.

Frank McGowan and Evan J. Foulds, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry Conlin, Chas. W. Cobb, and B. V. Sargent, all of San Francisco, and Jos. J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This action was brought by the East San Mateo Land Company, a corporation, to recover from defendant the sum of $77,800, the alleged value of about four acres of land used as a portion of the right of way of the defendant corporation. The defendant, after answering plaintiff's amended complaint, moved for judgment on the pleadings, which motion the trial court granted. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of the defendant, and the East San Mateo Land Company appealed from such judgment. On the appeal, the judgment was reversed. East San Mateo Land Co. v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., 30 Cal. App. 223, 157 Pac. 634.

After the case was remanded, the present plaintiff was substituted for the East San Mateo Land Company, by an amended and supplemental complaint, and the case proceeded to trial, before a court and jury, on the issues raised by the pleadings. A verdict was rendered in favor of plaintiff for $23,340, which judgment was duly entered. In due time, the defendant made a motion for a new trial, upon various grounds set forth in the motion. Subsequently, an order was made that defendant's motion for a new trial be granted, unless plaintiff within 10 days, in writing, remit all of the judgment in excess of $15,560, and that, if plaintiff should remit the sum of $7,780 from the judgment within said 10 days, the motion for a new trial would be denied. Within the time allowed, plaintiff filed with the clerk of the court, and served on defendant, a statement of remission in compliance with the order of the court. Defendant appeals from the judgment. The evidence is brought here by a bill of exceptions.

[1] A preliminary objection made by respondent demands our first attention. After this case was remanded on the former appeal, the judge of the superior court of San Mateo county, who had theretofore presided without objection from any one, so far as the record discloses, was requested by plaintiff to, and did, call in another judge to retry the case. The judge so called in conducted the trial and all subsequent proceedings, except that the judge of the county made an order after the trial, extending the time of defendant within which to prepare and serve its proposed bill of exceptions. This extension carried the time beyond the period limited by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure for such purpose. Respondent now claims that the judge who signed the order extending time was in fact disqualified, that, consequently, the order was void, and therefore, no bill of exceptions having been presented and settled within the time allowed by law, there is nothing before this court for review, other than the matters contained in the judgment roll.

This whole matter was presented to the lower court on objections by respondent to the settlement of the bill of exceptions which were overruled. It does not appear in any manner that the judge who presided at the first trial was, as a matter of fact, disqualified to preside at the second. It does appear, however, that plaintiff served on defendant a notice of motion and affidavit of disqualification which he had prepared. Neither the notice nor the affidavit were ever filed in court, or called to the attention of the judge, or used for any purpose, and were afterwards, by notice served on defendant, actually withdrawn by plaintiff. The first trial judge appears to have merely retired from the actual trial of the case, because of an intimation that he was persona non grata to plaintiff.

By what color of right or reason, on the record as brought before us, plaintiff endeavored to prevent the settlement of the bill of exceptions in the lower court, or its consideration here, we are at a loss to understand.

We are satisfied with the lower court's rulings in the matter.

The San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company, the predecessor of the defendant, was incorporated under the laws of the state of California, on August 18, 1860, for the term of 50 years, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, and operating a line of railroad between the city and county of San Francisco, and the city of San Jose. On the 6th day of June, 1862, Alvinza Hayward, then the owner in fee simple of the land here involved, in consideration of encouraging and promoting the construction of such railroad, and of the location and establishment of a way station, and performance of other conditions mentioned, conveyed to said San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company, and its successors, an estate in said land, limited during "the legal existence of said company," and which deed provided that, upon the breach by the said railroad company, or its successors, "of any of the aforesaid conditions, this grant shall become void, and the estate conveyed hereby, to the said party of the second part, and their successors, shall cease and determine, and the said lands shall absolutely revert to the said party of the first part, his said heirs and assigns, in fee simple, as on his former estate therein, and shall in like manner, at the expiration of the legal existence of said company, revert to said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns, anything hereinbefore contained, to the contrary, notwithstanding."

The first point made by appellant, on this appeal, is that this deed from Hayward to its predecessor had the effect to convey a fee in the land to the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company, and that such fee was upon a condition subsequent, that is to say, that the grantee took title in the fee during its legal existence, only to be divested thereof by some subsequent act, or event, to wit, the ceasing of the legal existence of the grantee; that, the land being held upon a condition subsequent, it required some act on the part of the person entitled to take advantage of the forfeiture; that there has been no act of Hayward, or of any of his grantees, indicative of a purpose to claim by reason of a breach of condition subsequent; that the legal title to the land, therefore, was not in plaintiff's assignor after the breach or the time of the commencement of the action.

Furthermore, the appellant contends that the grant in question, being made to the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company "during the legal existence of said company, and reverting in like manner at the expiration of the legal existence of said company," and the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company having been consolidated with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company on the 11th day of October, 1870, the legal existence of the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company terminated at that moment, and therefore the plaintiff's claim is stale and barred by the various provisions of the statute of limitations.

[2] The effect of this deed was before this court on the former appeal. (East San Mateo Land Co. v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co., supra), where many of the objections now presented on this appeal were urged on the attention of the court. While the effect of the document as evidentiary matter was not then being considered, the provisions of the deed were given interpretation, and the court said:

> "No question is here presented of a breach of any condition subsequent. The right here claimed is based upon the estate in reversion to take effect in possession on the expiration of the particular estate granted by the deed. There is a broad distinction between this right and one based upon forfeiture and re-entry for breach of a condition subsequent. Board of Chosen Freeholders v. Buck, 79 N. J. Eq. 472, 82 Atl. 418. The deed in question, it is true, created certain conditions subsequent, and provided upon a breach of any of the conditions that the estate conveyed should cease and determine; but, as we have seen, it also contained the additional clause: 'And shall in like manner at the expiration of the legal existence of said company revert to said party of the first part, his heirs or assigns, anything herein contained to the contrary notwithstanding.' Nothing could be added to more clearly express the intention of the grantor.
> " 'The language of a contract is to govern its interpretation, if the language is clear and explicit, and does not involve an absurdity.' Civ. Code, § 1638. It seems plain to us, therefore, that the duration of the estate or easement granted was definite and precise, and was one limited for years and not in fee. Robinson v. Missisquoi R. R. Co., 59 Vt. 426, 10 Atl. 522; Barnett v. Barnett, 104 Cal. 298, 37 Pac. 1049; Weller v. Brown, 160 Cal. 515, 117 Pac. 517; Burnett v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 178, 86 Pac. 603; 14 Cyc. 1161; Pavkovich v. Southern Pac. Co., 150 Cal. 39, 87 Pac. 1097."

It further appears from the complaint and the evidence that on the 8th day of September, 1908, Emma Rose, then owner, by mesne conveyances from said Hayward, of the land here involved, which was subject to the estate conveyed by Hayward to the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company, she being the owner, and entitled to all of the interest, estate in remainder, and reversion, in the said real property so reserved by Hayward in the deed of June 6, 1862, sold and conveyed to the East San Mateo Land Company all her right, title, and interest in and to the real property, and in and to the interest, estate in remainder, and reversion therein reserved. Appellant contends that by this deed the land company did not become the owner of the land under the Emma Rose deed.

[3] This same deed was likewise before this court on the former appeal, where, "taking it by its four corners," it was said (without here quoting the reasons therein given for the opinion):

> "Equally clear is the intention of the grantor, Emma Rose, in the character and quantity of the estate conveyed by her to the East San Mateo Land Company, the plaintiff. * * * There can be no question as to the intention of Emma Rose to convey to plaintiff by her deed the reversionary interest reserved by Hayward from the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company and to which she had succeeded. Such intention is clearly expressed in the explanatory clause just quoted. The reservation of the 21 excepted parcels was beyond all doubt for the purpose of saving herself harmless from any liability upon the warranties implied from the form of her deed, in view of the previous conveyance of different parcels or interests once forming a part of the tract covered by her present conveyance, and perhaps also because it was deemed that this was the simplest and most convenient manner to describe the land to be conveyed. That she intended to convey all of the right, title, and interest that she owned in the land is plainly evident." 30 Cal. App. 223, 157 Pac. 634.

The next point urged by the appellant upon this appeal was, in substance and effect, urged before, to wit, that as Alvinza Hayward, the owner of the land described in the amended complaint at the time of the entry by his grantee, was entitled to damages, which right was his personal property, such right has not passed to any grantee or successor of Hayward by reason of the conveyance of the real property. We do not understand this to be an action for damages, accruing at the time the land was taken, but rather an action by the reversioner to recover compensation for the appropriation and the continued use and occupation by defendant of the land after the expiration of the estate granted.

[4, 5] We quote from our former decision:

> "It is true that where land has been taken for a public use without compensation being first made, and its continued possession is necessary to such use, the owner cannot recover possession of the land itself, but can only compel payment for the same, and that the right to compensation accrues at the time the land is taken, and belongs to the owner at the time of the taking; also that this right to compensation is a personal one which does not run with the land, nor does it pass by conveyance thereof after the right accrues. These doctrines, however, in no way affect or abridge the right of railroad corporations to enter into a binding obligation or contract with reference to land taken by them for rights of way, and such agreements when made stand on the same footing as any other contract for the conveyance of land. Lewis on Eminent Domain (3d Ed.) §§ 462, 464. In such cases public policy does not enter into it, nor is it at all concerned with the private contracts of railroads unless they interfere with the public welfare. 2 Elliott on Railroads (2d Ed.) 934. A railroad, therefore, may accept a conveyance of land upon any condition that may lawfully be annexed to an ordinary grant; and such a contract may create an estate less than a fee in land taken for a right of way. The contract here provided for a limited estate only. If at the expiration of the estate granted the land was necessary for the railroad for railroad purposes, and the corporation or its successor elected to continue its use for a right of way, it could do so by compensating the reversioner. Otherwise it must abandon this portion of its right of way and surrender possession to the owner of the estate in reversion. Pool v. Butler, 141 Cal. 46–49, 74 Pac. 444; McCowen v. Pew, 153 Cal. 735, 744, 15 Ann. Cas. 630, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 800, 96 Pac. 893; Gurnsey v. Northern California Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185, 117 Pac. 906. If it elected to continue in the use after the eighteenth day of August, 1910, the time limited by the grant, the owner of the estate in reversion was entitled to compensation at that time."

[6] Our former decision, to the effect that, "if at the expiration of the estate granted the land was necessary * * * for railroad purposes, and the corporation or its successors elected to continue its use for a right of way, it could do so by compensating the reversioner," disposes of appellant's next contention, that defendant in the present action was not a privy to the contract between Hayward and the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company.

[7] Appellant contends that in the supplemental complaint there is no allegation of nonpayment; that, by reason of this failure to allege that defendant did not pay the present plaintiff, no cause of action is stated. Appellant fails to note the distinction between a complaint (or one as amended) and a supplemental complaint. They are to be considered as separate pleadings, the office of the supplemental complaint being merely to bring to the notice of the court, and the opposite party, matters which occurred after the commencement of the action, and which do, or may, affect the rights asserted, and the rule asked in the action, as originally instituted. California, etc., Co. v. Schiappa-Pietra, 151 Cal. 742, 91 Pac. 593. The only new matter set up in the supplemental complaint related to the assignment, by which the substituted plaintiff became entitled to maintain this action, and obtain the relief demanded in the action, as originally instituted, which was compensation for the property held by defendant. An examination of the record, however, discloses that in both the amended and supplemental complaints there is a sufficient allegation of nonpayment.

The various assignments by which plaintiff became substituted as plaintiff in the action are sufficiently pleaded. As the only effect of these instruments was to enable plaintiff, after substitution, to maintain the action in accordance with the relief therein sought, we do not need to give further consideration thereto.

[8, 9] The defendant in the court below sought to show forfeiture of the charter of the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company, in the year 1905, by reason of the failure of the corporation to pay its franchise tax for that year. It called a deputy of the secretary of state, who testified that he had made due search of the records in the office of the secretary of state for the purpose, and found that no tax had been paid by the corporation for that year. On motion of the plaintiff, this testimony was subsequently stricken out. The testimony was incompetent for the purpose offered, and was properly excluded from the record. Kehrlein-Swinerton Const. Co. v. Rapken, 30 Cal. App. 11, 156 Pac. 972. In view of the decision of this court, on the former appeal, and our present holding, relative to the effect of the Hayward deed, the evidence was irrelevant to any issue of the case. The subsequent refusal of the court to instruct the jury on the question of the forfeiture of the franchise by the company in question was correct. What has heretofore been said in this opinion sufficiently answers the point, made by appellant, that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict and that the court committed error in the admission of evidence.

Appellant makes some 16 specifications of error in the action of the trial court in giving and refusing certain instructions. We have carefully examined each of these specifications and considered the argument in support thereof. We find no merit in any of them. The charge as given, considered as a whole, was a complete and fair statement of the law in the case. The instructions refused were not proper.

The other points made upon the appeal are incident to the questions discussed in this opinion, and have been disposed of by what we have already said.

The judgment is affirmed.

CONLIN v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN ⚷253(3)—APPEAL FROM JUDGMENT ON AWARD.

Where judgment in eminent domain was entered on a verdict in favor of the landowner which was general and did not fix the value of the land or the interest thereon, but fixed the total amount of damage, the landowner, if dissatisfied therewith, had a direct remedy by motion for new trial or by appeal.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷154(1)—RIGHT TO APPEAL—WAIVER.

If a person voluntarily acquiesces in or recognizes the validity of a judgment, or otherwise takes a position inconsistent with the right to appeal therefrom, he impliedly waives his right to have such judgment reviewed by the appellate court, although to bar the right of appeal on the ground of acquiescence the acts must clearly show the same.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷154(4)—RIGHT OF APPEAL—WAIVER.

Where a landowner, whose property had been taken under the exercise of eminent domain, after recovering a general verdict which did not provide for interest, filed a remittitur, when the trial court ordered a new trial unless part of the recovery be remitted, held, that he waived his right to appeal on the ground the judgment did not provide for interest on the damages awarded.

Action by Henry Conlin against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry Conlin, Charles W. Cobb, and B. V. Sargent, all of San Francisco, and Jos. J. Bullock, of Redwood City, for appellant.

Frank McGowan and Evan J. Foulds, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment entered herein upon the verdict of a jury. A full statement of the facts out of which the litigation accrued, together with a consideration of the law therein involved, will be found in Conlin v. Southern Pacific Railroad Co. (No. 2681), 182 Pac. 67, this day decided. Appellant's complaint on this appeal arises out of the action of the trial court in refusing to instruct the jury that compensation for the land appropriated should include interest on the value of the property from August 19, 1910, the date of its appropriation by respondent here (appellant in the other appeal), and the like refusal of the court to include interest in the judgment entered on the general finding of the jury awarding damages in a lump sum to plaintiff.

The court properly instructed the jury that, in considering the value of the land, and fixing the amount of compensation which the plaintiff was entitled to recover, such value was to be determined as of the time of the taking of the property by the defendant, to wit, at the expiration of the legal existence of the San Francisco & San Jose Railroad Company, and not as of the time of the trial, or other time subsequent to the time of the taking. The just compensation, to which plaintiff was entitled, the court instructed the jury, was the fair and reasonable market value of the land at that time, to wit, the highest price in terms of money which the land would bring, if exposed for sale in the open market, with reasonable time allowed in which to find a purchaser, buying with knowledge of all the uses and purposes to which it was adapted, and for which it was capable of being used.

Plaintiff requested the court to instruct the jury that such just compensation "is the fair and reasonable market value of said land, on the 19th day of August, 1910, with interest thereon at the legal rate of 7 per cent. per annum, since said date to the date of the rendition of your verdict." This instruction the court refused.

After deliberation, the jury returned into court with their verdict, which, in form, found in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the amount of his recovery at $6,000 per acre for the 3.89 acres of land involved in the action. The court thereupon instructed the jury to again retire, and change the form of their verdict, by multiplying the number of acres by the amount per acre which they found to be the value of the land, and return a verdict for the aggregate amount. The jury did as directed. The verdict of the jury was as follows:

> "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find for the plaintiff and award him damages in the sum of twenty-three thousand three hundred and forty dollars ($23,340.00) which he should recover from the defendant."

Before the jury was discharged, plaintiff moved the court to allow interest on the said verdict at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 19th day of August, 1910, and to direct the clerk to enter the same in the judgment to be entered upon said verdict. This motion the court denied, and judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict, and did not include any allowance of interest.

Defendant made a motion for a new trial, and the court made an order that a new trial be granted, unless plaintiff would, within 10 days, in writing, remit all of the judgment in excess of $15,560, in which case the motion for a new trial would be denied. In compliance with that order, plaintiff remitted the sum of $7,780 from the amount of the judgment entered upon the verdict. The defendant appealed, and the judgment has this day been affirmed by this court.

Plaintiff, on this appeal, does not challenge the action of the trial court in reducing the amount of the judgment, as a condition to denial of a new trial, but merely seeks to have this court remand the cause with directions to the court below to modify the judgment by including interest on the amount of the judgment. Under the authorities, this court, no doubt, has the power to make such an order, provided plaintiff is entitled to interest as prayed for here, and has not by some act of his own estopped himself from seeking such relief. Hurst v. Webster, 128 Wis. 342, 107 N. W. 666; Young v. Winkley, 191 Mass. 570, 78 N. E. 377; People v. California Safe Deposit & Trust Co., 34 Cal. App. 269, 167 Pac. 181.

[1] From the record it appears, as before stated, that the jury first returned a verdict, "which in form found in favor of the plaintiff, and assessed the amount of his recovery at six thousand dollars per acre" for the land involved in the action. The court instructed the jury to retire and change the form of the verdict "by multiplying the number of acres by the amount per acre which they found to be the value of the land." The verdict, which was received and entered, awarded plaintiff "damages in the sum of twenty-three thousand three hundred and forty dollars, which he should recover from the defendant." This general verdict made no mention of either value of the land, or interest thereon, but fixed the amount of damages to which plaintiff was entitled. The judgment which was entered in plaintiff's favor followed the finding of the jury. If plaintiff was dissatisfied with it, he had a direct remedy by motion for new trial, or by appeal.

[2, 3] Respondent contends that, as plaintiff remitted a portion of the amount allowed by the general verdict of the jury, which awarded him damages in the sum specified, he thereby consented to the judgment as entered, was bound thereby, and should not be allowed to appeal therefrom. Plaintiff contends that he only consented under the duress of having a new trial granted, if he did not comply with the order of the court, and that he cannot be held to have acquiesced. He contents himself on this appeal with the following citation:

> "In order to bar the right of appeal on the ground of acquiescence, 'the acts relied upon must be such as to clearly and unmistakably show acquiescence, and it must be unconditional, voluntary, and absolute. And where a judgment or decree relates to two or more distinct matters or demands, acquiescence therein as to one of such matters or demands will not bar an appeal as to the others.' 3 C. J. 665, 666; Coffman v. Bushard, 164 Cal. 663, 130 Pac. 425." Duncan v. Duncan, 175 Cal. 693, 167 Pac. 141.

In the same eminent authority on which the appellant relies, and on the same pages from which the Supreme Court quotes as above, will be found the following:

> "If a person voluntarily acquiesces in, or recognizes the validity of a judgment, order, or decree, or otherwise takes a position which is inconsistent with the right to appeal therefrom, he thereby impliedly waives his right to have such judgment, order, or decree reviewed by an appellate court. * * * As a general rule, if a trial court imposes terms as the condition upon which * * * any order will be granted, or any other thing done or not done, and the party upon whom the terms are imposed accepts them, he will be deemed to have acquiesced in the ruling and cannot afterward question its validity in the appellate court." Corpus Juris, supra.
> "Where a motion for a new trial is granted to go into effect unless plaintiff stipulates to reduce the verdict, in which event the motion is denied, plaintiff by giving the stipulation and entering judgment thereon waives his right to appeal, although he entered the remittitur under protest and the court may have been wrong in finding that the judgment was excessive." 3 Corpus Juris, par. 546, note (d), p. 672, and cases cited.
> "Filing the remittitur * * * amounted to an acceptance * * * and a consent to such a judgment. It was tantamount to an agreement that all alleged errors were waived and the case settled on the proposed basis of a judgment" for $15,560, with costs and disbursements. Plinsky v. Nolan, 65 Or. 402, 133 Pac. 71.
> "The right to accept the fruits of a judgment or order, and the right to appeal therefrom, are not concurrent, but are wholly inconsistent, and an election of either is a waiver and renunciation of the other." San Bernardino v. Riverside, 135 Cal. 618, 67 Pac. 1047.

It is only in case there is no controversy as to a party's right to the amount for which the judgment was given, but he claims to be entitled to a greater amount, that he may accept the fruits of such order or judgment, and appeal therefrom. Such controversy existed during all the progress of the present case. The court, by its order, held that plaintiff was entitled to no judgment except upon the condition that he reduce the amount of the award of the jury. By doing so, he assented to the judgment as reduced. San Bernardino v. Riverside, supra.

"The defendant, under the finding of the * * * court, was entitled to a new trial, unless the necessity therefor was obviated by the action of the plaintiff. The court gave him his choice to accept a reversal of the judgment and a new trial upon the merits, or to remit the sum which, in the judgment of the court, was in excess of the amount that ought to have been recovered. The plaintiff elected to receive the amount of the judgment less the excess. By this election he was bound. He obtained a judgment * * * which he would not have received had he not assented to the action of the court. That he assented reluctantly does not alter the case. By giving consent he became bound by the action of the court." Railroad Co. v. Mowery, 36 Ohio St. 418, 38 Am. Rep. 597.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. TRIAL 🔑139(1)—GRANT OF NONSUIT.

A court may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding the conflicting evidence, and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, the result is a determination that there is no evidence sufficient to support verdict for plaintiff.

2. EVIDENCE 🔑87—PRESUMPTION—EFFECT.

Whenever, under a given state of facts, a presumption arises, such presumption is itself evidence.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑598(1)—PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2, courts and jurors are not bound to decide in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses which do not produce conviction in their minds against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying their minds.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1002—PRESUMPTION—SUPPORT OF FINDING.

A presumption, even if disputable, will raise a conflict sufficient to support a finding made in accordance therewith, even though there is evidence to the contrary.

9. EVIDENCE 🔑592—ADVERSE PARTY—BINDING FORCE OF TESTIMONY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2055, as added by St. 1917, p. 58, plaintiff, suing a company for personal injuries by its automobile driven by its manager, is not bound by the testimony of the manager, made a defendant and called as a witness by plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by A. B. Grantham against W. F. Ordway and others. From judgment for defendant Pacific Acreage Company, on motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. M. Drew, of Fresno, for appellant.

Manning, Hoover & Thompson, of Fresno, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from that portion of the judgment, entered by the court in the above case, giving defendant Pacific Acreage Company, a corporation, judgment on motion for nonsuit.

Plaintiff was injured, during the business hours of the day, by an automobile driven by the defendant Ordway, and admittedly owned by the defendant Pacific Acreage Company, as to which defendant the nonsuit was granted. It was likewise admitted that at the time of the accident Ordway was in the employ of the Pacific Acreage Company; the disclaimer of liability by that defendant resting upon the denial that at that time Ordway was the agent of the company, or acting within the scope of his employment.

In addition to these admissions, it was shown that Ordway was the son of the president of the Pacific Acreage Company and was the general manager of the company's ranch, located near Fresno. His work was mainly in managing operations on the ranch, he purchasing supplies and having men working under him. He testified that he "came and went as he chose, so long as he kept the business of the Pacific Acreage Company moving and attended to. He went to town and various other places, as he saw fit. Nobody dictated to him when he should go and when he should come back." He used the automobile of the company, apparently, as he pleased, and in going about for the purpose of purchasing the necessary supplies for the ranch and attending to its business.

Plaintiff introduced the deposition of the defendant Ordway, as part of his case, in which Ordway testified that on the morning of the accident he had driven from the Pacific Acreage Company's ranch in the automobile to Fresno, for the sole purpose of purchasing a banjo, which he had previously ordered; that, the purchase concluded, he did not remember having stopped at any other place in town; that the purchase of the banjo was his main object, and, that accomplished, that was all he was thinking of; that he made no purchases for the Pacific Acreage Company, and did nothing whatsoever for the company.

In support of his claim that the court erred in granting the motion for nonsuit on the foregoing testimony, the appellant relies upon the manifest conflict, arising in the case from the weight which must be given certain presumptions, as to the liability of the defendant Pacific Acreage Company resulting from the admitted facts in the case, as against the testimony of defendant Ordway tending to completely overthrow such presumptions.

[1] "A court may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding the conflicting evidence, giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, therein indulging in every legal inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given." Perera v. Panama-Pacific International Exposition Co. (Sup.) 175 Pac. 454.

[2-5] Whenever, under a given state of facts a presumption arises, such presumption is itself evidence. Courts and jurors are not bound to decide in conformity with the declaration of any number of witnesses, which do not produce conviction in their minds, against a less number, or against a presumption, or other evidence, satisfying their minds. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 2. A presumption, even if disputable, will raise a conflict which is sufficient to support a finding made in accordance therewith, even though there be evidence to the contrary. Whether a presumption has been controverted is a question of fact. Fanning v. Green, 156 Cal. 279, 104 Pac. 308; Moore v. Gould, 151 Cal. 726, 91 Pac. 616; People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 54 Pac. 833; People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 390, 95 Pac. 863.

Section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

> "All other presumptions are satisfactory, if uncontradicted. They are denominated disputable presumptions, and may be controverted by other evidence. The following are of that kind:
> "(20) That the ordinary course of business has been followed."

The general principle that where a servant, acting within the general scope of his employment and authority, injures one, the employer may be held liable, is not disputed in this case; the respondents' contention, as before indicated, being that at the time of the accident the defendant Ordway had departed from the usual line of his employment and was transacting business purely personal, and having no relation to the business of his employer.

[6, 7] Under the decisions of this and other states, however, from the admitted fact of ownership of the automobile by defendant Pacific Acreage Company, and its employment of Ordway, a presumption arose that Ordway was acting within the general scope of his authority, to such an extent as to bind his employer. Upon these facts being admitted in the case, the question as to whether Ordway was so acting became a question for the jury to decide. Adams v. Wiesendanger, 27 Cal. App. 593, 150 Pac. 1016. The automobile being admitted to belong to the defendant Pacific Acreage Company, a presumption arose that it was used for its benefit and on its own account. That presumption was not destroyed as matter of law by the testimony of defendant Ordway. "Even though his explanation of the use of the car would absolve him, if credited, the question of whether it should be credited was one of fact for the jury." Schreiber v. Matlack, 90 Misc. Rep. 667, 154 N. Y. Supp. 109; Ferris v. Sterling, 214 N. Y. 249-253, 108 N. E. 406, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 1161. In the latter case there was much conflicting testimony, and the court held that the fact that defendant was owner of the automobile, and the chauffeur in his employ to operate it, was sufficient to make out a prima facie case that the chauffeur was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident, but that the prima facie showing was not conclusive, and, if the testimony of the chauffeur that he took the automobile for his own business was true, the owner was not responsible. In an action for injuries to plaintiff by being struck by an automobile operated by a chauffeur, in considering whether the car was being used at the time for the purposes of the corporation of which defendant was president, or for his own purposes, or by the chauffeur for purposes authorized by neither the corporation nor the defendant, the most favorable view for the defendant which can be taken on appeal is that such question was for the jury to determine. Benn v. Forrest, 213 Fed. 763, 130 C. C. A. 277.

The case of Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson & Co., 18 Cal. App. at page 353, 123 Pac. at page 221, is instructive as showing the kind of evidence sufficient to support a verdict in this class of cases. The plaintiff, there, was struck by a horse and buggy owned by the defendant, and driven by its vice president. It was contended that the evidence was insufficient to support the judgment, in that it failed to show that the person in charge of the horse and buggy was, at the time of the accident, in any wise occupied in the performance of any duty relating to the business of the defendant. On the appeal this court said:

> "It was an admitted fact in the case that the horse and buggy belonged to the corporation defendant, and that the driver, Charles Nilson, 'was an officer of the defendant who had the right to operate the buggy.' Nilson was the vice president of the defendant, and testified as a witness in its behalf. Upon his cross-examination it developed that in the performance of his duties as vice president he 'had no regular hours whatsoever; that he had to go around all over the city sometimes; had to go out to the park and Richmond, where the corporation was working at the time; had to go everywhere and see that the work was all right.'
> "From this it would appear that, in addition to being vice president of the defendant, Nilson was also the general superintendent of its work, and that in the performance of his duties he was granted a roving commission which permitted him to look after the business of the defendant at the times and in the manner which best suited his own convenience. It is the accepted rule in this and other jurisdictions that where an employé is intrusted with the possession and operation of a vehicle, with permission to use it at his discretion in the business of the employer, the latter will be held responsible in damages for injuries inflicted upon the person of another resulting from the negligence of the employé in the use and operation of the vehicle; and in such a case it is not necessary for the person seeking damages to prove that at the time of the injuries the employé was engaged in executing any particular business or specific command of his principal. That the employé, at the time of the commission of the tort, was acting within the general scope of his employment, and that the injury occurred as the result of his negligence, is all that need be shown in order to charge his employer with liability for such injury. Mulvehill v. Bates, 31 Minn. 364, 47 Am. Rep. 796, 17 N. W. 959; Rahn v. Singer Mfg. Co. [C. C.] 26 Fed. 912; Riordan v. Gas Consumers' Ass'n, 4 Cal. App. 639, 88 Pac. 809."

The court held:

> "That the testimony of Nilson, coupled with the admitted fact that the defendant was the owner of the horse and buggy, and had conferred upon Nilson the right of using the same in its business, sufficiently supports the trial court's finding that the horse and buggy were owned by the defendant, and 'wholly in the possession and under the control of the defendant' at the time of the accident."

[The last four paragraphs of the opinion by WASTE, P. J., were withdrawn on rehearing, and are omitted.]

The judgment in favor of the defendant Pacific Acreage Company is reversed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; NOURSE, Judge pro tem.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The opinion in this case is modified by substituting the following, in lieu of the last four paragraphs in the decision heretofore filed:

In the case of Riordan v. Gas Consumers' Ass'n, supra, the court with approval quoted from the case of Mulvehill v. Bates, supra, where, in speaking of the liability of a defendant for the negligence of a driver, while engaged in carrying a load of poles for himself, the court said:

> "But here the wagon was intrusted, generally, to the driver, to be used entirely at his discretion."

In Rahn v. Singer Mfg. Co., supra, the court said:

> "In order to fix responsibility of the defendant, it is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove that the servant, for whose tort he seeks damages, was, at the time of the commission of the tort, engaged in executing specific commands of the defendant. It is enough for him to prove that the servant was acting within the general scope of his employment, but this much is necessary. If the usage of the parties, under the servant's contract of hiring, was of such a character that it allowed the servant to attend to his duties on such terms as suited his convenience, and at the time of the commission of the tort he was engaged in his own private business, but at the same time was pursuing the defendant's business in the service for which he was employed, the defendant would still be liable."

[8] The admitted facts in the case as to the ownership of the automobile by defendant the Pacific Acreage Company, and its operation at the time of the accident by its manager, established a prima facie case against the company. In anticipation of the trial, the defendant took the deposition of Ordway. Plaintiff, as part of his case, read this deposition to the jury. From this deposition, the facts as hereinbefore set out, relating to his employment by the Pacific Acreage Company, and other circumstances, were established. It was shown thereby that, at the time of the accident, Ordway was operating the automobile of the defendant Pacific Acreage Company, under a contract of hiring of such character that it allowed him to attend to his duties as manager at such time and in such manner as best suited his own convenience. He enjoyed a "roving commission" and was intrusted with the possession and operation of the vehicle with permission to use it at his discretion in the business in which he was employed. Rahn v. Singer Mfg. Co., supra; Jessen v. Peterson, Nelson Co., supra.

Under the admitted circumstances of Ordway's employment, we are not willing to hold that his testimony as to the manner in which he performed his duties connected therewith and his rather uncertain testimony as to his movements following the consummation of the personal business, which he claims brought him from his employer's ranch some distance into the city of Fresno, on the day of the accident, is so convincing, or free from justifiable doubt, as to amount to an admission by plaintiff, or to eliminate the presumption that Ordway at the time of the collision was engaged upon the business of his employer. Ferris v. Sterling, supra.

[9] Furthermore, plaintiff is not bound by Ordway's testimony. "A party to the record of any civil action * * * may be examined by the adverse party as if under cross-examination, subject to the rules applicable to the examination of other witnesses. The party calling such adverse witness shall not be bound by his testimony, and the testimony given by such witness may be rebutted by the party calling him for such examination by other evidence." Section 2055, Code Civ. Proc., as added by St. 1917, p. 58.

VOTYPKA v. VALENTINE et al. (Civ. 2834.)

1. HOMESTEAD 🔑115(3) — FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGES.

Where a deceased husband had declared and recorded a homestead on community property, and notice to creditors of his estate has been given, and no claim has been presented on account of a note and mortgage on the property covered by the homestead, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1475, the homestead property is released from the mortgage, and no action can be maintained to foreclose it under such section in view of section 1500.

2. HOMESTEAD 🔑46—DECLARATION—RECORD —PROPERTY IN TWO COUNTIES.

Where a homestead in community property is mainly situated in one county, a homestead declaration recorded in such county only is not void merely because a part of the premises covered by the homestead is claimed to be located in another county wherein no homestead declaration has been made.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑226—NOTICE TO CREDITORS OF DECEDENT—SUFFICIENCY OF PUBLICATION.

Publication of notice to creditors of a decedent's estate, begun on a date after the order therefor has been signed and filed, is not invalidated because the first publication was made before the entry of the order.

4. MORTGAGES 🔑422—FORECLOSURE—VENUE.

Where a decedent's creditor claimed that premises covered by his mortgage was situated in two counties, but decedent had declared a homestead covering the premises situated in one county, suit to foreclose could not be brought in such county as to the part of the premises situated in the other county, in view of Const. art. 6, § 5; there being no property subject to the mortgage in the county where suit was brought.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lake County; M. S. Sayre, Judge.

Action by John Votypka, Jr., against Flora A. Valentine and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar W. Hilton, of San Francisco, Harlow V. Greenwood, of Vallejo, and W. U. Goodman, of Fairfield, for appellant.

C. M. Crawford, of Lake Port, and Geo. K. Ford, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants. The action is one to foreclose a mortgage. The facts are undisputed and are briefly as follows: On and prior to the 9th day of May, 1911, the premises described in the complaint herein were the community property of Clarence A. Valentine and Flora A. Valentine, his wife, and on the above date they executed their promissory note, secured by a mortgage, upon the whole of said premises, delivering the same to one George F. Hilton, with the mortgage described therein, which note, as to the principal and as to a certain portion of the interest, was unpaid at the time this action was brought. The mortgage thus executed and delivered described the property covered thereby as "situate, lying and being in the county of Lake, state of California." The mortgage was recorded in Lake county on May 16, 1911, but was also recorded in Napa county on December 15, 1915, a few days before this action was commenced. On March 19, 1912, Clarence A. Valentine made and executed a declaration of homestead upon the whole of said premises, describing the same as being situated in the county of Lake, and recorded said declaration of homestead upon the date of its execution in the county of Lake, but not elsewhere. On August 27, 1912, said Clarence A. Valentine died intestate in the city and county of San Francisco, being then a resident therein, and thereafter and on April 25, 1913, after due proceedings had, his widow, Flora A. Valentine, was duly appointed and qualified as the administratrix of his estate. On said April 25, 1913, an order for the publication of notice to creditors was signed by the probate judge, which was filed with the clerk of his court on the following day; on April 28, 1913, another order for the publication of notice to creditors was signed by the same judge and filed on the same date with the clerk. These two orders are identical, except as to their dates and filing marks, and no reason for their duplication appears in the record. Both orders were recorded on May 2, 1913. The first publication of notice to creditors under one or both of these orders was made on April 29, 1913. It appears in the record that such publication was made in the selected newspaper on said April 29, 1913, and also on May 6th, 13th, and 20th and 27th of that year, and that on June 20, 1917, upon a showing of these facts, a decree establishing due and legal notice to creditors in said estate was signed, filed, and recorded in said probate court. No claim was ever presented to the administratrix of said estate by the holder of said note and mortage which shortly after their execution had been assigned to the plaintiff in this action. In the complaint filed herein for the foreclosure of said note and mortgage the plaintiff describes one of the pieces or parcels of land covered by said mortgage as being situate "partly in the county of Lake and partly in the county of Napa," but does not further show either in said complaint or in the evidence offered in support of its averments what portion of said premises is located in the county of Napa. The court in its findings recited that the allegation of that paragraph of the complaint which contains this brief recital as to the location of a portion of said premises partly in Napa county is true; but the findings do not inform us what, if any, appreciable portion of said premises is located in Napa county. This action was commenced in the county of Lake. The plaintiff, by an amendment to his said complaint, expressly waived all recourse against any other property of the estate than that described in said mortgage, and also waived any deficiency judgment.

The defendants in their answer averred the foregoing facts as to the making and recordation of said homestead, and as to the death of said Clarence A. Valentine, and the said proceedings taken in the course of the administration of his estate, and thereupon prayed that the plaintiff take nothing by this action.

The trial court found these averments of the defendants' answer to be true, and entered its judgment in their favor and in accordance with their said prayer.

[1] The appellant herein contends that said judgment was erroneous for several reasons. The first of these relates to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain said action. The position of the respondents in this regard is that having established the fact that the premises in question were the community property of the Valentines, and that the deceased husband had declared and recorded in the county of Lake a homestead thereon, and thereafter had died, and that in the course of probate of his estate notice to creditors had been duly ordered and published, and that no claim had ever been presented for or on account of said note and mortgage, as required by section 1475 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the property covered by said homestead became thereby released from the operation and effect of said mortgage, and hence this action to foreclose the same could not be maintained under said section and also under section 1500 of said Code. The following authorities cited by respondent sustain this view with respect to the application of the foregoing sections of the Code of Civil Procedure to cases of this character: Camp v. Grider, 62 Cal. 20; Bollinger v. Manning, 79 Cal. 7, 21 Pac. 375; Hearn v. Kennedy, 85 Cal. 55, 24 Pac. 606; Rosenberg v. Ford, 85 Cal. 610, 24 Pac. 779; Hibernia S. & L. Soc. v. Laidlaw, 4 Cal. App. 626, 88 Pac. 730.

[2] The appellant, however, urges three main arguments against the application of the sections of the Code and the cases construing them to the facts of the case at bar. The first of these is that the complaint having averred, and the court having found, that a portion of the premises covered by said homestead was situated partly in the county of Napa, the said homestead is wholly void because it was not recorded in Napa county. We cannot go to the extent which the appellant would have us go in order to uphold this contention. The homestead was duly recorded in the county of Lake. So far as this record discloses, the main amount of the lands covered by said homestead declaration are located in the county of Lake. In point of fact, it has not been shown that any substantial or valuable, or not easily divisible, part of said premises is located in Napa county. This being the state of the record, we are constrained to hold that the homestead is valid as to the lands described therein which are situated within the county of Lake, wherein said homestead was duly recorded, and that the same was such valid and subsisting homestead at and during the time of the giving of notice to creditors in the course of probate of said estate, and that if the publication of such notice to creditors was itself valid, and if no claim was presented by the mortgagee thereunder, his mortgage, in so far as it related to the lands covered by said homestead located in said Lake county, was released under the provisions of the foregoing Code sections and of the above-cited authorities construing the same.

[3] The appellant, however, further contends that this result does not follow for the reason that the publication of such notice to creditors in said estate was void, its alleged invalidity consisting of the fact that the first publication of said notice was made upon a date prior to the entry of the order for publication of notice to creditors, although it is conceded that the said publication was begun upon a date after the said order for publication had been signed and filed. We find no merit in this contention. In Estate of Hughston, 133 Cal. 321, 65 Pac. 742, 1039, the Supreme Court held that as to probate orders their entry in the book prescribed by the statute was a mere ministerial act of the clerk, having for its purpose the fixing of the time within which an appeal might be taken, and that such orders are perfect and complete from the time they are signed and filed. The case of Tracy v. Coffey, 153 Cal. 356, 95 Pac. 150, cited by the appellant in support of his contention, does not in any degree militate against the rule above announced, since its only effect was to hold that probate orders must be entered in order to fix the time within which an appeal may be taken.

[4] Finally, the appellant contends that he was entitled to commence and maintain this action in the county of Lake for the purpose of foreclosing said mortgage as to that portion of the lands in question as lay within the county of Napa, under the provisions of article 6, § 5, of the state Constitution, which reads in part as follows:

> "Provided, that all actions for the recovery of the possession of, quieting the title to or for the enforcement of liens upon real estate shall be commenced in the county in which the real estate, or any part thereof, affected by such action or actions, is situated."

The difficulty with the appellant's contention in this regard lies in the fact that, under the authorities above cited, the appellant's failure to present his claim against the estate of Valentine within the period prescribed by law had the effect of releasing so much of the property covered by said mortgage as lay in the county of Lake, as to which we have herein held the homestead to be valid. This being so, such of said property as was thereby released from the operation and effect of said mortgage would be no longer affected by it, and hence would not be affected by any action which could be commenced for the enforcement of the lien of said mortgage. The trial court, therefore, properly held that the action could not be maintained in Lake county for the foreclosure of the mortgage as to lands which were located in the county of Napa. Rogers v. Cady, 104 Cal. 288, 38 Pac. 81, 43 Am. St. Rep. 100.

This disposes of the several contentions urged by the appellant upon this appeal.

CONCOFF v. HIPPODROME THEATER CO. (L. A. 4895.)

1. CORPORATIONS ⚷423 — LIABILITY FOR SERVANT'S ACTS—TORTS.

A corporation is liable for the torts of its servant, if such servant had express or implied authority from it to do the tortious act, but not otherwise.

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT ⚷22 — BURDEN OF PROOF—AUTHORITY OF AGENT.

In an action for false arrest and imprisonment occasioned by the act of the servant of a corporation, the burden is on plaintiff to prove that such servant had express or implied authority from the corporation to do the tortious act.

3. FALSE IMPRISONMENT ⚷31 — AUTHORITY OF SERVANT—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a theater company for false arrest and imprisonment of a patron by defendant's usher, evidence held not to disclose an implied authority on the part of the usher arising from the scope of his duties to make the arrest.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by A. Concoff against the Hippodrome Theater Company for false arrest and imprisonment. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Alfred H. McAdoo and James E. Mahon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gerecht & Chambers, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for $200 rendered in an action by the plaintiff for damages from an alleged false arrest and imprisonment.

The defendant was conducting a theater in the city of Los Angeles and had in its employment as an usher, one John Barcena. Plaintiff purchased a ticket of admission to the theater, and proceeded to the front thereof, and was in the act of getting to a seat when he was interrupted by Barcena. The plaintiff alleges that Barcena arrested him, compelled him to go to the entrance of the theater, and there delivered him into the custody of a police officer, by whom he was taken to the city jail and kept there for an hour, all without probable cause or right, or any authority to do so. It is further alleged that Barcena did this in the regular course of his employment as servant of the defendant.

[1-3] A corporation is liable for the torts of its servant, if such servant has authority from it to do the tortious act, but not otherwise. The burden is on the plaintiff to prove such authority. The authority may be either express or implied. There was no evidence that any express authority was given by the defendant to Barcena to arrest the plaintiff, and no claim is made to that effect. The contention is that there was an implied authority arising from the fact that the arrest was within the scope of the duties which Barcena was employed by the defendant to perform. This contention is untenable.

The evidence merely shows that he was employed as an usher in the theater which was the scene of the arrest, and that as such usher his duty was to attend to the seating of the patrons after they had entered the room. It may be true that one of the implied duties of an usher in such position is to prevent disorderly conduct in the theater, and perhaps to eject persons guilty thereof, but there is no evidence on the subject respecting his duties in that particular, or that he had any such authority. But in any event there was no implied authority to him from the defendant to arrest or imprison persons who might commit criminal offenses while in the theater. Such authority is not to be implied from the mere fact that he was an usher with the duty of attending to the seating of the patrons and keeping order. The authorities are practically unanimous to this effect. Daniel v. Atlantic Coast, etc., Co., 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 816, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718; Allen v. London, etc.,

Co., L. R., 6 B. B. 65; Barabasz v. Kabat, 86 Md. 36, 37 Atl. 720; Carter v. Howe Machine Co., 51 Md. 296, 34 Am. Rep. 311; Mali v. Lord, 39 N. Y. 381; Markley v. Snow, 207 Pa. 447, 56 Atl. 999, 64 L. R. A. 685.

The finding of the court was to the effect that Barcena was employed by the defendant as an usher, and that among his duties was that of preserving order in the theater. As we have shown, the latter proposition is not sustained by any direct evidence. But even if it were supported it is insufficient to sustain the conclusion that the defendant was liable for the act of Barcena in making the arrest and imprisonment complained of. The statement in the findings that Barcena, "as agent and servant of the defendant, and acting within the scope of his authority as such," arrested the plaintiff is a mere conclusion of law, and it is wholly unjustified by the evidence or by the facts found. Aside from this conclusion there is nothing in the findings to show that the defendant was responsible for the act. The appeal must be sustained. It may be added that the finding that Barcena arrested the plaintiff is supported by very slight evidence. It was shown that Barcena took charge of him and conducted him to the entrance of the theater, apparently for the purpose of ejecting him, but the arrest appears to have been made by a deputy constable who was in the theater at the time and by a police officer who was stationed at the front door.

The judgment is reversed.

FORD v. CALIFORNIA PAC. INV. CO. et al.

EXECUTION ⚷253(1) — SALE — PROCEEDINGS FOR VACATION.

Although a purchaser at an execution sale is not a party to the action, the sale may be vacated as unfair and fraudulent on motion in the case wherein the sale was ordered, and a separate action brought for that purpose is unnecessary.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Melissa H. L. Ford against the California Pacific Investment Company and H. B. Learned and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant H. B. Learned appeals. Affirmed.

John O. Bender, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Slosson & Mitchell and Daniel Beecher, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from an order vacating an execution sale on the grounds that the price was wholly disproportionate to the real value of the property, and that the sale was unfair and fraudulent. The appellant is the purchaser at the sale. He was not a party to the action, and his position is that where a purchaser at a judicial sale is not a party to the action the sale cannot be vacated on motion, but only in a separate action brought for that purpose. This is the sole question in the case, and it is answered by Thompson v. Superior Court, 119 Cal. 538, 542, 51 Pac. 863, 864, where an order vacating a judicial sale was under attack, and the court said:

> "It is contended that this order is void for want of jurisdiction; that, the title to the property having vested in the petitioner by the sale, he could not be divested of that title in such a proceeding. The rule, however, is quite otherwise. While the party seeking relief may resort to his bill in equity, he may—and, indeed, it is often the preferable practice—apply by motion to the court which has decreed the sale, and in applying to such court he may base his application upon any equitable principle of relief which would give jurisdiction to a court of equity in any other case of sale—fraud, mistake, accident, or other ground of purely equitable cognizance. And particularly will the court entertain such applications where the deception has been practiced or the mistake induced by the act of the purchaser. In all such cases due regard will be had to the intervening rights of third persons, but no such rights have here arisen. Amongst numerous authorities supporting this proposition may be instanced [citing a number of authorities]."

See, also, Georgeson v. Consumers' Lumber Co., 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 584, 31 Pac. 257.

If Bryan v. Berry, 8 Cal. 135, the only decision by this court to which appellant's counsel has referred us, is to be taken as holding to the contrary, it must be deemed to have been overruled on this point.

Order affirmed.

CONIGLIO v. CONNECTICUT FIRE INS. CO. (L. A. 4896.)

1. INSURANCE 🔑282(13)—SOLE AND UNCONDITIONAL OWNERSHIP.

A fire insurance policy was not vitiated because there was contained, among the fixtures, a computing scale of which plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner, the title being in the vendor, where the scale was not specifically named in the policy, and plaintiff insurer waived in open court all claim for damage thereto, and plaintiff had not concealed or misrepresented any material fact relating to this property, although he had included the scale in his schedule of losses, believing his equitable interest therein entitled him to recover the cash value thereof.

2. INSURANCE 🔑670—FINDINGS.

In action on fire insurance policy, findings held to establish that a subsequent explosion was caused by fire within and not without the insured building.

3. INSURANCE 🔑665(4)—ACTION ON FIRE POLICY—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to show that the stock and fixtures insured had been attacked by fire when an explosion took place.

4. INSURANCE 🔑115(6)—INSURABLE INTEREST—CONDITIONAL SALE PURCHASER.

A purchaser of property under conditional sale by the terms of which title is to remain in the vendor until full payment is made has at least an insurable interest to the extent of his payments on account.

5. INSURANCE 🔑146(3)—CONSTRUCTION OF POLICY.

Insurance contracts are to be interpreted in the light of the fact that they are drawn by insurance companies, and are rarely, if ever, understood by the people who pay the premiums, so that every rational indulgence must be shown the assured.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1047(4)—TRIAL 🔑377(1)—IRREGULARITY—PREJUDICE.

In action on fire policy, that plaintiff's attorneys, after argument, tendered to the judge and he read an accountant's report concerning books and matters of account which had been introduced in evidence to show the amount and value of plaintiff's stock when the fire occurred, and also sent to the judge, without serving it on opposing counsel, a summary of plaintiff's testimony as to value of destroyed property, held not reversible error, where plaintiff's counsel made no closing argument, and there was no order that the case stand submitted, and subsequently defendant's counsel furnished the court with "memoranda of figures used on argument."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by A. Coniglio against the Connecticut Fire Insurance Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John R. Layng, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Force Parker and F. D. R. Moote, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment on a policy of fire insurance issued by defendant, insuring plaintiff against all loss by fire in the sum of $1,500 on a stock of merchandise while contained in a described building, in the city of Los Angeles, and $500 on furniture and fixtures while contained in said building. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff for the aggregate of these sums, together with interest and costs. From this judgment defendant appeals.

The court found that on July 21, 1913, the stock and fixtures covered by said policy were totally destroyed by fire; that the merchandise, the furniture, and other equipment were worth much more than the respective amounts of insurance, and that defendant was fully liable. The court also found as follows:

> "That during said fire, but subsequent to the commencement thereof, an explosion occurred in said building. That there was no explosion prior to said fire. That to the contrary said fire preceded and was the cause of said explosion."

The court also by the findings negatived defendant's attempted showing of fraud in the presentation by plaintiff of his proofs of loss.

[1] One of the contentions of defendant was that the policy was vitiated because there was contained among the fixtures a certain computing scale of which the plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner, title being vested in the vendor, a certain scale company. Upon this branch of the case the court found that the scale was not specifically named in the policy; that plaintiff waived in open court all claim for loss of or damage to said scale; that plaintiff had not concealed or misrepresented any material fact relating to this personal property, although he had included in his schedule of losses the said scale, believing that his equitable interest therein entitled him to recover from the insurer the cash value of the property.

[2] Appellant contends that the findings fail to indicate that the explosion occurred by reason of a fire within the building. This is hypercriticism. There was a finding, which is quoted above, that the fire preceded and caused the explosion. There was also a finding against defendant's contention that the building and contents were destroyed by an explosion occurring "within said frame building," and another that "an explosion did occur in said building on said 21st day of July, 1913, but that said explosion was subsequent to the commencement of said fire, and was the result of and was occasioned by said fire." We cannot see how, in view of these findings, it may be fairly or at all inferred that a fire without the building may have caused the explosion within.

[3] Appellant denies that the testimony or any of it tends to establish the conclusion that the stock and store fixtures had been attacked by fire when the explosion took place.

Several witnesses testified that they saw "light" or "fire" or "flames" in the direction of plaintiff's store some time before the explosion. One witness, Rioloc, said he saw the fire "at" plaintiff's store, and that shortly after there was an explosion. Without reviewing the testimony in detail, we think it sufficient to say that the findings are supported. Many of the witnesses spoke through an interpreter, and their statements are not, perhaps, so clear and satisfying as would be those of witnesses familiar with the English language; but there was sufficient testimony to justify the court in concluding that there was a fire within plaintiff's store which by its size and extent must have been attacking the stock and fixtures at the time of its discovery and before any question relating to the injury worked by the explosion could arise.

Defendant bases its contention that the explosion and not the fire caused the damage upon testimony regarding fragments of the building found at some distance from the site of the store. But other witnesses said that they could find no part of the stock or fixtures thus dispersed. One of defendant's own witnesses testified that there were of the grocery stock outside of the lines of the building the next morning only a few cans. The testimony on behalf of plaintiff, if believed, justified the court in concluding that there had been a substantial destruction of the stock and fixtures before the explosion dissipated any of the parts of the house. Fountain v. Connecticut Fire Insurance Co., 158 Cal. 760, 112 Pac. 546, 139 Am. St. Rep. 214, cited by appellants, is not in point here. In that case the evidence, without substantial conflict, was that the building had been destroyed by earthquake before the fire started. Appellant asks this court to compare the testimony of certain witnesses, who said that they observed the illumination from a distance of several blocks, and that they subsequently heard an explosion, with that of witness Vatcher that there was no light in or about the plaintiff's premises prior to the detonation. Such a comparison is beyond our duty or power. That was the peculiar province of the learned judge of the superior court who presided at the trial, trying matters both of law and of fact, a jury having been waived by the parties.

[4, 5] It is contended that plaintiff had no insurable interest in the automatic scale described in the findings; that the policy is nonseverable, and that by reason thereof it never attached to the risk. There is no merit in the insurance company's position in that behalf. A purchaser of property under conditional sale by the terms of which title is to remain in the vendor until full payment is made has at least an insurable interest to the extent of his payments on account. 14 Ruling Case Law, 916, § 93; Tabbut v. American Insurance Co., 185 Mass. 419, 70 N. E. 430, 102 Am. St. Rep. 353. See 20 Am. Dec. 513, note, Vendor and Vendee. Appellant suffered no possible injury by reason of the fact that plaintiff owed $50 on the scale at the time of the fire, because there was a waiver at the trial of any claim arising out of the destruction of that article. It is true that in the portion of the policy signed by the witnessed mark of Coniglio (who could not read or write) was a declaration that the interest of the insured in the property was "fee simple," but there was no showing that appellant was or could be injured in the slightest degree by such alleged misrepresentation. It is to be remembered that contracts of this sort are to be interpreted in the light of the fact that they are drawn by the insurance companies and are rarely, if ever, understood by the people who pay the premiums. Every rational indulgence must be shown by the assured. Raulet v. Northwestern National Insurance Co., 157 Cal. 213, 107 Pac. 292. The case of Goorberg v. Western Assurance Co., 150 Cal. 510, 89 Pac. 130, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 876, 119 Am. St. Rep. 246, 11 Ann. Cas. 801, cited by appellant, has no application to the facts of this case. In that case the applicant for insurance had misrepresented his title to the land on which his house was built, stating that he owned the fee, whereas he was a mere "squatter" on lands of the government. The court held that such a misrepresentation was material because it increased the hazard on all property covered by the policy.

course of the trial. Plaintiff's counsel made no closing argument, and there was, according to his affidavit, no formal or other order that the cause stand submitted. Subsequently, defendant's counsel furnished the court with a document purporting to contain "memoranda of figures used on argument," but which also contained certain argumentative matter and certain authorities. Thereafter plaintiff's counsel served on defendant's counsel and delivered to the judge, as their reply to defendant's written argument, a report of one Rea, an accountant. This was adopted by counsel for plaintiff as their argument. It was a review of all the evidence in the record on the amount and value of plaintiff's stock. Plaintiff's counsel also sent to the judge, without serving it upon opposing counsel, a summary of the testimony of Mr. Coniglio as to the value of the property destroyed. While this may have been an irregularity, it does not appear that the "summary" was in any respect improper. It consisted of a tabulated statement of figures indicating the value of property destroyed as Mr. Coniglio estimated its worth. It was accompanied by no comment. Nor can we see how defendant was injured by the analysis of the testimony made by the accountant. It was in the nature of an informal brief furnished by plaintiff's representatives. It does not appear that appellant's counsel regarded this document and its service as a serious invasion of the rights of the insurance company, for he made no motion to reopen the case for the cross-examination of Mr. Rea. In other words, there is no showing that the informality in the manner of argument injured the defendant, or that it did or could prejudice that litigant with the learned judge of the trial court.

In re BERGLAND'S ESTATE. (L. A. 5951.)

1. WILLS 🔑656 — CONSTRUCTION — PROVISIONS FOR FORFEITURE IN CASE OF CONTEST.

Although under Civ. Code, § 1320, several testamentary instruments executed by the same testator are to be taken and construed together as one instrument, where testator executed a will containing a clause forfeiting bequests to any beneficiary who objected to the distribution or attempted to defeat the provisions of the will, such provision was not applicable to a later olographic will making no reference to the former will or to its forfeiture clause; the testator's intent being controlling in view of section 1319.

2. WILLS 🔑656 — CONSTRUCTION—FORFEITURE CLAUSE.

While clauses in wills providing for forfeiture in case of objection to distribution or attempt to contest are valid and should be given effect according to testator's intent, such provisions are to be strictly construed, and not extended beyond what was plainly the testator's intent.

3. WILLS 🔑665 — CONSTRUCTION—FORFEITURE FOR CONTESTING WILL—GOOD FAITH.

A clause in a will forfeiting bequests to beneficiaries objecting to the distribution or attempting to defeat its provisions does not extend to an attempt made in good faith to probate a later purported will, spurious in fact, but believed to be genuine.

4. WILLS 🔑665 — CONSTRUCTION — FORFEITURE BY ATTEMPT TO PROBATE FORGED WILL—EVIDENCE OF FORGERY.

That a petition to probate a later purported will was dismissed and a certain person convicted of the crime of forging it is not competent evidence to show that it was spurious, as a basis for proving an attempt to defeat the provisions of an earlier will, providing for forfeiture of bequests to beneficiaries attempting to defeat its provisions.

5. WILLS 🔑665 — CONSTRUCTION — FORFEITURE CLAUSES — "ATTEMPT TO DEFEAT WILL."

Under a will containing a provision forfeiting the interest of a beneficiary who attempts to defeat its provisions, a proceeding to probate a later will known to be spurious constitutes an attempt to defeat the will, notwithstanding it is not carried to the point of hearing and trial but is withdrawn.

6. WILLS 🔑665 — FORFEITURE OF CONTESTING WILL—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where a forfeiture is claimed under a clause in a will forfeiting bequests to beneficiaries attempting to defeat its provisions, the burden is on the party claiming forfeiture to show bad faith on the part of a beneficiary seeking to probate a later purported will which is spurious.

7. WILLS 🔑665—FORFEITURE FOR CONTEST—PRESUMPTION OF BAD FAITH.

Where it was claimed that a beneficiary in a will had forfeited her share by attempting to probate a later spurious will, no presumption of bad faith arose from the withdrawal of her petition for probate.

And any and all other provisions made herein for such objector other than the sum of five dollars ($5.00) as stated, shall be annulled and revoked and such person or persons shall take nothing from my estate other than the sum of five dollars ($5.00)."

There is no dispute as to the facts, which are:

The decedent, Andrew Bergland, died March 3, 1916, leaving as his heirs two sons, Charles and Louis, and a daughter, the last the legatee mentioned whose legacy is in question. Immediately upon his death a formal instrument, attested by two witnesses, very evidently drawn by a lawyer, and making a complete disposition of the decedent's estate, was offered for probate as his will by the parties named as executors therein. Under it the sons and the daughter are all substantial beneficiaries. It likewise contains the forfeiture provisions quoted, but it does not provide for the legacy in question here. It is dated June 7, 1910, and was reaffirmed by formal codicils—otherwise immaterial here—on March 10, 1914, and December 26, 1914.

Two days after the offer of this formal will for probate, the daughter offered, as being an olographic will of the decedent, a writing reading as follows:

> "August 29, 1915.
> "i give al Money in Banks to my Dater Kate Misner when i Die. A. Bergland."

The gift made by this instrument is the legacy involved here. It is to be noted that the date of this writing is subsequent to the dates of the formal will and its codicils, and also that it makes no reference whatever to them.

Eight days after the olographic writing was presented for probate the daughter offered for probate still another instrument, dated this time December 25, 1915, which purported to dispose of practically all the decedent's property in a manner substantially different from that of the will of 1910 and more advantageous to the daughter and to appoint the daughter executrix.

No objection was made by any one, so far as the record discloses, to the probate of the will of 1910 with its codicils, but the two sons filed formal objections to the probating of the two instruments offered by the daughter, alleging that both were forgeries, and that the instrument of December 25, 1915, was the result of a conspiracy to which the daughter was a party. The daughter pressed her petition for the probate of the instrument of December 25, 1915, until it came on for trial, when she dismissed it. Later, after hearing, the will of 1910 with its codicils and the olographic writing of August 29, 1915, were both admitted to probate as constituting together the last will of the decedent.

Subsequently, the daughter petitioned for the distribution to her of the money of her father in bank at the time of his death, pursuant to the provisions of the olographic will of 1915, and this petition was opposed by the sons on the ground that under the forfeiture clause of the will of 1910 she had lost all right to this legacy by her action in seeking the probate of the spurious will of December 25, 1915. The lower court granted the petition of the daughter, and from its order this appeal is taken by one of the sons.

The contention of the appellant must be overruled for two reasons:

[1] First, the forfeiture clause contained in the will of 1910 has no application to the will of 1915 or to the legacy given by it. The will of 1915 contains no reference to that of 1910, is not a codicil to it, and so far as anything appears is wholly independent of it, its provisions prevailing over any inconsistent provisions of the earlier will merely because, in the particular covered by it, it is a later expression of the decedent's testamentary wishes. It is true there is a general rule of testamentary construction formulated by our Civil Code (section 1320) as follows:

> "Several testamentary instruments, executed by the same testator, are to be taken and construed together as one instrument."

But this, like any other rule of construction, is but a guide for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the testator. It cannot be used to inject into the later instrument terms and provisions not found in it, unless by express reference in the later instrument or by necessary implication it appear that such was the testator's intention. It is always his intention as fairly ascertained and expressed that must govern, and the Code makes the rule quoted, together with other rules of construction, subordinate to this. Section 1319, Civ. Code. In the case of a codicil which by its terms picks up the will previously executed, and, in effect, reaffirms it, it is apparent that the decedent's testamentary intent at the time of the execution of the codicil includes as one both the codicil and the will, with the result that, unless there is something to indicate a contrary intention, any gift made by the codicil is subject to conditions imposed by the will on the testator's gifts generally. Of this character was the codicil in the Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 436, 101 Pac. 443, 21 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 953, 17 Ann. Cas. 993, wherein a forfeiture clause contained in a will was held to operate because of a contest made to a codicil. But here we do not have a single testamentary act covering both will and codicil, but two distinct testamentary acts occurring at different times, the later making no reference to the earlier, and consisting in terms of an unqualified and unconditional bequest. There is no language, no expression of any nature, that would indicate that the testator intended that the terms of this bequest should be modified and the gift be subject to conditions elsewhere prescribed. The two wills should be read together in the sense that each should be read in the light of the other, and their terms harmonized so far as possible, but this is a very different thing from changing the express terms of the later will by importing conditions into it without express warrant contained in it itself. We do not mean to say that a case is not possible where this may be properly done by implication only. But to justify this the circumstances must be such as fairly to show affirmatively that the testamentary intent of the decedent at the time of his last expression included not merely the matters which he then set down, but also those which he had set down on a previous occasion. Deppen's Trustee v. Deppen, 132 Ky. 755, 117 S. W. 352.

[2] In the present case there is nothing to give rise to any implication that the testator when he wrote and signed the olographic will of 1915 intended to do anything different from what his language literally expresses, namely, to make an unqualified and unconditional gift to his daughter. This becomes doubly clear when we consider the character of the condition which it is sought to import and the effect such importation would have. While it is the rule in this state that forfeiture clauses of the nature of that involved here are valid and are to be given effect according to the intent of the testator, yet it is also the rule, and a salutary one, that such a provision—being by way of forfeiture and condition subsequent—is to be strictly construed and not extended beyond what was plainly the testator's intent. In the present case the importation of the will of 1910 with its forfeiture clause into the will of 1915 would mean that the testator intended, not only that his daughter should forfeit the legacy there given if she contested the disposition made by the will of 1910, but also that if any beneficiary under the will of 1910 contested the will of 1915, he or she should forfeit the testator's bounty. It is hardly conceivable that the testator, when he executed the informal and unwitnessed olographic writing of 1915, intended that if its authenticity should be questioned by his sons, for instance, they should be cut off from their inheritance. The informal and unattested nature of the instrument is such as to make such intent wholly unreasonable. Yet this result would necessarily ensue, if the appellant's contention is to be sustained. In this respect the position of the appellant and his brother is no better than that of the respondent. They have endeavored to contest the later will, and if the earlier will is to be read into it and made a part of it, the later will is protected by the forfeiture clause of the earlier, and the case of the sons comes directly within Estate of Hite, supra. The answer, both as to the daughter and as to the sons, is that such construction is not justified either by implication or by express language, and that the later will is just what it purports to be, an absolute gift to the daughter, unconditioned on the one hand by the forfeiture clause and unprotected on the other by it.

[3] Second. The forfeiture provision has no application to an attempt made in good faith to probate what purports to be a later will. The language of the clause is that if any beneficiary "object to the distribution (of the estate) as made (by the will), or attempt to defeat the provisions of this will," any gift to such beneficiary other than $5 shall be annulled and revoked. If an attempt were made knowingly to probate a spurious will of a later date which purported to distribute the testator's estate in a manner different from that of the genuine will, such an attempt would quite certainly come within the language of the forfeiture clause as an attempt to defeat the provisions of the will. In re Kirkholder's Estate, 171 App. Div. 153, 157 N. Y. Supp. 37.

But it is not alleged in the present case that the daughter acted in bad faith in presenting the purported will of December 25, 1915, and seeking its probate, and no evidence on the point was introduced. It was alleged in the objection to the probate of the instrument that it was a forgery, made pursuant to a conspiracy to which the daughter was a party, but this allegation is not repeated in the objections to her petition for distribution, and apparently the omission is not an oversight. The expressed position of appellant's counsel is that the good faith of the daughter is immaterial, that the mere fact that she unsuccessfully endeavored to probate an instrument making a different disposition of the estate from that directed by the will of 1910 is sufficient to work a forfeiture.

[4] It is to be noted that there is no proof in this proceeding that the instrument of December 25, 1915, was, in fact, spurious. All that appears is that the petition for its probate was withdrawn, and also the fact that a certain person was convicted of the crime of forging it. But neither the dismissal nor the criminal conviction is competent evidence in the present proceeding that it was not genuine. We, however, do not desire to rest our conclusion upon this ground, and will assume that it was spurious.

[5] Respondent contends that proceedings taken by the daughter to probate the spurious will do not amount to a contest or to an attempt to defeat the testator's real will, that in order to amount to this the proceedings must have been carried to the point of a hearing and trial, which was not done. With this we do not agree. The attempt was there, manifested by overt acts designed and taken for the purpose of bringing about a different disposition of the estate, assuming that the instrument was known to the daughter not to be genuine. The fact that she desisted from her attempt before actually going to trial is immaterial. The attempt was made, and that is enough. Estate of Hite, supra. The question, therefore, reduces itself to this, Is an attempt made in good faith to probate a spurious instrument—whether such attempt is carried through to a final adjudication of the spurious character of the instrument or not—such an attempt to defeat the testator's wishes as is meant by the language of the will?

As we have already said, the forfeiture clause is to be strictly construed, that is, while it is valid and is to be enforced according to the ascertained intent of the testator, yet in ascertaining his intent no wider scope is to be given to his language than is plainly required. The conditions upon which the forfeiture is to work under the will are two: First, in case any beneficiary "object to the distribution (of the estate) as made (by the will)"; or, second, "attempt to defeat the provisions of this will." The attempt to probate a later will cannot be said to be an objection to the distribution made by the first will. Is it within the second condition, "an attempt to defeat the provisions of this will"? It would certainly have the effect, if successful, of defeating those provisions. This, however, is not a complete answer. While the effect would be to nullify, and thereby in one sense defeat, the provisions of the first will, that result is but incidental, and is not the primary object of the attempt to probate the purported later will, provided such attempt be made in good faith. The primary object of such attempt is to establish what is believed to be the final expression of the decedent's testamentary wishes. In the words "attempt to defeat" lies the idea of action taken for the purpose of defeating the provisions of the will. A direct contest of the validity of the will would, of course, be such action regardless of the good or bad faith of the beneficiary, and such was the ruling in Estate of Miller, 156 Cal. 119, 103 Pac. 842, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 868. So, also, would be an attempt to accomplish the same result indirectly, as by seeking to probate a later instrument, known to be false. In such a case the primary purpose is to defeat the provisions of the real will. But it is easy to conceive of a beneficiary offering for probate purely through a sense of duty to the decedent what he believes to be the genuine expression of the testator's last desire, without any purpose whatever of defeating a prior will and without any interest in defeating it. Many a child has still such regard for his parent that he or she would endeavor to establish and carry out what was believed to be the father's will, although so doing is directly contrary to his or her own material interest. In such a case there is no element of an "attempt to defeat" a prior will.

It follows that an attempt in good faith to probate a later purported will, spurious in fact, but believed to be genuine by the party seeking its probate, does not fall within the forfeiture clause under consideration here.

As strengthening this conclusion, it may be worthy of note that to hold that the testator intended to forbid under penalty any attempt to probate what was genuinely believed to be a later will would mean that he intended decidedly to limit his own freedom of subsequent testamentary action. Such penalty would seriously discourage any attempt to probate even a genuine later will, and would distinctly lessen the chance of any later testamentary expression by the testator being made effective. It is not to be presumed that he contemplated or intended any such consequence.

[6, 7] Appellant contends that the burden rested on the respondent to show that she acted in good faith. This is not true. The fact of bad faith was an essential element of the appellant's case. The burden rested on him to show that the respondent had brought herself within the forfeiture clause, and this could not be shown without it appearing that her attempt to probate the spurious will of December 25, 1915, was in bad faith and for an ulterior object. Appellant argues that bad faith must be presumed from the fact that the respondent's petition for probate was withdrawn, and cites In re Kirkholder's Estate, 171 App. Div. 153, 157 N. Y. Supp. 37. It is clear, however, that no presumption of bad faith arises from the withdrawal of the petition. It would not have arisen even if the matter had been carried to a hearing and final adjudication that the will was not genuine, unless possibly as a part of such adjudication facts were found that proved the respondent's bad faith. If such facts were found as a part of such adjudication, it may be that such finding would be res judicata as between the parties. This was the situation in In re Kirkholder's Estate, supra, and therein lies the difference between it and the case at bar.

Finally, we would say that there are grave reasons of public policy why a provision for forfeiture in case of an unsuccessful but bona fide attempt to probate a purported later will should not be enforced. It is the policy of the law to encourage the presentation for probate of wills of decedents in order to make the more certain that those really entitled to their bounty shall enjoy it. To place upon one under the moral, if not the legal, obligation of probating the decedent's will the burden of gambling on his ability to do so successfully, no matter how sincere he may be, would be directly opposed to such policy. These reasons are very different from those applicable to direct attacks upon a will, and the question is not precluded by Estate of Hite, supra. It is unnecessary to put this decision upon that ground, and we do not do so. We mention the point, however, to avoid any inference that our discussion of the case solely as one of the construction of the will means that this question of public policy is not present in it. It is present, but it is not necessary to decide it.

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(7)—Automobile Accidents—Contributory Negligence—Jury Question.

Where a pedestrian was struck by defendant's automobile while attempting to board a street car, evidence held not to show, as a matter of law, that plaintiff was negligent.

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑705(10)—Crossing Streets—Duty to Stop, Look and Listen.

A pedestrian about to cross a city street is under no positive duty to stop, look and listen.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑705(10)—Automobile Accidents — Care Required of Pedestrians.

Where a pedestrian about to board a street car is struck by an automobile, the question of negligence, under the usual rule of ordinary care devolving upon pedestrians, must be examined in the light of all the attending circumstances, including the knowledge of the existence of a statute or an ordinance describing regulations for the observance of automobile drivers.

4. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(7)—Automobile Accident — Boarding Street Cars—Questions of Fact.

Where a pedestrian was struck by defendant's automobile while about to board a street car, whether, if she saw the automobile, she would have been warranted in approaching the street car, without further watching the automobile, relying upon the ordinance requiring automobiles so situated to stop, held a question for the jury.

5. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(5)—Automobile Accidents — Evidence — Sufficiency.

Where a pedestrian while attempting to board a street car, was struck by defendant's automobile which was passing in violation of a city ordinance, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that defendant was negligent.

6. Municipal Corporations 🔑592(2)—Regulation of Automobiles—Statutory Enactments — Inconsistency with Ordinance.

Motor Vehicle Act of 1913, requiring automobile drivers when passing street cars in a city to operate the automobile with due care and caution to prevent injury to those boarding or alighting from the car, and a city ordinance requiring an automobile driver to stop 10 feet behind a car standing still to allow passengers to board or alight, are not inconsistent.

7. Municipal Corporations 🔑592(2)—Ordinances — Validity—Enactments—Conflict with State Laws.

Where the Legislature has assumed to regulate a given course of conduct by prohibitory enactments, a municipality with subordinate power to act in the matter may make such new and additional regulations in aid and furtherance of the purpose of the general law as may seem fit and appropriate to the necessities of the particular locality, and which are not in themselves unreasonable.

8. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(8) — Street Car Accidents—Instructions.

In an action for personal injury sustained by being struck by an automobile while attempting to board a street car, it was not error to instruct the jury in the language of Motor Vehicle Act 1913, regulating the care to be observed by automobile drivers while passing a street car, and also in the language of a city ordinance, requiring an automobile driver to stop 10 feet behind the car discharging or receiving passengers; such enactments not being in conflict.

9. Municipal Corporations 🔑706(8)—Automobile Accidents—Instructions.

In an action for personal injury sustained by being struck by defendant's automobile while attempting to board a street car, it was not error to instruct that, if defendant violated a city ordinance, and "by reason thereof plaintiff sustained injuries, then you should find for plaintiff, if you further find" that plaintiff was in the exercise of reasonable care, was not erroneous in that the jury should have been instructed that the violation of the ordinance was "negligence."

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by Merta Mann against De Witt Scott, doing business under the fictitious name and style of Scotty's Personal Auto Service and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from the denial of a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rufus V. Bowden and Duke Stone, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Shepard, Olm & Swenson, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. The facts upon which this appeal is based are stated in the opinion of Mr. Justice Finlayson, presiding in the District Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District, Division 2. We adopt that opinion in part as follows:

"While crossing from the sidewalk to where was standing a street car that she intended taking, plaintiff was struck by an automobile owned by defendant Scott and driven by his chauffeur, defendant Layman. She brought the action to recover damages for the personal injuries thus occasioned. Verdict and judgment were for plaintiff. From the judgment and order denying their motion for a new trial defendants appeal. The injury occurred shortly after 9 o'clock in the evening, in the city of Los Angeles, on Main street, which runs approximately north and south, and at the intersection of that thoroughfare with Republic street. Appellants' main contentions are: (1) That the court erred in not granting their motion for a nonsuit, in that, so it is claimed, respondent's case shows contributory negligence; (2) that, for the same reason, the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict; and (3) that the court committed prejudicial error in giving certain instructions to the jury.

[1] "1. We cannot say that, as a matter of law, respondent was guilty of contributory negligence—that is, that 'all the facts plainly and inevitably point to such negligence, leaving no room for argument or doubt.' Bailey v. Market Street Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 328, 42 Pac. 914. As is usual in such cases, there is a sharp conflict between the several witnesses. There was evidence, however, to support the following facts: Immediately prior to the accident respondent had stopped to mail a letter in a mail box on the west side of Main street, at the northwest corner of the intersection of that thoroughfare with Republic street. It was her purpose to board a south-bound Main street car, which she saw coming toward her from the north. The automobile and the street car were both traveling on Main street in the same direction. As respondent stepped up to the box to drop her letter she noticed the street car stop. It had stopped on the near side of the crossing, upon a signal given by two persons who wished to board the car. Just before dropping the letter respondent glanced up, looked toward the north, saw the street car coming, and started for it. She testified that, as she glanced up and saw the car approaching, there was nothing else in sight; that, as she stepped from the sidewalk, there was no automobile or other vehicle in sight; that as she stepped off the sidewalk she looked to see if the street was clear—to see if anything was coming—and then started for the street car, which, in the meantime, had stopped on the near side of the crossing, directly opposite the spot where she stepped from the sidewalk. Asked on cross-examination which way she was looking as she stepped from the curb, plaintiff replied that she did not know, but that she supposed she was looking directly toward the street car, which had stopped just as she mailed the letter. She intended boarding the car at its front-end entrance. When she left the sidewalk she did not again look to see if any automobile was coming. After taking two or three steps from the curb, and when about four feet from the sidewalk, she was struck down and injured by appellants' automobile, which, coming toward her from the north, was traveling abreast of the street car, and between it and the sidewalk. The place where the street car had stopped was the usual stopping place. As the motorman brought his car to a stop to permit the passengers to enter, he saw the headlight of appellant's automobile flash upon respondent. This caused him to look back. As he did so he saw appellants' automobile to his right, opposite about the middle of his car, still traveling, and going at a speed of between 8 and 12 miles an hour. When the automobile came to a stop its rear wheel was about directly opposite the front entrance of the street car. The street car had come to a stop just as the automobile reached the rear end of the car. For a short distance north of the intersection of Main and Republic streets, the street car was traveling ahead of appellants' automobile. Defendant Layman, who was driving the automobile, testifies that, before reaching the intersection, the street car was ahead of him; that there was a machine or two parked along the sidewalk on Main street; that there was no room to pass between the machines and the car; that he wanted the street car, which was traveling very slowly, to run on; and that he ran on slowly behind the car until he had passed the machines parked along the sidewalk, when he swung his automobile beside the street car and ran along beside it at about 12 miles an hour. It will thus be seen that the jury may well have been justified in finding that the driver of the automobile, while traveling in the same direction as the street car, saw the car slow down to permit the entrance of passengers, and, instead of bringing his automobile to a stop behind the car when it stopped, continued on his course, intending to pass the car as it stood waiting for passengers, as he doubtless would have done had he not collided with the respondent.

[2-4] "Appellants contend that, before leaving the sidewalk to board the street car as it stood in Main street opposite her, respondent, as a matter of law, was in duty bound to look toward the north to see if any automobile was approaching, and, further, that, had she so looked, she necessarily must have seen appellants' on-coming automobile, and that, therefore, her testimony that she did look and saw no automobile is not enough to support a verdict in her favor—citing in support of this contention Chrissinger v. Southern Pacific Railway Co., 169 Cal. 619, 149 Pac. 175, an action against a steam railway company. * * * There is no positive duty to stop, look, and listen when a pedestrian is about to cross a city street. * * * Blackwell v. Renwick, 21 Cal. App. 131, 131 Pac. 94; * * * Clark v. Bennett, 123 Cal. 275, 55 Pac. 908. Compare also Scott v. Traction Co., 152 Cal. 604, 610, 93 Pac. 677. The question of negligence under the usual rule of ordinary care that devolves upon foot travelers, must be examined in the light of all the attendant circumstances, one of which may be knowledge of the existence of a statute or an ordinance prescribing certain fixed regulations for observance by automobile drivers. And it may be that if the jurors in this case rejected, as improbable, respondent's testimony that she looked and saw no approaching automobile, they, nevertheless, concluded—as well they might—that if she did not see the automobile before leaving the sidewalk, she reasoned that its driver would comply with the city ordinance, referred to in the court's instructions, requiring an automobile traveling behind a street car to stop 10 feet in the rear of the car if it stops to let off or take on passengers, until the passengers have safely alighted from or boarded the car. Whether, if she saw the automobile, respondent would have been warranted in going toward the street car without further watching the automobile approach, relying upon a compliance by the appellants with the requirements of the ordinance, was a question upon which men's minds might well differ, and hence it was properly a case for the jury. * * *

[5] "2. Neither can we hold that there was not sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding that appellants were guilty of negligence. The evidence was such that this question was wholly within the province of the jury. [Scott v. Traction Co., supra.]

"3. We see no reason for reversing the judgment on account of any alleged prejudicial error in the matter of instructions. The court substantially in the language of the Motor Vehicle Act [of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 639)] instructed the jury to the effect that automobiles approaching an intersecting street shall be under the control of the operator; that it shall be the duty of the operator, when overtaking another vehicle, to sound an audible and suitable signal before passing; and that the driver of an automobile, when passing street cars operated in the city, shall operate his automobile 'with due care and caution, so that the safety of passengers alighting from or boarding such street car shall be protected, and for that purpose said vehicle shall be brought to a full stop, if reasonably necessary to obtain his object.' The court, substantially in the language of the ordinance above referred to, likewise instructed the jury as follows: 'If you believe * * * that the defendant Layman was in the employ of the defendant Scott, and was driving his automobile * * * in a southerly direction on Main street at or near the intersection of Republic street * * * and that * * * a street car was proceeding in a southerly direction on said Main street; that the said street car had stopped * * * for the purpose of permitting passengers to alight therefrom, or to board the same; and that the defendant Layman violated the ordinance of the city of Los Angeles prescribing and directing that the driver of an automobile must stop the same at least 10 feet in the rear of such street car * * * until such passengers, or intended passengers, have * * * boarded said street car, * * * and that the defendant Layman failed and neglected to so stop said automobile, * * * but proceeded to pass the street car in violation of said ordinance, and that by reason thereof plaintiff sustained injuries, then you should find for plaintiff—if you further find that at that time the plaintiff was in the exercise of reasonable care with regard to her own safety.' It is not disputed that, at the time of the accident, there was an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles prescribing regulations substantially as set forth in the instruction last quoted. It is, however, contended: (1) That the State Motor Vehicle Act is the controlling law upon the subject, and that it was error to give an instruction embodying the regulatory provisions of the city ordinance; (2) that an instruction on both the state law and city ordinance, where they are distinct and independent declarations of law, is error; and (3) that, instead of instructing that a violation of the ordinance, when the proximate cause of the injury, is negligence, the court erroneously instructed the jury, in absolute terms, that, if appellants violated the ordinance in the particular designated, and if, by reason thereof, plaintiff sustained injuries, 'then you should find for plaintiff.'"

[6, 7] Upon a careful reconsideration of the appellants' contention that the State Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 is the controlling law upon the subject, and that it was error to give an instruction embodying the regulatory provisions of the city ordinance, we are constrained to confirm the opinion of the District Court of Appeal that the municipal ordinance in the respect noted was not inconsistent with the state law, but was valid and operative in the city of Los Angeles at the time of the plaintiff's injury. And this, we think, is so regardless of the question of whether or not the regulation of the traffic upon the streets of a city is a "municipal affair." Conceding that if there were in fact a conflict between the ordinance and the Motor Vehicle Act, the state law would prevail, still we find no conflict or inconsistency between the two enactments. The state law requires that a motor vehicle be operated with due care and caution when it overtakes a street car which is stopping on a city street to receive or discharge passengers, and further provides that the vehicle shall be brought to a full stop if reasonably necessary for the safety of such passengers. The municipal ordinance requires that the vehicle shall in all cases be stopped at a distance of 10 feet in the rear of the stopping street car. The ordinance certainly does not attempt to make lawful the performance of any act forbidden by the state law. It follows that a conflict, if any, can exist only upon the theory that the ordinance prohibits that which is affirmatively authorized by the Motor Vehicle Act. In short, the appellants are placed under the necessity of contending that that act affirmatively authorizes motor vehicles to pass a stopping street car in a city whenever the apparent risk involved in so doing would not deter an ordinarily prudent and careful driver. We do not so construe the statute. Where the Legislature has assumed to regulate a given course of conduct by prohibitory enactments, a municipality with subordinate power to act in the matter may make such new and additional regulations in aid and furtherance of the purpose of the general law as may seem fit and appropriate to the necessities of the particular locality, and which are not in themselves unreasonable. Mr. Justice Henshaw stated in the case of In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 118, 99 Pac. 517, 519 (132 Am. St. Rep. 75), that the correctness of this principle cannot be doubted. He continues:

> "If the state should pass a law declaring it unlawful to erect a chimney of a height exceeding 150 feet, would any one seriously contend that a city of the state within the earthquake zone might not by ordinance, in the clear exercise of police power, for the benefit of its citizens, still further restrict the height of chimneys? Such, in principle, is the present case. The Legislature has in effect declared that it shall be unlawful to sell milk containing less than 11.5 per centum solids, 3 per centum of which solids shall be milk fat. An ordinance of a municipality requiring of the milk vended therein a larger percentage of solids, if not in its exactions unreasonable, does no violence to the law of the state. The state's declaration merely is that milk shall not be sold containing less than 11.5 per centum of solids, 3 per centum of which shall be milk fat. If the city of Los Angeles had provided that milk might be vended which contained less per centum of milk fats than that exacted by the state law, there would be presented a plain case of conflict. The municipality would be endeavoring to legalize that which the state had declared to be unlawful. But what the city has in fact done has been to impose not fewer, but additional, qualifications upon the milk which may be vended to its consumers. The state in its laws deals with all of its territory and all of its people. The exactions which it prescribes operate (except in municipal affairs), upon the people of the state, urban and rural, but it may often, and does often, happen that the requirements which the state sees fit to impose may not be adequate to meet the demands of densely populated municipalities; so that it becomes proper and even necessary for municipalities to add to state regulations provisions adapted to their special requirements. Such is the nature of the legislation here questioned."

It is true that in the case of In re Hoffman, supra, the state statute therein considered was general in its terms, and made no distinction between regulations applicable in urban and those applicable in rural communities, whereas the Motor Vehicle Act makes express provision that certain rules shall apply in business districts, that other rules shall apply in territory which is closely built up, and that still different rules shall apply in country districts. But it does not follow that, because the Legislature has seen fit to distinguish in the operation of the act between urban and rural communities and to make certain general rules applicable in all of the cities of the state, it has thereby impliedly prohibited the enactment of additional local regulations by municipalities in keeping with the purpose of the general law. The question whether the Legislature has undertaken to occupy exclusively a given field of legislation is, we think, to be determined in every case upon an analysis of the statute and of the facts and circumstances upon which it was intended to operate. Such was the analysis made in the case of In re Hoffman, supra. The opinion of this court in Ex parte Hong Shen, 98 Cal. 681, 684, 33 Pac. 799, 800, was based upon the same process of reasoning. There it was said:

> "Our Constitution provides that 'any county, city, town, or township, may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.' Article 11, § 11. It is claimed by the petitioner that, inasmuch as the Legislature has regulated the sale of certain poisons, including opium, by the acts above referred to, it is not within the power of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco to make another regulation or to prohibit the sale of opium; that an ordinance is in conflict with the general laws when it makes another and different regulation for the sale of an article of commerce than that provided by a statute of the state.
> "The soundness of this contention we cannot admit. They may be different regulations without a conflict. * * * So, in the action at bar, the Legislature has simply prohibited the sale of opium, and certain other poisons, unless a certain record is kept. It has not directly authorized the sale of opium without the prescription of a physician; it has not legislated upon that subject at all, except in providing that where a physician's prescription is presented no other record need be kept. The city has gone further than the statute, and provided that no opium shall be sold without a prescription. While the regulation is different from that of the state there is no conflict, and therefore it is not in violation of the provision of the Constitution quoted above."

Upon a careful analysis of the Motor Vehicle Act of 1913 and of its purpose viewed in the light of the traffic conditions upon which it was intended to operate, we are of the opinion that the reasoning of the court in the case last quoted is decisive of the question now presented. In other words, we believe that by extending the operation of the act in terms to the traffic upon city streets the Legislature did no more than to prescribe obviously necessary safeguards for travel upon such streets viewed as part of the public highways of the state in which all of the people of the state are essentially interested, and that it did not thereby intend to prohibit the enactment of such new and additional police regulations in furtherance of the purpose of the act as might appear reasonable and proper in a given locality. It is true that the Motor Vehicle

Act of 1915 expressly limited the scope of such police regulations. Stats. 1915, c. 188, § 22d. It may perhaps be open to question whether the ordinance here in controversy falls within the prohibition of that act, but it is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that the Motor Vehicle Act as in force at the time of the plaintiff's injury did not contain a clause prescribing limitations upon the local regulation of traffic. Moreover, the very fact that subdivision "d" was added to section 22 of the Motor Vehicle Act in 1915 shows, we think, that the construction which we have placed upon the act as it stood at the time of the plaintiff's injury accords with the legislative intent.

The remaining contentions of the appellants are fully and correctly answered in the remaining portion of the opinion of Mr. Justice Finlayson, which we adopt as follows:

[8] "Nor was it prejudicial error to instruct the jury in the language of both the state law and the ordinance. Upon this point appellants cite Sheppard v. Transit Co., 189 Mo. 362 [87 S. W. 1007], where the court enunciated the well-recognized doctrine that where two inconsistent instructions are given, one declaring the law correctly and the other erroneously, the one that declares the law correctly does not cure the error of the other. But here there is no inconsistency between the specific requirements of the ordinance and the more general requirement of the state law that the driver of an automobile passing a street car 'shall operate the vehicle with due care and caution,' and shall bring it to 'a full stop if reasonably necessary' to the safety of passengers alighting from or boarding such street car. The ordinance has simply declared what, under certain circumstances, shall be necessary to constitute 'due care and caution' for the safety of such passengers. Furthermore, if as we hold, the ordinance is operative * * * appellants were not injured merely because, in another part of the instructions, the court gave certain of the provisions of the state law that prescribe for appellants less onerous requirements.

[9] "We perceive no prejudicial error in the instruction to the effect that, if the jury believed appellants violated the ordinance, 'and that, by reason thereof, plaintiff sustained injuries, then you should find for the plaintiff, if you further find that at that time the plaintiff was in the exercise of reasonable care with regard to her own safety.' Assuming that it would have been more consonant with time-honored usage to have told the jury that a violation of the ordinance is 'negligence,' for which, if such violation was the proximate cause of her injuries, respondent could recover, nevertheless, in the instruction as given the court not only told the jury that respondent herself must be free from contributory negligence, but that, to entitle her to a verdict, they must find, not only that appellants violated the ordinance, but that 'by reason thereof'—that is, by reason of their violation of the ordinance—'plaintiff sustained injuries.' By this language the jurors were told, in effect, that they could find for respondent, she being free from contributory negligence, if her injuries were caused by appellants' violation of the ordinance. It was not necessary for the court to add that they could find for respondent if, and only if, appellants' acts were the 'proximate' cause of her injuries; for, in other instructions given by it, the court fully instructed the jury that, to find a verdict for plaintiff, they must not only find that the defendants were negligent, but 'also that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff,' and likewise instructed the jury as to the meaning of the phrase 'proximate cause.' The instruction complained of, which is one of a series, cannot fairly be torn from its context for criticism. The instructions, as a whole, show that the jurors were fully advised as to the necessity for finding that respondent's injuries resulted from appellants' conduct as the proximate cause thereof."

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

In re MOORE'S ESTATE.

MOORE et al. v. McKEVITT.

1. Wills 🔑260—"Contest of Will"—Offer of Later Will.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1327, 1333, as to conclusiveness of will not contested within a year after probate, does not bar the offering, more than a year after such probate, of another document as a subsequent and genuine last will; such offer not being a contest of the will admitted to probate, in view of section 1299, providing that a will may be offered "at any time" after testator's death, and section 1423, as to procedure when a later will is offered.

2. Witnesses 🔑258—Testifying from Papers in Legal Proceedings.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, allowing testimony from a writing, although witness retains no recollection of facts, on the issue of testator's mental capacity, it was error to refuse to allow testator's former attorney, testifying from a document in the form of a bill of exceptions, prepared by such attorney while its contents were fresh in his memory, using the court reporter's notes to check it, which purported to contain testator's testimony in an action, to state what testator testified to while on the witness stand in such action.

3. Witnesses 🔑258 — Testifying from Writing—"May."

Code Civ. Proc. § 2047, providing that a witness "may" testify from a writing, though he retain no recollection of the particular facts, is mandatory, and allowing such testimony is not discretionary.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, May.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1066—TRIAL 🔑252(22)—INSTRUCTION—SUPPRESSION OF EVIDENCE.

An instruction with respect to the presumption of law that evidence willfully suppressed would be adverse if produced was error, there being no evidence of suppression, and the error held prejudicial, in view of argument of counsel.

5. EVIDENCE 🔑78—SUPPRESSION OF EVIDENCE.

In a will contest, failure to call as witnesses those named as legatees is not necessarily suppression of evidence.

Angellotti, C. J., and Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Thomas W. Moore, deceased. A purported will was admitted to probate in 1914, and Charles Moore, William A. Moore, and Stella Moore Tolle were appointed, respectively, administrators and administratrix of the estate. In 1916, another purported will, of date subsequent to the will first probated, was offered, to which the above parties filed written opposition. From a judgment against the validity of the second will, Hugh K. McKevitt appeals. Reversed.

Marcel E. Cerf, C. H. Sooy, and A. B. Weiler, all of San Francisco, and Netherton, Johnston & Snyder, of Santa Cruz, for appellant.

Charles M. Cassin and James L. Atteridge, both of San Jose, J. Early Craig, of San Francisco, and John H. Leonard, of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment pronounced after verdict of a jury declaring that Thomas W. Moore was not of sound and disposing mind on November 21, 1908, at the time of executing a purported will.

Mr. Moore died on May 12, 1914. A purported will, dated January 13, 1896, was admitted to probate on June 19, 1914. In accordance with the terms of this writing, respondents Charles Moore, William A. Moore, and Stella Moore Tolle, nephews and niece of the deceased, were appointed, respectively administrators and administratrix of the estate. In October, 1916, a purported will, bearing date of November 21, 1908, was offered for probate, with a petition, asking not only for its admission, but praying that the letters previously issued be revoked, and that those persons who had been administering the estate be required to account to an administrator to be appointed under the later will. Respondents filed written opposition to the later will, based upon the alleged unsoundness of the testator's mind at the time of the execution thereof. They were successful in their contest.

[1] Respondents deny the jurisdiction of the superior court to entertain the appellant's petition, upon the ground that under sections 1333 and 1327, Code of Civil Procedure, no contest of a will may be effectually maintained. Section 1327 provides that the probate of a will may be contested within one year after such probate. Section 1333 makes the probate conclusive (except as to those under certain disabilities) unless there has been a contest filed within one year. If, as respondents contend, the offer of another document as a genuine last will, more than a year following the probate of a writing having the characteristics of a testament, is a contest of the probate, these sections would seem to be conclusive. Respondents cite and quote at length from the opinion in Estate of Adsit, reported in Myrick's Probate Decisions, at page 266, in which that learned jurist adopted the view expressed by Page, in his work on Wills (section 322), that the profert of a will discovered after an earlier will has been admitted to probate necessarily involves a contest of the probated will and must be made within the time limited for contest. Respondents also cite with apparent confidence the Estate of Marx, 174 Cal. 762, 767, 164 Pac. 640, L. R. A. 1917F, 234. In that case Mr. Justice Shaw, who prepared the opinion, was discussing the effect of the subsequent offer of an earlier will after one of later date, not disposing of the entire estate, had been probated, and it was held that, where the two writings could be so construed together as to constitute the last will of the testator, it was the court's duty to give them such effect. In the course of the discussion in the opinion the following language was used:

> "After a will has been probated, and another paper of an earlier date is found, which constitutes a part of the last will of the decedent, together with that already probated, it is not necessary to revoke the former order of probate. A different question would be presented, if the earlier will had been the one first discovered and probated. In that case, the later will, if admitted to probate, would partially supersede and revoke the prior will if inconsistent in part only, or wholly revoke it if entirely inconsistent. Within the year from the first probate, the later will could be offered for probate in connection with a petition to revoke the probate of the earlier one, if it was inconsistent therewith, on the ground that the later will substantially affected the validity of the will probated, as provided in subdivision 4 of section 1312 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1327, 1328, 1329, 1330. After that period perhaps the probate of the earlier will would be conclusive so far as it disposed of the estate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1333; State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 233, 81 Am. Dec. 118. The present petition was filed within the year, and therefore the precise question last mentioned does not arise."

Counsel for respondent insists that this is a decision upon the question presented in the case now under consideration. We do not agree with this contention. The court was not there seeking to define the rights of one offering a subsequent will which would by its terms utterly supersede one of earlier date previously probated. Some of the possible objections to such an offer were suggested for the purpose of illustrating the fact that the wills of Marx and the order and date of their presentation involved quite a different problem.

Appellant's contention is that, while section 1333, Code of Civil Procedure, relates to the conclusiveness of the unopposed probate of a will against a contest, the offer of another will is not a contest of the one admitted to probate. This position is well taken. There can be no question that the probate of wills is purely a creature of statute, and that we must look to the statutes pertaining to estates of deceased persons rather than to those of general application, if we seek to define the powers and limitations of the probate courts. For example, this court has recently held that the general statute of limitations does not apply to a proceeding to probate a will. Estate of Hume, 176 Pac. 681. In the opinion in that case attention is called to the fact that section 1299, Code of Civil Procedure, contains the declaration that any person interested in the estate "may, at any time after the death of the testator, petition the court having jurisdiction to have the will proved." This implies that there is no arbitrary time limit, and the provisions for contesting the validity of a will containing nothing in the nature of a statute of limitation, it follows that no such ground may be urged on demurrer to a petition for probate of a will. Such, in brief, are the reasons for the decision in the Hume Case. Upon like reasoning, it may be said that presentation of a later will for probate is not enumerated as one of the grounds of contest to a will of earlier date previously offered and that, therefore, the conclusiveness of probate arising by reason of section 1333, Code of Civil Procedure, is only potent against a contest of the will which has not been attacked within the statutory period therein prescribed, but not against the offer of another and a later will. It is true that a will may be contested upon any questions "substantially affecting the validity of the will" (section 1312, Code Civ. Proc.), and respondents assert that the production of a testament of later date than the one previously offered for probate, raises just such a question. There might be some force in this assertion, were it not for the fact that the Legislature has elsewhere specifically provided for the procedure to be followed when a later will is offered for probate in place of one already proven in due form. Section 1423 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so far as material here, is as follows:

> "Upon the admission to probate of a later will than the one before admitted to probate, the pre-existing grant of letters testamentary or of administration must be revoked."

It will be apparent from an examination of the statutes and authorities relating to the results, respectively, of a successful contest and the admission of a posterior will to probate, that the latter was not regarded by the Legislature or the courts as equivalent to the former. Upon the successful revocation of a will the powers of the executor cease ipso facto. Section 1331, Code Civ. Proc.; Estate of Crozier, 65 Cal. 332, 4 Pac. 109; In re Freud, 73 Cal. 555, 15 Pac. 135. But upon the admission to probate of a posterior will the pre-existing grant of letters testamentary must be revoked. Section 1423, Code Civ. Proc. The necessity for specific revocation of prior letters upon the probate of a subsequent will differentiates that procedure from a will contest. Moreover, section 1423, Code of Civil Procedure, is not found in the chapter of the Code relating to contests. It is clear that the legislative intention was to keep distinct and separate the practice respecting contests from that to be followed in petitioning for probate of a will and after probate of an earlier writing. As was well said by the Supreme Court of Tennessee in the opinion in Murrell v. Rich, 131 Tenn. 378, 404, 175 S. W. 420, 427:

> "The latter proceeding does not in any respect question the correctness of the judgment rendered by the probate court in the former proceeding. The paper here involved does not speak as the will until established by the judgment upon the issue devisavit vel non; nor does that judgment assail, collaterally or otherwise, the correctness of the proceeding or the judgment for the probate of the Clarendon will. The judgment probating the will here involved on the issue devisavit vel non in the circuit court, if that judgment shall be affirmed, may, in connection with the revocatory clause of the will, render null the Clarendon will. But this result does not flow from any collateral attack made either upon the proceedings or judgment which established the Clarendon will. It flows from the law which gives vitality and force to the last testamentary act of the testator."

It has been held that petitioning for probate of a will later in date than one containing a proviso which cuts off with a small legacy all who may contest it does not bring the proponent of the later will within the terms of the proviso. Estate of Bergland, 177 Cal. 227, 170 Pac. 400. And in Estate of Walker, 160 Cal. 547, 117 Pac. 510, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89, it was determined that a decree of distribution in a supposed intestate's estate, although it had become final, did not prevent the probating of a subsequently discovered will. Upon the principles announced in the opinions in those cases and in the authorities therein cited, we must hold that the offer for probate of the second will in this proceeding was not a contest, and that therefore the superior court had jurisdiction of the matter.

This we believe to be in accord with the weight of authority in other jurisdictions. The general rule seems to be that courts of probate have inherent power to set aside their own orders admitting wills to probate upon the discovery of later and inconsistent wills. In Waters v. Stickney, 94 Mass. 1, 90 Am. Dec. 122, the action of the probate court was approved in a proceeding in which after admitting a will to probate and after the time for appealing from the decree had passed, the court admitted a codicil to the same will, written upon the back of the leaf upon which the will was inscribed; such codicil having escaped attention at the time of the probate of the original will. In the opinion of the court, written by Mr. Justice Gray, the following language appears:

> "By the practice of the English ecclesiastical courts, a will may be proved either in common form, ex parte, upon being presented by the executor; or in solemn form, after notice to all parties interested—which last accords with our practice in all cases of probate of wills. When a will is proved common form, the court may, upon the subsequent application of any party interested and notice to the executor, at any time within 30 years, order that will, or a later one, if produced, to be proved in solemn form. 1 Williams on Executors (5th Am. Ed.) 282, 300, 508; Case of Executors, Hetley, 77; Ridgway v. Abington, 3 Swab. & Tristr. 3. And probate of a will, granted upon the mistaken supposition that the testator is dead, may be revoked and canceled by the court which granted it. Goods of Napier, 1 Phillim. R. 83. Even when a will is proved in solemn form, it is within the jurisdiction of the court, for sufficient cause shown, to revoke the probate. The English authorities recognize, as sufficient causes of revocation, forgery of the will, fraud in obtaining probate, neglect or mismanagement in conducting the suit, or the production of a later will."

In New York it was provided by an early statute (2 Rev. Stats. 1829, p. 61, § 29) that—

> "The probate of any will of personal property, taken by a surrogate having jurisdiction, shall be conclusive evidence of the validity of such will, until such probate be reversed on appeal, or revoked by the surrogate, as herein directed, or the will be declared void by a competent tribunal."

The following section (30) contained the provision that—

> "Notwithstanding a will of personal property may have been admitted to probate, any of the next of kin to the testator may, at any time within one year after such probate, contest the same, or the validity of such will, in the manner herein provided."

And section 31 is as follows:

> "For that purpose, such relative shall file in the office of the surrogate by whom the will was proved, his allegations in writing, against the validity of such will, or against the competency of the proof thereof."

These sections are followed by those outlining the procedure in the contest of a will. In Campbell v. Logan, 2 Brad. Sur. (N. Y.) 90, the surrogate, in a learned opinion, held that although a will has been admitted to probate a legatee under a later will may propound it for probate and is not concluded by the probate of the other will. In the course of the opinion the following language appears—language which is very persuasive in view of the fact that the sections reviewed are the very ones from which the corresponding parts of our probate act of 1851 were copied and now embodied in our Code (Hittell's General Laws of California, p. 820 [2d Ed. corrected, published in 1870]):

> "The statute has provided the means of enabling the next of kin of a testator, within a year after the probate, on filing allegations against the validity of the will or the competency of its proof, to compel the executors to prove the will anew; and, after hearing the proofs, if the surrogate decide the will to be invalid, or not sufficiently proved, he may annul and revoke the probate thereof. But no provision has been made for revoking the probate, where another and later will is subsequently discovered. And yet such a case may often occur after proof of a previous will, and the parties in interest under the last will be deprived of their rights, without notice and without fault or negligence, unless a remedy exists beyond the express provisions of the statute."

The learned surrogate also in the same opinion used this language:

> "It is true, the revised statutes define the jurisdiction of the surrogate, and direct its exercise 'in the cases and in the manner prescribed by the statutes of the state' (2 R. S. [3d Ed.] p. 318, § 1); but the power to take the proof of wills being given generally, the mode of its exercise in a case not provided for by statute, must be regulated by the court in the exercise of a sound discretion according to the peculiar circumstances of each particular case. For example, there can be no doubt that a legatee or party interested in a later will, discovered after a previous will has been admitted to proof, has a right to have the last will proved and letters testamentary issued thereon. But there cannot be two last wills and two sets of letters at the same time. It is incidental, therefore, to the exercise of jurisdiction in taking probate of the last will, and the consequent grant of letters, to revoke the first probate and the first letters testamentary."

If this be a correct declaration of the law (and we so regard it) section 1423, Code of Civil Procedure, is merely a statement of the rule already in effect.

In Gaines v. New Orleans, 6 Wall. (73 U. S.) 642, 704 (18 L. Ed. 950), the court said:

> "But it is said the probate of the will in dispute cannot stand, because there was no direct action by the Louisiana court annulling the probate of the will of 1811. This was not necessary. The probate of the will of 1813, by the mere fact of its probate, necessarily annulled the will of 1811, so far as its provisions were inconsistent, and so far as the estate was not legally administered under it. And this precise point was decided in the Hennen Case."

In Gaines v. Hennen, 24 How. (65 U. S.) 553, 567 (16 L. Ed. 770), the following language was used:

> "Courts of probate may for cause recall or annul testamentary letters, but they can neither destroy nor revoke wills, though they may and often have declared that a posterior will of a testator shall be recognized in the place of a prior will which had been proved, when it was not known to the court that the testator had revoked it."

In 3 Redfield on the Law of Wills (2d Ed.) 123, 124, Waters v. Stickney, supra, is cited with approval as a learned examination of the powers of probate courts in Massachusetts and "incidentally throughout the country, and in England." And that case is cited with warm approval in the opinion in Cousens v. Advent Church, 93 Me. 292, 45 Atl. 43.

In Bowen v. Johnson, 5 R. I. 112, 73 Am. Dec. 49, the court emphatically declares the implied power, in the absence of any statute, of a court of probate to revoke probate of a will once granted by it upon discovery of a later testament, citing, with approval, Campbell v. Logan, supra, and Schultz v. Schultz, 10 Gratt. (Va.) 358, 60 Am. Dec. 335. Other cases supporting this same authority of probate courts to probate later wills are Vance v. Upson, 64 Tex. 266, Gale v. Nickerson, 144 Mass. 415, 11 N. E. 714, and Cunningham v. Souza, 1 Redf. Sur. (N. Y.) 462.

That there is some authority holding or seeming to hold that the profert of a later will is a contest of one previously admitted to probate is true, but the weight of authority is the other way. In State ex rel. Wood v. Superior Court of Chelan County, 76 Wash. 27, 135 Pac. 494, the court granted a writ of prohibition on the ground that a contest of a probated will involved in the presentation to the probate court of a later will was barred by a statute of limitations. The question here involved was not discussed and apparently was not suggested. Hardy v. Hardy's Heirs, 26 Ala. 524, and Watson v. Turner, 89 Ala. 220, 8 South. 20, were also cited by respondents.

The first of these cases was an appeal from an application to have a later will admitted to probate after the expiration of 5 years from the probate of an earlier testament. The law of Alabama provided that a will might be contested by a bill in chancery within 5 years after its admission to probate. As the provisions of the later writing were in part inconsistent with the earlier one, the court held that the offer amounted to a contest, which was neither in the mode nor within the time prescribed by the statute. No authorities are cited in the brief opinion, and the question here discussed seems not to have been considered. In the later case the decision in the Hardy Case is followed, and the court lays stress upon the fact that the ancient power of courts of equity to probate later wills is, in Alabama, entirely taken away by the statute permitting courts of chancery to entertain bills of contest. Gaines v. Hennen is cited, and the court says:

> "Prior to this statute there can be no doubt of the fact that the inherent jurisdiction of probate courts in this country, as of ecclesiastical courts formerly in England, embraced the power to set aside the probate of a will at any time upon the discovery of a posterior will of the testator, and upon proper proof of its execution by the testator."

The Alabama cases, therefore, must be regarded merely as interpretations of the peculiar statute of that state. In this connection it is well to remember that proof of a writing as a will, as well as will contests, in California are committed to the superior court sitting in probate.

Concluding the discussion of this branch of the case we decide that the lower court was clothed with jurisdiction to consider the offer of the later will by appellant and the objections to it by respondents.

[2] Appellant's next contention is that the case of the successful contestants of the later will was dependent entirely upon opinion evidence, and that the opinions of the witnesses were unsupported by any evidence of facts which would indicate incapacity to make a will. It was the theory of respondents that Mr. Moore became so feeble of mind as to be totally unfit to make a will in 1875, and that from that time until the day of his death the incapacity continued. Some of them testified that ever since 1875 he had been dirty, blasphemous, given to amorous approaches to women, and that he always appeared irrational; yet two of the witnesses did not apparently have any scruples against acting as executor and executrix, respectively, of their uncle's first will. There is no mistaking the theory upon which respondents opposed the later will, because their counsel, early in their brief, make the following declaration:

> "We make bold to assert that at all times from the year 1875 up to the 12th day of May, 1914, when Thomas W. Moore died, he was a driveling idiot; that his mind was absolutely unsound; that he was childish and simple, and was so regarded by all persons. Further, that as administrator of the estate of William H. Moore, deceased, he was no more than a rubber stamp in the hands of his attorneys and advisers."

In view of these theories of the contending parties and the wide scope of the testimony describing events extending over a period of many years, it became very important to appellant to get into the record authentic evidence of the conversation and conduct of the testator at any time during the years between 1875 and his death, which would tend to support the theory that he was of sound mind and not an imbecile. If any such material evidence was improperly excluded appellant is entitled to a new trial. We think there was such error committed, and are therefore spared the task of deciding the correctness or fault of the contention that the opinions of the witnesses of respondents were unsupported by sufficient evidence of facts. In other words, we shall assume that the verdict was based upon conflicting testimony.

Before discussing the evidence excluded, it may be well to quote some of the testimony of Mr. Moore, given in a proceeding pending in Judge Graham's court, in San Francisco, 12 days before the execution of the later will. He had made application for change of guardian, and was examined and cross-examined as a witness in open court. Proof of his testimony there given was offered and received. It was in part as follows:

"Thomas W. Moore called as a witness in his own behalf, being duly sworn, testified as follows:

"Mr. Cantrell: Q. Who is your present guardian? A. William A. Moore.

"Q. What relation is he to you? A. He is a nephew of mine.

"Q. How many times have you seen your guardian, Mr. Moore, in the last two years? A. I have seen him about three times.

"Q. About three times in the last two years? A. He has called on me about three times in the last eight years.

"Q. Has he ever provided a home for you or a residence? A. No, sir.

"Q. Has he ever asked you to go down and live with him at Pescadero? A. No, sir.

"Q. Where does he live now? A. Pescadero.

"Q. How far is that from here? A. About 50 miles.

"Q. Were you in San Francisco during the time of the earthquake and fire here? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did your guardian come up to attend to you in any way? A. No, sir. I never saw him for a year after that.

"Q. He left you entirely on your own resources, to hunt a home for yourself? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Your physicians reside in this city and county? A. Yes, sir; all of them.

"Q. Where do you think that you get proper treatment for your complaint? A. I would not take treatment anywhere else but in San Francisco.

"Q. You don't think you could be treated properly elsewhere? A. No, sir; I have tried nearly all the doctors in the world. I have traveled all over Europe hunting doctors.

"Q. Where are you living now? A. On Steiner street—1114 Steiner street.

"Q. Who got that place for you? A. I got it.

"Q. Your present guardian never provided a place for you to live in at any time? A. He did not provide a place for me.

"Q. At the time that the guardian was appointed in Judge Troutt's department, did he make any representations to the court what he would charge? A. He said he never wanted a cent. He said, 'He is my uncle,' and he never wanted a cent.

"The Court: Q. What are the relations between you and your guardian now—friendly? A. He is my nephew.

"Q. Do you want him to continue to act as your guardian? A. No, sir."

On cross-examination he testified, in part, as follows:

"Mr. Craig: Q. You say he does not give you money enough—how much money does he give you? A. I get $600 a year.

"Q. And how much do you want? A. I want $75 or $100 a month. I need that very bad, because when that $50 was allowed me everything was very cheap, and now it is very high. I can't buy clothes. I bought all my own clothes since he has been my guardian. He never bought me but one suit—one coat. * * *

"Q. Isn't $50 enough to pay your board and get your clothes? A. No, sir; it does not satisfy my desires at all.

"Q. How much does your board cost you? A. I cannot get board less than $30.

"Q. And you have $20 left for your personal expenses? A. Yes, sir.

"Mr. Cantrell: Q. Part of your expenses, of course, is your physician. You have a running expense with the physician at all times? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You say you lived at Stanyan street before you lived on Steiner street; who provided that place for you on Stanyan street? A. I did.

"The Court: Q. You feel that you are capable of getting your own home? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. You don't want your guardian hanging over you all the time? A. No, sir; I don't want the guardian around me at all.

"Q. What do you want this young man removed for? A. Because he don't pay me, and don't see me, and don't pay any attention to me.

"Q. You get your $50 every month. A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What else can you expect from a guardian? A. I want him to pay me more money.

"Q. Is that the only trouble? A. That is the main trouble.

"Q. Do you understand the situation here—there is a heavy mortgage on this ranch—$8,000? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. And it takes nearly all the income from the ranch to pay for that mortgage outside of keeping you? A. Not by a long shot. He has the ranch rented for $1,800 a year for the last five years."

In answer to his own counsel, he testified as follows:

"Q. You are very friendly with Capt. Dahler? A. He is my friend, I know.
"Q. He has been very good to you? A. Very good to me indeed. He is better than my guardian, a great deal.
"Q. How long have you known Mr. Dahler? A. About a year."

And to questions by the court he replied:

"Q. Where did you meet Mr. Dahler? A. I met him first at Mrs. Sheerer's.
"Q. And you and Mr. Dahler became friends? A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Mr. Dahler says he is willing to assume this guardianship and act as companion to you? A. Yes, sir.
"Q. Have you ever stopped at the Tolle home? A. No, sir.
"Q. How about you and Mrs. Oscar Tolle—are you good friends? A. I don't know her hardly at all."

Notwithstanding this testimony, the jury was convinced of the testator's imbecility, perhaps upon the theory that the apparent lucidity of the old man's mind in 1908, as shown by his testimony, was but due to a temporary absence of symptoms of a lifelong condition of mental incompetency. It therefore becomes apparent that testimony given by Mr. Moore at any other period of his life after 1875 might be of great value to the jurors and its exclusion, therefore, highly prejudicial to the proponents of the second will. Mr. Warren Olney, who for many years had represented Mr. Moore as his attorney, was called as a witness, and testified that in his opinion the testator was of sound and disposing mind during the entire period of their acquaintance. Mr. Olney was shown a document setting forth that which purported to be the testimony of Mr. Moore on the witness stand at a trial in the superior court of Santa Cruz county. This document was in the form of a transcript of a bill of exceptions, and was indorsed as filed March 12, 1889. Regarding this paper Mr. Olney testified in part as follows:

"I recognize the document shown me. It is a correct statement of what transpired in court at the time stated in the document. I prepared this document myself while its contents were fresh in my memory, using the court reporter's notes to check it. The portion shown to me is testimony given by Thomas W. Moore on the witness stand at the date stated in the document. It is a correct statement of what Mr. Moore said on the witness stand. Looking at the document does not sufficiently refresh my memory to cause me to remember and narrate what Mr. Moore testified to, or the other facts stated in the document; but I know that the document is a correct statement of what occurred."

The court refused to allow the witness, testifying from the document, to state what Mr. Moore testified to while on the witness stand on the occasion indicated, and also denied the offer of defendant to put parts of the transcript in evidence to show the date and nature of the proceeding and Mr. Moore's testimony. Mr. Olney's testimony was clearly admissible. Section 2047, Code Civ. Proc. Respondents' counsel concede that perhaps the reporter who made and transcribed the notes of Mr. Moore's testimony would be permitted to read from his transcript, but deny that any one else might do so. They also call attention to the fact that the transcript did not purport to contain all the testimony of the witness. Both contentions are without force. Mr. Olney had heard the testimony, as well as the reporter. He prepared the document himself while the contents were fresh in his memory, "using the court reporter's notes to check it." True, it was in narrative form, but it contained "a correct statement of what Mr. Moore said on the witness stand." The omission of the questions which elicited Mr. Moore's answers made them none the less his statements, and they were proper matters for the jury's consideration, under appropriate instructions, whether they were all or only part of his declarations. It would seem from Mr. Olney's testimony that the transcript contained all of his client's testimony; but that is not material, as it is perfectly competent for a litigant to offer a part of the narrative of a witness for the purpose of illustrating his mental condition.

[3] But counsel for respondents call attention to that part of section 2047 which provides that a witness "may testify from such a writing, though he retain no recollection of the particular facts," and insist that the admission or rejection of such testimony is within the sound discretion of the trial court. Even if this were the meaning of the quoted language, we would be constrained to declare that under the revealed circumstances the court abused its discretion. We are convinced, however, that the quoted language from section 2047, Code of Civil Procedure, is mandatory. That a stenographer has a right to read from notes of testimony taken at the time there can be no doubt. People v. Sexton, 132 Cal. 37, 64 Pac. 107; Burbank v. Dennis, 101 Cal. 90, 35 Pac. 444; People v. Ammerman, 118 Cal. 23, 32, 50 Pac. 15. The tendency of courts, although there is some difference in the practice in different jurisdictions, is towards liberality rather than strict technicality in the application of the rules with respect to the admission of this sort of evidence as may be seen from an examination of the text and citations in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence (16th Ed.) § 439b. It has been held in Illinois that a witness, who is testifying from recollection, when refreshed by a memorandum consisting of a transcript of testimony in another case, may adopt the language of the transcript as relating the substance of the facts within his recollection. Iglehart v. Jernegan, 16 Ill. 513, 520. Solomon Railroad Co. v. Jones, 34 Kan. 443, 458, 8 Pac. 730, is very similar to the case at bar. There the attorney who had prepared the bill of exceptions in another case and had an original recollection from his insight into the case, but depended largely upon the transcript was permitted to read from the bill. We will not lengthen this opinion by quotation from this bill of exceptions, but merely say in passing that the testimony of Mr. Moore, as set forth in the rejected memorandum, was quite as lucid as that adduced in Judge Graham's court many years later.

[4, 5] The court gave the familiar instruction with respect to the presumption of law that evidence willfully suppressed would be adverse if produced. This was error because the record fails to disclose any instance of suppression of evidence or anything that could be properly construed as such withholding of facts in defendant's possession. That, under the circumstances, the error was prejudicial there can be no doubt, and this is emphasized when we note that one of the counsel for respondents, in his argument, sought to apply the rule subsequently announced in the instruction to the circumstance that no person named in the will had been called as a witness. Failure to call as witnesses those named as legatees is not suppression of evidence, and there was no showing that under the facts of this case it became such suppression. It is argued, however, that no advantage may be taken of the erroneous statement of counsel in argument, because no exception was taken to it and it was not assigned as error—citing People v. Babcock. 160 Cal. 537, 545, 117 Pac. 549, a case in which not erroneous statement of law, but alleged misconduct was the issue. The alleged error was not in the argument merely, but in the subsequent instruction which seemed to ratify the misapplication of the rule with reference to suppression of evidence. Under the authority of Estate of Carpenter, 94 Cal. 406, 419, 29 Pac. 1101, and Thomas v. Gates, 126 Cal. 1, 58 Pac. 315, the giving of the instruction under the circumstances must be held error.

We concur: LENNON, J.; WILBUR, J.; SHAW, J.

OLNEY, J., does not participate.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (dissenting). I cannot concur in the conclusion that the superior court could properly entertain the petition for the probate of the alleged later will, in the face of the judgment admitting the will of January 13, 1896, to probate. That judgment had become final, and more than one year having elapsed from its entry without any contest, the probate of such will is conclusive against the world, except infants and persons of unsound mind. It is so expressly provided by section 1333, Code of Civil Procedure. The whole matter of wills is regulated in this state by statute. Under our statute, as has often been said, the proceeding in proof of a will is a proceeding in rem, "to determine the legal status of a written instrument," in which all persons are required to present their claims and by which the world is bound. See Estate of Baker, 170 Cal. 578, 585, 150 Pac. 989; Estate of Allen, 176 Cal. 632, 169 Pac. 364. A judgment admitting a written instrument to probate as the will of a deceased person is necessarily a judgment that the instrument is the will of the deceased, which, of course, means that it is his last and only effective will. When a paper is offered for probate as the will of a deceased person, if any person interested claims that it is not the true will for the reason that there is a later will, he unquestionably may contest the paper offered on that ground, for his contention is one "substantially affecting the validity of the will" offered. Subdivision 4, § 1312, Code Civ. Proc. As in the case of original probate, such a contest may be made after probate on the ground that the admitted will is not the will, because of the execution of a later will. The petition for probate necessarily tenders to the whole world the issue that the paper offered is the will of the deceased, and the whole world is bound by the judgment, except in so far as the statute permits further proceedings.

The only further proceeding authorized by the statutes is the contest of the validity of the admitted will, which must be instituted within one year from probate, with the right to infants and persons of unsound mind to so contest within one year after their respective disabilities are removed. It is my opinion that in the absence of any such contest within the year, the status of the instrument as the last will of the deceased is conclusively and for all time established as against all interested parties in so far as any proceeding in the probate court is concerned. This it seems to me is substantially recognized in all our previous decisions, for even in Estate of Walker, 160 Cal. 547, 117 Pac. 510, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89, all the justices concurred as to the question of finality of the proceedings in probate, and the probate of the subsequently discovered will was justified by the majority of the justices concurring in affirmance as being solely for the purpose of establishing a foundation for the prosecution by the beneficiaries of their rights in equity. It was certainly expressly recognized in Estate of Marx, 174 Cal. 762, 164 Pac. 640, L. R. A. 1917F, 234, as is shown by the majority opinion herein.

The effect of the majority opinion in this case apparently is that a decree admitting a will to probate is not an adjudication that the will so admitted is the will of the deceased, but simply that it is an instrument that was at one time duly executed as a will which will stand as the will pending the production and probate of a later instrument so executed. Such I do not believe to be the theory of our statutory system relative to the proof of wills. Therefore I am constrained to dissent from the judgment.

LOS ANGELES INV. CO. v. HOME SAV. BANK OF LOS ANGELES.

1. Banks and Banking 🔑148(2)—Forged Indorsement of Check—Liability.

Generally, if a bank pays out money on a check drawn to order on a forged indorsement of the payee's name, it has not paid in accordance with the depositor's order, and has no right to charge the payment against the account.

2. Banks and Banking 🔑148(2) — Forged Indorsement of Check — Liability — Negligence.

A bank which pays out money on a check drawn to order on which the payee's indorsement has been forged is liable to the depositor, irrespective of the bank's freedom from negligence.

3. Bills and Notes 🔑6—Bearer Paper.

Paper drawn to the order of a fictitious payee is payable to bearer, but is not considered so where the maker did not know the fact, but believed the payee designated to be an existing person.

4. Bills and Notes 🔑6—Checks to "Fictitious Payees."

Where the officers of an investment company authorized to sign its checks signed checks to the order of fictitious payees on demand of the fraudulent manager of the company's insurance department without any knowledge the payees were fictitious, such checks were not made to "fictitious payees," and were not payable to bearer; the company not being bound by the guilty knowledge of its fraudulent manager.

5. Principal and Agent 🔑180—Knowledge of Agent—Imputation.

A principal will not be charged with the knowledge of its fraudulent agent adverse to the principal and against the agent's interest to reveal.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑842(7)—Review—Finding.

A finding of negligence on the part of plaintiff, in the absence of a conflict in the evidence, was not a finding on a question of fact concluded on appeal by the finding; the conclusion being one which could not reasonably be drawn from the probative facts in evidence.

7. Banks and Banking 🔑148(3) — Payment on Forged Indorsements—Contributory Negligence.

Investment company, which drew checks on the requisition of the manager of its insurance department relying upon his honesty and the regularity of his demands on their face, held not guilty of any negligence inducing or contributing to the payment by a bank of such checks drawn to the order of fictitious payees whose indorsements were forged by such fraudulent manager.

8. Banks and Banking 🔑148(3) — Payment on Forged Indorsements—Contributory Negligence.

Any negligence of an investment company in drawing on the mere requisition of the manager of its insurance department checks to the order of fictitious payees whose indorsements were forged by the manager held not to have contributed to or induced the acceptance of such forged indorsements by defendant bank.

9. Banks and Banking 🔑148(4) — Payment on Forged Indorsements—Examination by Depositor.

A bank depositor is not bound to examine the indorsements on returned checks, though he is bound within a reasonable time to ascertain the genuineness of the checks themselves.

10. Banks and Banking 🔑148(4)—Payment on Forged Indorsements.

Though there was an account stated between a bank and its depositor by the rendition of semimonthly statements, such account stated could be opened by the depositor for fraud or mistake, as mistake by the depositor in drawing checks on the requisition of the manager of its insurance department to fictitious payees whose indorsements were forged by the manager and the checks cashed with the bank.

11. Banks and Banking 🔑148(4)—Agreement in Passbook—Binding Force.

Before a bank, sued by its depositor to recover the amount of checks paid on forged indorsements, can avail itself of a statement headed "Agreement with Depositor," printed in front of the passbook, which statement provides that after 10 days the depositor cannot question the genuineness of indorsements, etc., the bank must prove the statement was called to the attention of some responsible officer of the depositor, a corporation.

12. Banks and Banking 🔑154(3)—Payment on Forged Indorsements—Tender Back of Checks.

Where a bank paid checks of its depositor on forged indorsements, and on demand by the depositor for payment of the amount involved took such a position that tender back of the checks to it by the depositor would have been an idle ceremony, such a tender back was not required.

13. Appeal and Error 🔑173(4)—Raising Question.

Such a point as lack of tender by plaintiff to defendant, which plaintiff might and in all probability could have met by sufficient evidence if objection had been made during trial on such ground to any recovery, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Investment Company, a corporation, against the Home Savings Bank of Los Angeles, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Flint & Jutten and L. W. Jutten, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Herbert J. Goudge, Charles L. Chandler, and Goudge, Williams, Chandler & Hughes, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action to recover $16,009.20, the aggregate of certain checks drawn by the plaintiff upon its deposit account with the defendant bank and paid by the latter on forged indorsements. The defendant had judgment in the court below, and the plaintiff appeals.

The material facts are not in dispute, and are these:

The plaintiff is a large concern in Los Angeles, engaged in many lines of the real estate business. Among other activities, it acted as a solicitor and broker of fire insurance, and had a separate department for attending to this class of business. The manager of this department was one F. R. Emory. As might be supposed, the business of the department required the constant making of disbursements, which were made by check. Emory had no authority to sign checks, and the method of obtaining them was for the insurance department to prepare a demand or requisition for the payment, showing what it was for and to whom it was to be made. This requisition was then transmitted to the accounting department, where it was examined and, if found correct, approved and entered on the plaintiff's books. A check in accordance with the demand was then prepared and presented with the approved demand to the officers authorized to sign checks. Upon being signed, it was returned to the insurance department for delivery to the party to whom payment was to be made. So far as appears, there would seem to be no substantial difference between the system adopted by the plaintiff for the signing of checks and making of disbursements and those followed by most large concerns.

Beginning with February 17, 1914, and ending September 11, 1915, Emory prepared a series of some 20 demands on behalf of his department for checks in payment of ostensible claims against the company which did not in fact exist. Several of the demands gave a purely fictitious name as the name of the party to be paid. In the other cases the name of a person known to Emory was used, but such person had nothing whatever to do with the matter, was utterly ignorant of it, and Emory had no intention of making any payment to him. The demands in some cases appeared to be for return of premiums In the other and the majority of cases they appeared to be in settlement with an agent for premiums collected by the company.

Checks were signed by the officers of the company in accordance with these demands and returned to Emory for delivery to the ostensible payees. Upon their receipt, Emory indorsed them in the name of the ostensible payees, then indorsed his own name, and secured their payment, in most cases by direct presentation to the defendant, and in other cases through other banks.

In addition to the 20 checks so signed upon false demands, there was one check signed upon a bona fide demand and in favor of a genuine payee, which Emory, instead of delivering, realized upon in similar fashion by forging the payee's indorsement.

During the period between the first and the last of these checks, the bank sent the usual bank statement with canceled checks to the plaintiff every half month; the statement specifying that claims or exceptions must be made within 10 days or the account would be considered correct.

[1] The general rule must be conceded that the undertaking of a bank is to pay out the depositor's money only on the order of the depositor and in accordance with that order. If it pays out money on a check drawn to order, as were the checks in this case, upon a forged indorsement of the payee's name, it has not paid in accordance with the depositor's order, and, in the absence of anything further, has no right to charge such payment against the depositor's account.

To escape from the operation of this elementary rule, the bank advances five defenses:

First, that it was not negligent in paying on the forged indorsements.

Second, that the checks were drawn to fictitious payees and were therefore, in effect, payable to bearer, with the result that the payments to Emory, who was the bearer, were in accord with the terms of the depositor's order.

Third, that the depositor was guilty of negligence which induced or contributed to the payments, and therefore was estopped from insisting on the responsibility of the bank.

Fourth, that the rendition of the half-monthly statements to the plaintiff and the latter's failure to object thereto constituted a stated account between the parties which could not be gone behind.

Fifth, that the plaintiff had not offered to return the checks in question, and this was a condition precedent to its right of recovery.

[2] In regard to the first defense, want of negligence on the part of the bank, it is evident on very slight consideration that it is wholly immaterial whether the bank was negligent or not in paying on the forged indorsements. The obligation of the bank is not merely to use reasonable care to pay on the depositor's order and in accordance therewith. Its undertaking and obligation are absolute that it will pay only in that manner. If we have the simple case of a payment on a forged indorsement without anything further, it makes no difference how careful the bank was in making payment or how impossible of detection the forgery was. That is a risk which the bank and not the depositor assumes. 3 R. C. L. p. 542; 1 Morse on Banks & Banking, § 474; Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 38, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529.

[3] As to the second defense, it is true that paper drawn to the order of a fictitious payee is payable to bearer, and if the checks here are of that character the bank was justified in paying them. But it is also true that paper is not considered as drawn to a fictitious payee where the maker did not know it to be so drawn but believed the payee designated to be an existing person. 8 Corpus Juris, 179; Hatton v. Holmes, 97 Cal. 208, 31 Pac. 1131.

It is also true that the payee named in several of the checks had no existence in the mind of Emory, and that the payees named in all of the others with one exception—that prepared on a bona fide demand—were persons to whom Emory did not intend the checks to come. As to Emory, the payees, with the single exception noted, were all fictitious. The question is: Were they fictitious as to the plaintiff company?

The answer to this question obviously depends upon whether Emory's intention that the checks be made payable to persons who were not to receive the paper, who were nonexistent so far as the checks were concerned, is attributable to the company. The bank's counsel in their brief say:

> "But appellant did intend something when it issued the checks. What was it? It intended that the money be paid to the person to whom Emory intended it to be paid—and the money was so paid."

[4, 5] This is the very crux of the matter. But is it true? Plainly it is not. Emory did not execute the checks on behalf of the company. It is the intention of the officers who did that must be taken to be the intention of the company. The execution of the checks was one within the scope of their authority, not within that of Emory. As to these officers, it is plain that they did not intend to execute checks to fictitious parties or to pay money to the person to whom Emory intended it should be paid, to wit, himself. They intended to pay money to what they believed to be existent persons, and, this being so, the checks cannot be considered as made to fictitious payees.

Nor is the company bound by the guilty knowledge of Emory. That knowledge was adverse to his company and such as in the nature of things he would not communicate to it. It is elementary that a principal will not be charged with knowledge of an agent under such circumstances. Henry v. Allen, 151 N. Y. 1, 45 N. E. 355, 36 L. R. A. 658; United, etc., Co. v. Central, etc., Bank, 185 Pa. 586, 40 Atl. 97. This, of course, is very different from an agent binding his principal by acts done within the scope of his authority, although done with knowledge and intent adverse to his principal; and we have no intention of saying that an agent may not bind his principal under such circumstances. It may well be that in this case, if Emory had had authority to draw checks, and had drawn these particular ones making them payable to fictitious payees, his intent in this respect would, in legal effect, as to third persons be the intent of the company, although such intent was adverse to the company and part of a scheme to defraud it. But charging a principal with knowledge merely because such knowledge is possessed by an agent, and charging him with acts done by the agent within the scope of his authority, are not the same thing, and it is only in the latter case that the principal may be bound by the uncommunicated information or intent of the agent when such information or intent is hostile to the principal. The point in this case is that the checks were not executed by the guilty agent; we are not concerned with an act done by him within the scope of his authority, and therefore his guilty intent and knowledge are not the intent and knowledge of his principal. The intent and knowledge of the principal was, as we have said, that of the officers who drew the checks, and they were wholly innocent of any intention of drawing checks to fictitious payees.

There is eminent authority to sustain the foregoing views. In Shipman v. Bank, 126 N. Y. 318, 27 N. E. 371, 12 L. R. A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821, the facts and contentions are practically identical with those of the case at bar. One Bedell, an employé of the plaintiffs and in charge of their real estate department, secured from time to time checks of the plaintiffs with which to pay parties whom Bedell represented were borrowing money from or through the plaintiffs. Some of these alleged borrowers were real persons, who were not, however, borrowing any money and to whom Bedell had no intention of delivering the checks. Others were nonexistent persons. The checks were in each case made payable to the order of the alleged borrower. Bedell, on receiving the checks, forged the names of the ostensible payees, and had the checks presented to the defendant bank on whom they were drawn, which paid them. The amount involved was very large, and the case was elaborately presented and argued by eminent counsel. In reply to the contention that the checks were payable to fictitious persons and therefore to bearer, the court said (126 N. Y. 330, 331, 27 N. E. 374, 12 L. R. A. 791, 22 Am. St. Rep. 821):

> "It is claimed by the defendant that the 16 checks made payable to the order of persons having no existence were, in legal effect, payable to bearer. It is provided by statute that paper made payable to the order of a fictitious person and negotiated by the maker has the same validity 'as against the maker and all persons having knowledge of the facts, as if payable to bearer.' 1 R. S. 768, § 5.
> "We are of the opinion, upon examination of the authorities cited by counsel on both sides, that this rule applies only to paper put into circulation by the maker with knowledge that the name of the payee does not represent a real person. The maker's intention is the controlling consideration which determines the character of such paper. It cannot be treated as payable to bearer unless the maker knows the payee to be fictitious and actually intends to make the paper payable to a fictitious person. Irving National Bank v. Alley, 79 N. Y. 536; Turnbull v. Bowyer, 40 N. Y. 456 [100 Am. Dec. 523]; Vagliano v. Bank of England, L. R. 22 Q. B. D. 103; s. c. on appeal 23 Q. B. 243; Armstrong v. Pomeroy Nat. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512 [22 N. E. 866, 6 L. R. A. 625, 15 Am. St. Rep. 655, 7 Railway and Corporation Law Journal, 114]; Gibson v. Minet, 1 H. Black. 569.
> "The findings of the referee that the plaintiffs in good faith believed that the names of the payees represented real persons, entitled to receive from them the amount of the check in each case, having been led to believe this by the fraudulent contrivances of Bedell, and that they intended that Bedell should deliver the check to a real payee therein named and that they did not intend that they should go into circulation or be paid by defendant otherwise than through a delivery to and indorsement by the payee named; and that plaintiffs gave no authority to Bedell to indorse the name of the payee, or to put the checks into circulation, and that no one in fact relied on any appearance of authority, derived from the plaintiffs, in Bedell to indorse the payee's name upon the checks or to put them in circulation—dispose of this question. The indorsement of the names of the fictitious payees upon the checks, with intent to deceive and to put the checks in circulation, constituted the crime of forgery by means of which, and without any fault of the plaintiffs, payment was obtained thereon. The defendant does not occupy any different position with reference to the checks payable to fictitious payees than it does with reference to those payable to real parties whose indorsements were forged.
> "Bedell, of course, knew that the payees were fictitious, but he was not acting within the scope of his employment, but in carrying out a scheme of fraud upon the plaintiffs, and under such circumstances his knowledge cannot be imputed to his principals. Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209 [38 Am. Rep. 501]; Weisser v. Denison, 10 N. Y. 68 [61 Am. Dec. 731]; Welsh v. German American Bank, 73 N. Y. 424 [29 Am. Rep. 175]; Cave v. Cave, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 643, 644."

Identical facts and contentions also appear in Jordan Marsh Co. v. National Shawmut Bank, 201 Mass. 397, 408, 87 N. E. 740, 743 (22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 250). Upon the point under immediate discussion the court said:

> "The question arises whether the making of a check payable to a fictitious or nonexisting person, through negligent failure to discover the fraud by which the check is obtained, stands differently from making a check to an actual person, in reference to its effect upon payment by the defendant. We are of opinion that there is no difference in law. In either case it is the duty of the bank to see that there is a genuine indorsement. In some respects it would be more difficult to deceive a bank in this particular, as against vigilant investigation, if the payee was fictitious than if he were real. In some respects it might be less difficult. We know of no decision that has recognized a difference in law between the two cases. It has been held that there is no difference. Armstrong v. National Bank, 46 Ohio St. 512, 6 L. R. A. 625, 22 N. E. 866 [15 Am. St. Rep. 655]."

To the same effect is U. S. v. Nat. Bank of Commerce, 205 Fed. 433, 123 C. C. A. 501.

The bank's counsel rely largely to sustain their position upon two decisions, Phillips v. Mercantile Nat. Bank, 140 N. Y. 556, 35 N. E. 982, 23 L. R. A. 584, 37 Am. St. Rep. 596, and Snyder v. Corn Exchange Bank, 221 Pa. 599, 70 Atl. 876, 128 Am. St. Rep. 780. The facts in these two cases were much the same as those in the case at bar, with a very important exception, viz., that the dishonest employé had authority to draw checks and did himself draw the very checks in question. In both cases the decision is put upon this ground and on this ground distinguished from Shipman v. Bank, supra.

[6, 7] As to the third defense, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which induced or contributed to the payment of the checks by the bank, the only negligence claimed is in the officers of the plaintiff signing the checks on the false demands or requisitions of Emory, and in the failure of the plaintiff to discover the forgeries more promptly. The lower court found such negligence, and it is urged upon us that the question being one of fact is concluded on appeal by such finding. This is not true, of course, if there is no conflict in the evidence (and there is none), and the conclusion of negligence is one which cannot reasonably be drawn from the probative facts put in evidence. We are much inclined to the opinion that negligence cannot be reasonably inferred from the probative facts in this case. The company had rather an elaborate system of approving, checking, and entering demands before checks were drawn to pay them. It was, as we have said, very similar to the systems found in other large corporations. Complaint is chiefly made that the company relied upon the honesty of its heads of departments and the regularity on their face of the demands or requisitions which such heads approved, and make no investigation to determine whether such demands were fraudulent or not. But trust must be placed in some one (Kohn v. Sacramento, etc., Co., 168 Cal. 1, 141 Pac. 626; The Yamato v. Bank, 170 Cal. 351, 149 Pac. 826), and necessarily in heads of departments. If trusting them in regard to demands for checks for disbursements regular upon their face is negligence, so it would be negligence to trust them in a hundred other ways in which it is within their power to defraud their employer. Business could not be conducted on any such basis. It is impossible for any large concern to investigate minutely in advance every demand for disbursement necessary for it to make in its daily business. The delay and expense of so doing would be too great.

[8] But however this may be, even if the company were guilty of negligence in signing the checks upon the fraudulent demands of Emory, it is plain that such negligence did not contribute to or induce the acceptance by the banks of the forged indorsements. The forgery of the indorsements was entirely distinct from the issuance of the checks on false demands, and there was no relation between them. This is clearly shown by the fact that Emory could just as easily have forged indorsements on and secured the payment of checks issued on genuine demands, and in fact did so in one instance.

This point also is discussed in Jordan Marsh Co. v. National Shawnut Bank, supra, and the matter is there summed up as follows (201 Mass. 408, 87 N. E. 742, 22 L. R. A. [N. S.] 250):

> "But the whole duty of seeing whether there is a forgery of such an indorsement upon any check rests primarily upon the banker. The drawer of the check has nothing to do with that. Ordinarily he makes no representation that has any relation to it. In the case just supposed he made no representation in regard to it. The checks payable to the order of A. L. Sefton, which she did not indorse, were wrongly paid, and the defendant's liability for payment is like that for the payment of any other check bearing such a forged indorsement. The plaintiff had nothing to do with the payment, or with the defendant's performance or nonperformance of its duty to see that payment was made to the right person. There are many cases that illustrate the rule that negligence of the maker is immaterial unless it is of a kind that directly and proximately affects the conduct of the banker in the performance of his duties. [Citing many cases.]"

[9] The other particular in which it is claimed that the plaintiff was negligent is, as we have said, that the plaintiff did not examine more carefully the canceled checks as they were returned to it, and discover the forgeries earlier. The plaintiff did indeed make some examination of the returned checks to see that the indorsements were regular. But a depositor is not bound to examine the indorsements on returned checks. He is bound within a reasonable time to ascertain the genuineness of the checks themselves (Janin v. London, etc., Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82); but, as to indorsements, the rule and its reason are correctly stated in Shipman v. Bank, supra.

> "The defendant's contract was to pay the checks only upon a genuine indorsement. The drawer is not presumed to know, and in fact seldom does know, the signature of the payee. The bank must, at its own peril, determine that question. It has the opportunity, by requiring identification when the check is presented, or a responsible guaranty from the party presenting it, of ascertaining whether the indorsement is genuine or not. When it returns the check to the depositor, as evidence of a payment made by his direction, the latter has the right to assume that the bank has ascertained the fact to be that the indorsement is genuine. Weisser v. Dennison, 10 N. Y. 68 [61 Am. Dec. 731]; Welsh v. German American Bank, 73 N. Y. 424 [29 Am. Rep. 175]; Frank v. Chemical Nat. Bank, 84 N. Y. 209 [38 Am. Rep. 501]; First Nat. Bank v. Whitman, 94 U. S. 347 [24 L. Ed. 229]; Leather Mfg. Bank v. Morgan, 117 U. S. 107 [6 Sup. Ct. 657, 29 L. Ed. 811]."

See, also, Jordan Marsh Co. v. Nat. Bank, supra; United, etc., Co. v. Central, etc., Bank, 185 Pa. 586, 40 Atl. 97; German, etc., Bank v. Citizens', etc., Bank, 101 Iowa, 530, 70 N. W. 769, 63 Am. St. Rep. 399; Guaranty, etc., Co. v. Lively (Tex. Civ. App.), 149 S. W. 211; Masonic, etc., Ass'n v. First State Bank, 99 Miss. 610, 55 South. 408.

[10] As to the fourth ground of defense, that there was an account stated between the parties by reason of the rendition of semimonthly statements by the bank to the plaintiff and no objection made by the plaintiff, it is the rule that an account stated may be opened for fraud or mistake shown. The mistake in this case is plain, and the rule is as applicable to an account stated between a bank and a depositor as to any other. Shipman v. Bank, supra; Jordan Marsh Co. v. Shawmut Nat. Bank, supra; Janin v. London, etc., Bank, supra; 3 R. C. L. 532.

> "In accepting this passbook it is understood that the Globe Savings Bank in receiving notes, drafts and checks on points other than Los Angeles, either for collection or credit, shall transmit the same in the usual manner for collection, either to the bank on which the same are drawn, or to such bank or persons as it may deem reliable, with the express understanding that the same is done solely for account and convenience of the depositor, and that the Globe Savings Bank shall in no way be liable for default of any such bank, person or subagents, or for loss in transit, or for any other cause whatever, until the proceeds in actual money shall come into its possession.

"It is also further expressly agreed and declared that it is a condition upon which the Globe Savings Bank accepts the deposits of, pays the checks of, and does business for the depositor herein named, that whenever this book may be written up by the said bank and returned to said depositor with checks drawn by said depositor on, and paid by said bank, and other vouchers, by personal delivery, messenger, mail or otherwise, said depositor shall, within 10 days after receipt thereof make such examination of the account and the returned vouchers and checks as will satisfy him (or her) of their correctness, genuineness and regularity, both as to face and indorsements, and that a failure by said depositor to report in writing anything to the contrary to said bank within 10 days after such delivery, shall be deemed positive and conclusive evidence that the examination as above has been made by said depositor, and that the account and checks and vouchers have been found correct in all the particulars above indicated, and that after the said 10 days shall have elapsed without objection or notice to the said bank of errors or omissions, the said depositor shall not have the right as against the said bank to question or dispute the genuineness, regularity or correctness of the said account, vouchers, or checks or any of them concerning the amount thereof, or the signatures or other writing on the face of said checks or the indorsements, or other writings on the back thereof."

This statement is not signed by the plaintiff, nor is there any showing that it was called to the plaintiff's attention or wittingly agreed to by it. It is just the character of thing that the average man would not trouble to read, or reading would fail to appreciate the significance of the inclusion in it of "indorsements," and the fact that it very materially changed the usual obligation of a bank to its depositors. There is no reason, so far as we know, why a depositor may not make such an agreement if he deliberately chooses to do so, unreasonable as it is. But it is evident that the statement comes in the category of "traps for the unwary," and before such statement can be given effect as a contract binding upon the depositor and changing in a substantial particular the relation which presumably he thought he was entering into, it must appear affirmatively that he consented and agreed to it either by being required to sign it or by having his attention particularly called to it. It is not sufficient merely that it appear in the front of the passbook. The case is not one in which the party must know that he is accepting a contract, as where he is accepting an insurance policy, and should therefore realize the necessity of acquainting himself with its terms. For this reason it does not come within the principle of such cases as Madsen v. Maryland Casualty Co., 168 Cal. 204, 142 Pac. 51. It is more nearly analogous to the case of special conditions or limitations printed on the back of a railroad ticket. It is also to be noted that probably the passbook never came to the attention of any responsible officer of the plaintiff authorized to make contracts. The actual handling of the passbook and the making of deposits is ordinarily in the case of large concerns intrusted to some subordinate. The case comes within the principles discussed on pages 260 to 263 of 9 Cyc. and is not distinguishable from Neuman v. National Shoe, etc., Exch., 26 Misc. Rep. 388, 56 N. Y. Supp. 193, and Ackenhausen v. Peoples', etc., Bank, 110 Mich. 175, 68 N. W. 118, 33 L. R. A. 408, 64 Am. St. Rep. 338.

In order for the bank to avail itself of the statement as a contract made by the plaintiff, it was necessary for the bank to prove that the statement had been called to the attention of some responsible officer of the company. Without this it cannot be fairly said that it was accepted or consented to by the company, and nothing of this sort appears.

We are not unaware of the numerous authorities holding that a rule or regulation printed in a savings bank passbook accepted by the depositor is binding upon him. Practically all, if not all, of these cases, however, are cases wherein either the circumstances were such that the consent of the depositor to the by-law reasonably appeared, or the bank was a mutual one, the members of which were the depositors who as members were bound by the bank's rules. In practically all of them also the rule involved was a reasonable and customary one, which presumably the depositor would be aware of as an ordinary incident of the relation of savings depositor and bank. The matter is discussed at some length in Ackenhausen v. People's Savings Bank, supra, and with that discussion we agree.

[12] The fifth and last point of the respondent is that the checks were not tendered back to the bank before the commencement of the action. The facts regarding this are that immediately upon the discovery of the forgeries the plaintiff notified the bank in writing of that fact and that it held the bank responsible. Copies of the checks were attached to the notice. The complaint alleges a demand by the plaintiff for the amount of the checks and a refusal by the bank. This allegation is admitted by the answer. The answer also denies liability and sets up other affirmative defenses, but contains nothing whatever relative to any failure by the plaintiff to tender the checks. Apparently, the point was not brought up in any manner at the trial, although at the opening of the trial the question of a demand by the plaintiff was discussed, and the bank's counsel admitted that such demand had been made. The first reference to the nonreturn of the checks is in the findings which contain a finding that the plaintiff has not returned or offered to return them. The conclusions of law contained in the findings, however, show that the decision for the defendant was not placed on this ground. So far as the record shows, we believe it is a fair conclusion that the bank's position from the time it was notified of the forgeries has been one of an absolute repudiation of any liability. Under such circumstances a tender of the checks would have been an idle ceremony, not changing in the slightest the existing positions of the parties, and therefore not required (38 Cyc. 135).

[13] If, however, the record is not sufficent to justify an affirmative conclusion as to the bank's position from the time demand was made upon it, the bank cannot rely upon appeal upon the insufficiency of the record in this respect. It is clear that the point was not made at the trial, that the cause was tried on other issues entirely and as if this point were not present, and that the necessity of proving either tender or an excuse for it was not brought to the plaintiff's attention. Such a point, which the plaintiff might, and in this case in all probability could, have met by sufficient evidence if objection to its recovery had been made on this ground at the trial, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal. Bank of Stockton v. Howland, 42 Cal. 129; Richey v. Haley, 138 Cal. 441, 71 Pac. 499.

We have discussed this point as if a tender of the checks by the plaintiff to the bank were in fact necessary unless excused or waived. Redington v. Woods, 45 Cal. 406, 13 Am. Rep. 190, would seem so to hold. There is, however, strong authority to the contrary (see U. S. v. Nat'l Bank of Commerce, supra, and cases there cited), and we do not desire to be considered as conceding that a tender was in fact necessary.

TUCKER v. BENEKE et al. (L. A. 4936.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑110—Appeals from Judgment and Order—Dismissal of Latter.

On appeal from judgment for defendants and from the order denying plaintiff's motion for new trial, the Supreme Court will dismiss the appeal from the order.

2. Fraud 🔑58(1)—Exchange of Properties—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action by plaintiff for damages from defendants' fraud in the exchange of their city lots for plaintiff's tract of orange land, evidence held sufficient to sustain findings for defendants on all issues.

3. Fraud 🔑49—Action—Waiver and Laches as Issues.

In an action for damages from fraud in the exchange of defendants' city lots for plaintiff's orange land, matters of plaintiff's laches and waiver of any fraud held within the issues, under an averment of the answer deemed denied.

4. Fraud 🔑35 — Misrepresentation — Waiver.

If plaintiff, who had exchanged his orange land for city lots, knew of any fraud, or believed there had been fraud, practiced by defendant owners of the lots, his requesting an extension of time on the mortgage of the lots to defendants was a waiver of their fraud.

5. Fraud 🔑35, 49 — Misrepresentation — Discovery of Facts—Laches.

Where plaintiff, who had exchanged his orange land for city lots, delayed action for fraud and misrepresentation after discovery of the true facts regarding the city property, he was guilty of laches, which the court might find, directly or impliedly, without any pleading on the subject.

6. Fraud 🔑52—Action—Evidence.

In an action for damages from the fraud of defendants in procuring an exchange of their city lots for plaintiff's orange land, plaintiff's letter asking for an extension of time on the mortgage of the lots to defendants, was admissible on the issue of waiver of the fraud.

7. Evidence 🔑271(19)—Self-Serving Letter.

In an action for damages from fraud of defendants in procuring an exchange of their city lots for plaintiff's orange land, purely self-serving letter, written to plaintiff's agent, held inadmissible to prove that at such agent's request a third party investigated the value of the lots some time after the trade was made.

8. Fraud 🔑55—Action—Evidence.

In an action for damages from fraud in the exchange of defendants' city lots for plaintiff's orange land, testimony of the escrow holder, who delivered the papers to plaintiff, held admissible as relevant and important.

9. Fraud 🔑55—Action—Evidence.

In an action for damages from fraud in the exchange of defendants' city lots for plaintiff's orange land, evidence of negotiations of plaintiff's agent for exchange of properties with other persons before the transaction with defendants held admissible, to show that the transaction did not come from defendants' illicit practice upon plaintiff's agent.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by George G. Tucker against John Beneke and George F. Hauser. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. A. Barclay, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Tipton & Cailor, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. [1] Plaintiff sued for damages caused by the alleged fraud of defendants practiced in the exchange of plaintiff's property in California for certain lots of defendants in Portland, Or. After trial, judgment was entered in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appealed, September 8, 1916, from said judgment and from the order denying his motion for a new trial. Regarding the latter appeal, this court will take the usual course and dismiss it. Roberts v. Colyear, 180 Pac. 937.

According to the allegations of plaintiff's "second amended complaint," he was the owner, on March 13, 1913, of certain described real property, 10 acres in area, in Anaheim. The land was planted to oranges and a substantial dwelling house was situated thereon. Plaintiff also owned an interest in a pumping plant sufficient to supply all necessary water for use on the property and certain nursery stock. There were two mortgages on the property, and the net value, as set forth in the complaint, was $5,400.

It is further alleged that defendants then owned certain described lots in Portland, Or., which they represented to plaintiff were of the value of $7,500; that they lived in Anaheim and knew all about plaintiff's property; that plaintiff was ignorant of the values of Portland real estate; that certain negotiations looking to a trade of the Portland lots for the property in Anaheim were had; that plaintiff, being compelled to leave for Texas, gave power of attorney to Mrs. K. V. Barton, who then resided near Anaheim, to make some disposition of his property. Then follow allegations that defendants represented to Mrs. Barton that the two Portland lots were worth $7,500, and that each lot was 100 feet front by 100 feet in depth; that, believing and relying on said statements Mrs. Barton, on March 13, 1913, entered into a written agreement with defendants for an exchange of the properties, and subsequently completed such exchange, executing and delivering to defendants a mortgage for $1,750, paying an assessment of $350 for street work on the lots in Portland, and exchanging deeds; and that shortly thereafter Mrs. Barton departed for England. Defendants (it is alleged) entered into possession of the property at Anaheim, sold the nursery stock for upwards of $3,600, paying off a mortgage on the land with the proceeds. It is further averred that in March, 1915, plaintiff desired to sell the Portland lots and caused an investigation to be made, which revealed for the first time the fraud of defendants; that the lots in Portland were not worth more than $2,500 to $2,900 at the time of the exchange, and that each lot was 50 feet by 100 feet, instead of 100 feet square, as had been represented.

Judgment was prayed for $2,900, the alleged difference between the actual worth of the lots in Portland and the value of plaintiff's equity in the property in Anaheim, for $1,750, the amount of the mortgage on the Portland lots given to defendants, and for certain taxes and interest, amounting in all to $4,600.

Defendants answered, duly traversing the essential averments of the complaint. A trial was had, and the court found, among other things, as follows: But a small part of the orange stock in the nursery was budded at the time of the exchange of land and but little value was added to the Orange county land by said stock. Said property was of no greater value than $11,000, and plaintiff's equity did not exceed $3,400.

Further findings were to the effect that defendants were free from fraud; that neither of them misrepresented the dimensions of the lots in Portland; that plaintiff's attorney in fact was informed that each lot had a frontage of but 50 feet; that prior to the consummation of the exchange the escrow holder of the contracting parties held an abstract and a certificate of title of the Oregon lots, on each of which the real dimensions of the lots were delineated; and that on June 4, 1913, this certificate was shown to plaintiff. The court also found:

> "That the defendants represented that in their opinion the Portland lots were worth $7,500, and gave the basis on which their estimation was based, but that the plaintiff's attorney in fact, K. V. Barton, was informed by one of the defendants prior to the exchange that said lots would not sell for that price at that time; that the value of both the Orange county property and the Portland lots were a trading valuation."

There was a further finding that—

> "The nursery stock did not belong to the plaintiff, but went with the place in the exchange, and that the amount realized therefor was about $600."

It was found likewise that the defendants did not allege that the Portland lots were worth $7,500, but gave that estimate of the value, with their reasons therefor; that, if said lots were worth less, the fact was not known to defendants; that such representations as were made were not made by defendants with intent to deceive the plaintiff or his attorney in fact; and that neither the plaintiff nor said attorney in fact was deceived by such representations. It was also found that—

> "After the plaintiff learned that the Portland lots were each only 50 feet front by 100 feet deep, and of the alleged value of $4,200 only, he sought and obtained from the defendants an extension of time on the mortgage, and that no suit has yet been brought to foreclose the same."

[2] Appellant's counsel, while recognizing the rule that this court may not disturb findings based upon conflicting testimony, insists that there is no substantial conflict regarding the essential matters found by the court, and that therefore this court should reverse the judgment. With this contention we are unable to agree. It is true that there was a sharp conflict of testimony regarding the transaction, and particularly with reference to the understanding of the plaintiff's attorney in fact and plaintiff himself on the subject of the size of the lots, but there was testimony contradictory of theirs upon which the court might act, and evidently did act. It is to be remembered that the court was confronted with the amazing testimony of the plaintiff that, although he received the deed to the Portland property in June, 1913, and then went to Portland and made inquiries about his lots, he did not discover that the smaller dimension of each was only 50 feet until some time in 1915. On this point he deposed as follows:

> "At Portland I had to wait several hours for the train for Lyle, Wash., and went out to find the lots. I found a real estate agent, whose name I do not remember, near the tract where the lots are. I asked him what lots were selling for along there. He said about $35 or $40 per front foot; and, as I understood lots were 100 by 100 feet each, I thought the value was about, or near, what I paid for them, $7,500."

Testifying regarding Mr. Tucker's visit to the First National Bank of Anaheim, just before the plaintiff went to Portland, Mr. Hartung, who had custody of the papers, said:

> "Mr. Tucker came to the bank in the early part of June, 1913. I delivered to him the deed of Beneke & Hauser for the Portland lots, his power of attorney to Mrs. Barton and the deed from Fletcher to him, and took his receipt. (Receipt produced, identified and introduced in evidence, dated June 4, 1913.) At that time I showed Mr. Tucker the certificate of title. He looked it over and saw the map at the back of it. He made no comment on the certificate."

Mrs. Barton testified that the lots were represented to her as being each 100 feet by 100 feet, and the attorney who drew the agreement between the parties produced a memorandum indicating his understanding of the area of the lots to be the same as hers, yet he testified that in drawing the agreement he—

> "put nothing in it as to the size of lots or description of them any more than the number of the lots and the block, thinking that the reference to the map would be sufficient to give the size."

Respondent Beneke testified positively that he told Mrs. Barton the true size of the lots and she said they were very small. This testimony alone, if believed, would support the finding that no misrepresentation as to the size of the lots was made.

Appellant makes vigorous attack upon the finding that the figure of $7,500 was given as the value according to opinion of defendants, accompanied by the basis of estimation, and that one of them told Mrs. Barton, prior to the exchange, that the lots would not sell for that price at that time, and that the value of both the Orange county property and the Portland lots were a trading valuation, but this finding is directly supported by testimony which need not be here detailed. Mr. Hauser gave that version and he was supported by the testimony of his codefendant. Both defendants detailed conversations in which they told Mrs. Barton that property near their lots had sold for prices which they believed justified their estimate, and at the trial experts in realty values at Portland gave testimony tending to support such estimates.

That plaintiff and his attorney in fact did not rely upon the representations of defendants was a finding amply supported. In January, 1913, Mrs. Barton sought information regarding the lots and received from the Bank of Portland a telegram with the statement that the lots were assessed for $1,885, "usually considered about one third actual valuation." Mrs. Barton also had a friend investigate the value of the Portland lots. He reported that they were worth from $30 to $40 a front foot, basing his figures on the estimates of five or six real estate agents in Portland.

The estimates of the value of the Portland lots as given by expert witnesses varied considerably, as did those concerning the true value of the place at Anaheim. Without going through an analysis of all the figures, it is sufficient to call attention to the fact that there was evidence justifying the court's conclusion that plaintiff was not prejudiced by reason of any false representations which might have been made.

Appellant insists that the finding with reference to the value of the stock in the nursery is so flagrantly at variance with the evidence as to necessitate a reversal of the judgment. In the oral argument counsel for plaintiff asserted that there was no testimony supporting the finding that defendants received only $600 as their share of the nursery stock, but that their admitted return from the sale of the young trees was $1,867.53, and he insisted that this discrepancy between the testimony and the findings should compel a reversal of the judgment. With this view of the matter we do not agree. It was alleged in the complaint that defendants sold the nursery stock "belonging to plaintiff." Defendants denied that any stock belonged to plaintiff, but admitted that certain young trees "went with the orange ranch," and that after defendants budded, irrigated, and cared for such nursery stock they received therefor about $600. It was shown at the trial that plaintiff had owned an interest in certain nursery stock on the place. This was transferred to defendants by plaintiff's attorney in fact, on the date of the exchange of the properties, by a writing. It was a part of the trade, and therefore the court doubtless meant by its finding that after that date the nursery stock "did not belong to plaintiff." That the stock was sold for more than defendants alleged their net return thereon to be is wholly immaterial, as the record fails to disclose its value at the time of the trade before defendants put any care and attention upon it. Such value might have been of some use in determining whether or not there was a glaring discrepancy between the values of the two parcels of land, one in Oregon and one in California, at the time of the exchange. The subsequent selling price was a matter without the issues, and the finding, even if erroneous, was immaterial, and therefore without prejudice to appellant.

[3-5] The appellant attacks the finding that after he learned the size of the lots and their value he sought and obtained from defendants an extension of time on the mortgage and "no suit has yet been brought to foreclose the same." The contention is that this finding is not within the issues and that it is not sustained by the evidence. The defendants, by their answer, alleged that within three months subsequent to the consummation of the exchange plaintiff visited Portland and was advised of the size, character, and value of the lots. This averment, under our law, is deemed denied. Thus the matter of waiver of any fraud was within the issues. The matter of laches was also at issue. We have hereinabove adverted to the evidence of appellant's examination of the papers used in making the exchange and to his visit to Portland. The court was justified in regarding such means of knowledge as actual knowledge. Simpson v. Daiziel, 135 Cal. 599, 67 Pac. 1080; Mrs. Barton wrote to Mr. Beneke on December 2, 1914, requesting an extension of time on the mortgage. Of course, if plaintiff and his attorney in fact were ignorant of the time condition when an extension of time on the mortgage was requested and granted, there would have been no room for the application of the doctrines of waiver or laches; but the court found against their theory of excusable ignorance. Therefore this case was fairly within the principles set forth in Schmidt v. Mesmer, 116 Cal. 267, 48 Pac. 54. If plaintiff knew of any fraud, or believed there had been fraud practiced by defendants, his conduct with reference to the mortgage was a waiver of the fraud. His conduct in delaying action after discovery of the facts regarding the property in Oregon amounted also to laches, which the court might find, directly or impliedly, without any pleading on the subject. Stevinson v. San Joaquin & Kings River Canal & Irrigation Co., 162 Cal. 141, 121 Pac. 398. The criticized finding amounts to a declaration that plaintiff's conduct was a waiver and also involved laches.

[6] Several assignments of errors of law were made. One of these relates to the introduction of a letter asking for an extension of time on the mortgage. It is sufficiently answered by the foregoing discussion.

[7] Nor was there error in excluding a letter written to Mrs. Barton for the purpose of proving that Mr. Keller investigated the value of the lots at Portland in March, 1915, at Mrs. Barton's request. It was purely self-serving and threw no light upon the subject of her previous knowledge or ignorance of the true state of the value or dimensions of the Portland lots.

[8] Another alleged error relates to the admission of Mr. Hartung's testimony. He was the escrow holder who delivered the papers to Mr. Tucker in June, 1913. That his testimony was, in our opinion, both relevant and important, appears sufficiently in the analysis of the findings based in part thereon.

[9] The court admitted evidence of Mrs. Barton's negotiations for exchange of properties with other persons before the transaction with defendants. Appellant assigns this as error, asserting that there was no issue justifying its admission. The complaint did allege and the answer denied that defendant Hauser, "knowing of plaintiff's desire to sell," proposed the exchange of properties, and that after Mr. Tucker's departure for Texas the offer was renewed. There were also allegations and attempted proof that confidence was placed in Mr. Beneke by Mrs. Barton and that such confidence was abused by him by his efforts to bring about an exchange. It was therefore competent for him to show, if he could, that although she saw him every day she was trying to exchange the property with another person, and that she made no effort to close the exchange with him after the first inquiries made by her in January, 1913, until March of that year.

No other alleged errors require comment or analysis.

The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

In re ROSS' ESTATE. (L. A. 5705.)

1. Executors and Administrators 🔑504(2)—Accounts—Right to Question.

One to whom the heirs of an estate made conveyances purporting to transfer the legal title to all property which decedent owned has, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1635, 1636, sufficient interest to question the accounts of the administrators.

2. Executors and Administrators 🔑111(1)—Conflicting Claims—Right of Administrator to Bind Estate.

The administrator or executor has no right to take a part in litigation between various parties asserting conflicting rights as heirs, and he has no right to engage attorneys for either claimant, or to bind the estate in any manner on that behalf.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑151(3)—Persons Aggrieved—Personal Representative.

An executor or administrator is not a party aggrieved by a decree determining the portions which various adverse claimants shall take in the residue of the estate for distribution, and cannot appeal therefrom.

4. Executors and Administrators 🔑111(1)—Adverse Claim—Authority to Engage Counsel.

Though one claiming the entire estate of a decedent under an oral agreement with the decedent joined the administrator in a suit against the heirs, held, that the administrator did not have authority to employ counsel to defend against the claim, and is not on accounting entitled to allowances for such counsel fees.

5. Executors and Administrators 🔑484—Advances—Allowance.

Advances made by an administrator to an heir on account of his distributive share cannot be allowed on the administrator's accounting, but are to be allowed only as a credit against the heir's distributive share upon final distribution, and in making payments in anticipation of the decree the administrator acts at his peril, and if the heir be entitled to nothing, the administrator is entitled to no allowance.

6. Executors and Administrators 🔑498—Commissions—Allowance.

Where there be more than one, the statutory commissions must, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1618, be divided between the administrators, so where full commissions were allowed the administrator he cannot on accounting claim credit for a sum advanced to one who was administratrix, as a payment on account of her commissions.

7. Executors and Administrators 🔑513(9)—Settlements of Accounts—Effect.

The settlement of an account is not conclusive, except as to such items as are included in it and actually passed upon by the probate court; so where the court, in settling an account of the administrator, reserved an item, and the second account did not on its face give any indication that a sum set up as a balance shown by the first account was that item, the order of settlement of the second account did not adjudge the propriety of such item.

8. Executors and Administrators 🔑513(9)—Accounts—Settlement—"On Account."

Where the probate court ordered a payment to an attorney of the administrator on account of extraordinary services, held, that the allowance of a further sum was not precluded, for the words "on account" might well have been used to indicate that the allowance was not intended as compensation in full.

9. Executors and Administrators 🔑109(1)—Expenses—Allowance.

Where it was necessary for the administrator of an estate to maintain an office for the estate, and to have stenographic and telephonic service in handling the property, it was not improper for the probate court to allow for the expense of maintaining the office.

10. Executors and Administrators 🔑503—Accounting—Vouchers.

Where the administrator of the estate needed an office, and for that purpose employed his own office force and equipment, and made a flat charge of $15 per month as a fair proportion of the total expense to be borne by the estate, held, that the monthly items might be allowed under Code Civ. Proc. § 1632, up to $500, though no vouchers were produced.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Elizabeth Ross, deceased. From an order settling the final account of the administrator, Maggie G. Steinberger appeals. Reversed, with directions.

J. H. Merriam, of Pasadena, and G. Harold Janeway, Hunsaker & Britland, and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

H. M. Barstow, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is an appeal from parts of an order settling the final account of the administrator of the estate of Elizabeth Ross, deceased. The appellant, Maggie G. Steinberger, claimed the entire estate under an oral agreement with the decedent, and had succeeded in establishing her asserted right in an action brought by her against the administrator and others. The judgment there given in her favor was affirmed by this court in May, 1917. Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432. The character of this litigation bears directly on the present appeal, but we need not elaborate it here, as it is fully described in the opinion cited, and again in the opinion just filed by this department in Estate of Ross (L. A. No. 5758) 176 Pac. ——, which presented the appeal of one Scanlan from two orders made in the course of proceedings for final distribution.

[1] The present appellant attacks the action of the court below in allowing certain credits to the administrator, and various items of compensation to his attorney. The administrator, respondent, makes the preliminary objection that the appellant is not an heir of the decedent or any other "person interested in the estate," and hence not entitled either to contest the account (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1635, 1636), or to maintain an appeal from the order of settlement. Whether or not this point would be meritorious otherwise, the record shows that after the decision in Steinberger v. Young, supra, the heirs, parties defendant in that case, made conveyances purporting to transfer to the appellant the legal title to all property which Elizabeth Ross owned, or in which she had any interest, at the time of her death. Under such conveyances Mrs. Steinberger certainly had the same right to object to the administrator's account that her grantors would have had as heirs.

The items objected to are seven in number, but they may, for purposes of legal discussion, be grouped into four classes.

[2-4] 1. Items 1 and 2 were credits of $41.55 and $190, respectively, claimed by the administrator for expenses incurred by him in the defense of the action of Steinberger v. Young. The third item allowed H. M. Barstow, the administrator's attorney, $1,000 extra compensation for services in that case in the superior court, and a like sum for services on the appeal to this court.

The objection to these items is that the action of Steinberger v. Young was one involving a controversy between Mrs. Steinberger, on the one hand, and the heirs at law of the decedent, and R. E. R. Scanlan, on the other, regarding the disposition of the residue of the estate after administration; that this was a controversy in which the administrator, as such, had no concern, and that he was not, therefore, entitled to defend the action at the expense of the estate. It is settled law in this state that the administrator or executor has no right to take a part in litigation between various parties asserting conflicting rights as heirs, and that he has no authority to engage attorneys for either claimant, or to bind the estate in any manner on that behalf. Roach v. Coffey, 73 Cal. 281, 14 Pac. 840; Estate of Friedman, 168 Pac. 21. On like grounds, such administrator or executor is not a party aggrieved by a decree determining the proportions in which various claimants shall share in the residue available for distribution, and cannot appeal therefrom. Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 463; Jones v. Lamont, 118 Cal. 499, 50 Pac. 766, 62 Am. St. Rep. 251; Estate of Williams, 122 Cal. 76, 54 Pac. 386. These considerations govern the situation before us. True, the action of Steinberger v. Young was not a contest between persons claiming to have succeeded to the estate as heirs. The plaintiff there (appellant here) asserted a right to the residue remaining after administration by virtue of an agreement made by the decedent in her lifetime. But the administrator, as such, has no greater concern in a controversy of this kind than he has in a dispute between various parties claiming to be entitled by succession. Whatever might be said if the question were a new one, we think argument is foreclosed by the decisions of this court in Estate of Healy, 137 Cal. 474, 70 Pac. 455, and McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 Pac. 1008. Following the death of one Healy, and the appointment of an administrator, one Ulty McCabe had instituted an action against Healy's heirs to enforce a contract substantially similar to the one asserted by Mrs. Steinberger in her action against Young. One of the heirs sought to have the administrator removed for the reasons that he had not tried to intervene or to take a part in such action, and that the attorneys representing him as administrator were also acting as attorneys for the plaintiff, McCabe. The court held, in the first of the cases just cited, that these facts furnished no ground for removing the administrator. Referring to the action of McCabe v. Healy, the court said:

> "It is in effect a suit to determine a controversy between different heirs as to their respective rights of inheritance, and in such a controversy it is well settled that the administrator has no interest, but is a mere officer of the court, holding the estate as a stakeholder, to be delivered to those whom the court shall decide to be entitled thereto. * * * There was * * * no ground upon which he would have been authorized to seek to intervene * * * or justified in expending the money of the estate in defending the action against the plaintiff."

The second case (138 Cal. 81, 70 Pac. 1008) was an appeal from the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in McCabe v. Healy. In ruling that the administrator was not a necessary party, the court said:

> "Upon sound reason it is plain he has no interest in the result of the litigation. This litigation involves solely the ownership of the residue of the estate of Matthew Healy, deceased—a matter in which the administrator has no possible interest—a question to him of indifferent concern."

These decisions are conclusive against the contention that the administrator was authorized to expend moneys of the estate in resisting the claim of Mrs. Steinberger, or that his attorney was entitled to compensation from the estate for his services in defending against her action. It is argued that Mrs. Steinberger, in instituting her action, voluntarily made the administrator a party defendant, whereas, in McCabe v. Healy the administrator was not joined. But this circumstance can have no weight in the present inquiry. If, as held in the Healy Case, the administrator was in no way concerned in the determination of the controversy, the mere fact that the plaintiff brought him into the action could not authorize him to charge the estate with the burden of the expense incurred by him in litigating a controversy which affected the heirs alone.

[5, 6] 2. The administrator was allowed credit for $590 for cash advanced by him to Anna M. Scanlan. Mrs. Scanlan was a sister of the decedent, and was, at the time the advances were made, coadministratrix of the estate. Whether the money was received by Mrs. Scanlan as an advance against her supposed interest as heir, or on account of her commissions as administratrix, the item was not properly allowed. Advances made by an administrator to an heir on account of his distributive share cannot be considered upon the hearing of an account, but are to be allowed only as a credit against the heir's distributive share upon final distribution. Abila v. Burnett, 33 Cal. 658; Estate of Willey, 140 Cal. 238, 73 Pac. 998. In making payments in anticipation of the decree of distribution, the administrator acts at his peril, and if, as in this case, it turns out upon distribution that the payee is not entitled to receive any part of the residue, the administrator must look for reimbursement to the person to whom the payment has been made. Nor can the administrator support the credit as a payment to Mrs. Scanlan on account of her commissions as administratrix. In that view, the amount would have to be deducted from the allowance to Mr. Young, since the statutory commissions can be allowed but once, and must be divided between the administrators if there be more than one. Code Civ. Proc. § 1618. Full commissions were allowed Mr. Young in the order under review, and if the $590 item stands, there will have been an overpayment of commissions to this extent.

[7] The administrator claims that the credit for payment to Mrs. Scanlan had been approved by the court on the settlement of a prior account, and that any inquiry into this item was therefore precluded. But the record hardly sustains the claim. It appears that the item was included in the first account. But the court in settling that account expresssly reserved "decision as to the advancements to Mrs. Scanlan." The item did not appear in any subsequent account. It is true that the second account began with a charge of the balance shown by the first account, in which the administrator had claimed credit for this item. But the second account did not on its face give any indication that the $590 was an item of that account, and it cannot be said that the court, by its order of settlement of the second account, adjudged the propriety of the claim of credit. The settlement of an account is not conclusive, "except as to such items as are included in it and actually passed upon by the probate court." Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 63 Pac. 838.

[9, 10] 4. In his account the administrator claimed credit for office expenses for a period of 4½ years, aggregating $810. These items included stenographer's services, stamps, telephone calls, and the like, and the administrator made a flat charge of $15 per month for these items during the period in question. He testified that it was necessary to maintain an office for the estate, and to use a stenographer and telephone service in handling the property of the estate. For these purposes he employed his own office force and equipment, and the charge of $15 per month was estimated by him to be a fair and reasonable proportion of the total expense to be borne by the estate. The court evidently accepted his view, and we cannot say that the conclusion reached was not a proper one. It is objected that there were no vouchers for these charges. Section 1632 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the allowance of "any item of expenditure not exceeding twenty dollars, for which no voucher is produced," if the item be supported by the administrator's uncontradicted oath to the fact of payment, specifying when, where, and to whom it was made. The claim of $810 may well be treated as made up of a series of separate items of $15 each, and these items were, we think, sufficiently supported by the testimony of the administrator. In view of the nature of these charges and the manner in which a proportion of the total expense was allotted to the estate, there could not well be a more definite specification of "when, where, and to whom" the payments were made. But section 1632 further provides that such allowances (unsupported by vouchers) "in the whole must not exceed five hundred dollars," and the item in question must therefore be reduced to this aggregate sum.

The order is reversed, with directions to the court below to settle the account in accordance with the views herein expressed.

1. JURY ⚷116 — CHALLENGE TO PANEL—FORMS FOR DRAWING AND RETURN OF JURY.

Pen. Code, § 1059, as to challenge to panel for departure from forms prescribed in respect to drawing and return of jury, has no application where jury constituting panel is not a drawn jury.

2. JURY ⚷116—CHALLENGE TO PANEL—BIAS OF SHERIFF.

Bias of the officer who summoned the jurors, by Pen. Code, § 1064, made ground of challenge to panel when it is formed from persons whose names are not drawn as jurors, held not shown by the fact that in filling special venire for trial of a woman for forgery, women only, under Code Civ. Proc. § 190, equally competent with men, were summoned, nor by fact that they were all from a part of the county other than where the offense was charged to have been committed.

Anna Manuel was convicted of forgery, and she appeals. Affirmed.

A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment which followed her conviction of the crime of forgery.

The sole error urged as ground for reversal is the ruling of the court in denying defendant's challenge interposed to the panel of jurors summoned to try the case. The ground of the challenge was that—

> "There has been a substantial departure from the form provided by law in this: That the sheriff in summoning the jury failed and intentionally omitted to draw the jury from the whole body of the county, * * * but confined himself to a certain part, namely, the city of Upland, and to a certain class, namely, women; that in so doing the sheriff * * * was biased and prejudiced in summoning this jury."

In support of the motion, it was made to appear that the court made an order directing the sheriff to summon 25 good and lawful persons from the body of the county to act as jurors in the trial of the case; that in compliance with the order the sheriff summoned 25 women, all of whom were residents of that part of the county known as Upland; that his reason for omitting men from the jury was that the county had no accommodations for keeping a mixed jury over night, and, in his opinion, a mixed jury "would not be nice, provided they were held over and they had night sessions"; that he had no prejudice or feeling against the defendant, and in summoning the jury did not omit men therefrom in order to secure a jury that would convict defendant.

[1] Section 1059, Pen. Code, provides that—

> "A challenge to the panel can be founded only on a material departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing and return of the jury in civil actions, or on the intentional omission of the sheriff to summon one or more of the jurors drawn."

A sufficient answer to that part of the challenge based upon the alleged departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing and return of the jury is that the jury constituting the panel challenged was not a drawn jury, and hence there could be no departure from the forms prescribed in respect to the drawing and return of the jury, within the meaning of the section quoted.

[2] Since it was not a drawn jury, defendant's right to challenge the panel is measured by section 1064, Pen. Code, which provides that—

> "When the panel is formed from persons whose names are not drawn as jurors, a challenge may be taken to the panel on account of any bias of the officer who summoned them which would be good ground of challenge to a juror."

The claim of bias on the part of the sheriff is predicated upon the fact that in filling the special venire he summoned women only who were residents of that part of the county known as Upland. There is no merit in the contention. That the persons summoned were good and lawful persons and in every way competent to act as jurors is not questioned. No difficulty appears to have been had in obtaining from those summoned a jury satisfactory to defendant; nor is any claim made that her substantial rights were in the slightest degree prejudiced by reason of the acts of the sheriff. In the absence of such showing, mere irregularities in the action of the officer in summoning persons to fill the venire would constitute no ground for the granting of a challenge to the entire panel. Wadsworth v. State, 9 Okl. Cr. 84, 130 Pac. 808; People v. Richards, 1 Cal. App. 575, 82 Pac. 691.

Considered as jurors, the law makes no distinction between men and women. Subject to qualifications applicable alike to each, they are equally competent to act as jurors. Section 190, Code Civ. Proc. Hence it cannot be said the sheriff, in summoning all women, confined himself to a certain class as distinguished from another class, any more than had he summoned all men, or a mixed jury composed of a greater number of either sex than the other.

The fact that all the jurors were residents of the vicinity of Upland furnishes no ground upon which to base the claim that the sheriff was biased. People v. Vaughn, 14 Cal. App. 201, 111 Pac. 620, where it is said:

> "The offer of the defendant was to prove that the sheriff summoned the special venire 'entirely from the city of Marysville, where the feeling and prejudice against the defendant was strong.' From this he proposed to contend that 'there must have been prejudice and bias on the part of the officer.' The conclusion would not be warranted from the circumstance relied upon."

No claim is made in the instant case that any feeling of prejudice against defendant existed among the residents of Upland; on the contrary, the very purpose of the sheriff, as shown, was to obtain a jury from a section of the county other than that in which the crime was alleged to have been committed. There is nothing in the record to which our attention is directed which even tends to show the slightest bias on the part of the officer in summoning the jurors; on the contrary, it appears that he acted with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of defendant.

OCKENDEN v. CUTTING. (Civ. 2862.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⟹766 — ALTERNATIVE METHOD — BRIEFS — FAILURE TO COMPLY WITH STATUTE—DISMISSAL.

Where, on appeal by the alternative method, no supplement was appended to appellant's brief embracing any portion of the record, and the brief contains no part of the pleadings or excerpts from the evidence directing the court's attention to any portions thereof, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, and appellant's attention was directed thereto by the brief of respondent, and he made no effort at correction of the defect and no response to the order to show cause, the appeal will be dismissed and the judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Thomas Ockenden against Henry C. Cutting. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On order to show cause why appeal should not be dismissed. Ordered that judgment be affirmed.

Douglas A. Nye, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Arnold W. Liechti, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This matter is presented upon an order to show cause why the appeal should not be dismissed for failure on the part of the appellant to comply with the requirements of section 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal was by the alternative method, and a typewritten transcript of 119 pages has been filed. The main question discussed in appellant's opening brief is the sufficiency of the pleadings and evidence to support the judgment appealed from. No supplement is appended to appellant's brief embracing any portion of the record, nor is there printed in said brief any part of the pleadings or any excerpts from the evidence (except one brief half-page) directing the court to the portions thereof upon which the appellant relies. The existence of that portion of section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that these things be done, has been utterly ignored in this case. This court and the Supreme Court have repeatedly pointed out the necessity of a compliance with the requirements of this section of the Code before any duty devolves upon the court to so far examine into the merits of the appeal as to search through the record for that which should have been embraced in the brief. Moore v. Guajardo, 174 Pac. 92; Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 169 Pac. 379; Chandlee v. McCalla, (Sup.) 178 Pac. 709.

The attention of the appellant having been directed by the brief of respondent to his failure to comply with the statute in this regard, and no effort at the correction of the defect having been attempted, nor any response made to the order to show cause, it is therefore ordered that the judgment herein shall be, and the same is hereby affirmed.

EGENBERGER et ux. v. NEUMAN et al. (Civ. 2766.)

1. Bills and Notes ⚷32, 462(1)—Actions—Parties—"Promissory Note."

While a note payable in the alternative to one of two persons is not a "promissory note," if, however, it purports on its face to be for value received, the setting forth of the note according to its terms is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover as on a contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Promissory Note.]

2. Mortgages ⚷137—Nature of Estate of Parties.

Under Civ. Code, § 2920, a mortgage is merely a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act, the statute changing the original character of a mortgage so it is no longer a conveyance of land, but a mere security.

3. Mortgages ⚷23—Validity—Parties.

Where a note and mortgage securing the same were made in the alternative, that is, payable to one or another, and both the payees joined in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, held, that the note and mortgage were not void, and foreclosure might be decreed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; J. J. Trabucco, Judge.

Action by Valentine Egenberger and Katherine Egenberger, his wife, against August H. Neuman and others, and J. E. Davis and another. From a judgment for plaintiffs, the last-named defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Kinley, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Dibert & Stiefvater and Albert P. Stiefvater, all of Oakland, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by defendants J. E. Davis and Alice M. Davis from a judgment and decree foreclosing a mortgage against them. Appellants are the holders of the legal title to the property affected by the foreclosure, title having passed to them through mesne conveyances from August H. Neuman and Ida Neuman after the lien of the mortgage had attached. The appellants demurred on general and special grounds to plaintiffs' amended complaint. Their demurrers were overruled, and upon their failure to answer judgment was entered against them.

There is but one question upon this appeal, and that is: Does the amended complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action? The argument of appellants is predicated upon the fact that the note, and mortgage securing the same, and which were set out in the amended complaint, were made in the alternative or disjunctive form—that is, they were made to "Valentine Egenberger or Katherine Egenberger."

[1] There are only two authorities cited to us directly upon this question, neither one of which is from this state. The appellants rely upon the case of Musselman v. Oakes, 19 Ill. 81, 68 Am. Dec. 583, in which it is said that a note payable in the alternative to one of two persons is not a promissory note and cannot be sued on as such. This contention may be granted; but in the instant case the action is brought to collect the debt secured by a mortgage regardless of the means by which the debt was evidenced. Furthermore, in reply to the contention of counsel based upon the Oakes Case, we may say that, while it has been held that a note payable in the alternative is not a promissory note, if, however, it purports on its face to be for value received, the setting forth of the note according to its terms is a sufficient statement of consideration to entitle the plaintiff to recover as on a contract. Walrad v. Petrie, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 575, cited in 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 103. The record in the present case discloses that the note stated on its face it was given for a valuable consideration.

[2, 3] However, the case of Seedhouse et al. v. Broward, Adm'r, 34 Fla. 522, 16 So. 425. is a case covering a very similar state of facts in so far as the language of the note and mortgage is concerned. In that case, as in this, the action was to foreclose a mortgage securing a note, the plaintiffs being Henry Seedhouse and Helen Seedhouse, his wife. There, as here, a demurrer was interposed on the ground that the note and mortgage were in the alternative. The court in that case pointed out that the mortgage was not a conveyance of real property, but a contract between mortgagor and mortgagee whereby a specific lien was created upon certain property; that, viewed as a contract, requiring the interposition of judicial action to enforce its provisions, there was no reason why the fact that it and the debt secured were made payable to one or the other of two parties definitely named therein should render such contract void. The court pointed out that there was some variance in the authorities as to whether in such a case the action could be maintained alone by either of the parties named as alternative payees or whether it must be instituted jointly by both of the payees, but added that the better practice was for all of the parties named as alternative payees to join in the suit to enforce such a contract. The reasoning of this Florida case applies precisely to the facts of the instant case, and to the legal effect of mortgages in this state. For in this state also the original character of mortgages has undergone a change, and they have ceased to be conveyances except in form. They pass no estate in the lands and are mere security. Under the Code a mortgage is merely a contract by which specific property is hypothecated for the performance of an act. McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365, 70 Am. Dec. 655; Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 589; Dutton v. Warschauer, 21 Cal. 609, 82 Am. Dec. 765; Mack v. Wetzlar, 39 Cal. 247; Savings & Loan Soc. v. McKoon, 120 Cal. 177, 52 Pac. 305; Civ. Code, § 2920.

In the present case both parties named in the note and mortgage have joined in the suit. It would seem, therefore, that all the elements exist here to make the reasoning in the Florida case applicable.

There is no defense made on the merits, but appellants urge that the mortgage and note should have been reformed; that the plaintiffs should have pleaded the true intent of the parties and made an issue of that matter. They cite the case of Pierson v. McCahill, 21 Cal. 122. That case holds that where, in reducing an agreement to writing, a material clause has been omitted by mistake, a party seeking to avail himself of the actual contract must obtain a reformation of the writing, either by a distinct proceeding to reform it or by special pleading of mistake in an action in which the contract is sought to be used, and asking its correction as independent relief. To the same effect are the other cases cited by the appellant upon this point. This rule, however, is wholly inapplicable here. The plaintiffs are not contending that a mistake has been made, or that the instruments do not express the true intent of the parties. Under our conclusion, herein expressed, the note and mortgage as executed are not void, and, as both parties named therein as alternative payees are plaintiffs in the suit, there is no occasion to ask for a reformation of the instrument, nor to allege any other intent of the parties than the intent appearing upon the face of the instruments; the instruments are sought to be enforced as executed.

The judgment is affirmed.

FOULGER v. TIDEWATER SOUTHERN RY. CO. (Civ. 1861.)

1. MORTGAGES 🔑153—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—WHO IS.

Where a deed granting defendant a right of way over the land involved was not recorded until after the grantor had conveyed the premises to another, and such person had mortgaged the same to a bank which recorded its mortgage, the bank was under Civ. Code, §§ 1214, 1215, a bona fide incumbrancer, and its rights are prior to those of defendant.

2. MORTGAGES 🔑536—BONA FIDE PURCHASER—EXTENT OF PROTECTION.

Where a bank which had a mortgage on lands was a bona fide incumbrancer, its mortgage having been recorded before conveyance of a right of way to defendant, held that a purchaser at foreclosure sale was protected by the bona fides of the bank, and his rights are superior to those of defendant, even though he learned of defendant's asserted rights prior to the consummation of his purchase.

Action by T. M. Foulger against the Tidewater Southern Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur L. Levinsky, of Stockton, for appellant.

Hawkins & Hawkins, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action to quiet title and for damages for the wrongful taking of a certain portion of the land in dispute and for injury to the remaining portion.

On February 15, 1912, one James M. Johnson and his wife deeded to H. C. Leffingwell and Ella E. Leffingwell, his wife, a certain tract of land near Modesto, in Stanislaus county, containing 10 acres. The Leffingwells, on December 17, 1913, conveyed the same land to Lottie R. Kerry and William J. Kerry, her husband. On January 16, 1914, the Kerrys borrowed from the Modesto Savings Bank $775 and executed a deed of trust, which was recorded January 26, 1914, to A. L. Cressey and J. J. McMahon, as trustees, to secure the payment of the note given for the amount of the loan. Default was made in the payment of said note and, after due proceedings, said trustees sold the property, under the terms of the deed of trust, to T. M. Foulger, the plaintiff herein, for the sum of $2,000, and executed a deed to the latter, dated July 15, and recorded July 21, 1916.

It was alleged in the complaint that, "subsequent to the execution of said deed of trust, the defendant, without any right or authority, entered upon said land and premises and constructed thereon a railroad," which runs in a diagonal line across plaintiff's land. It was also alleged that the land was farming land, that it was necessary to irrigate the same, and that the construction of the railroad cut off plaintiff's ditches and water supply; that the construction of the railroad severed plaintiff's land into two fields, and that it was necessary for him to construct a crossing over said railroad at a cost of $50; that it was necessary to siphon water across said railroad at a cost of $100; that by reason of said severance the market value of the land has depreciated $400; and that plaintiff is damaged in the sum of $250 by reason of being deprived of the use of the land occupied. Total damages in the sum of $800 were asked for.

The complaint was filed on September 3, 1917. On the 6th day of April, 1917, defendant recorded a deed from H. G. Leffingwell to Tidewater Southern Railway Company, conveying a right of way 50 feet wide across the land in question for railroad purposes, which deed was dated August 15, 1912.

T. M. Foulger, the plaintiff, was sworn as a witness, and testified that, some time prior to May 25, 1917, he examined the property in question; that at that time he saw no railroad across the land, saw nothing indicating a railroad and saw no stakes upon the ground; that, on July 15, 1916, he attended the trustees' sale of the property, and bid $2,000 for it, and in addition he was to pay the interest and taxes above that amount, amounting to $35, and that he did pay such sums for the property. He said that the railroad had been built through his land in a cut, the dirt being piled on both sides; that prior to the building of the road the land had been planted to grapes; that the grapevines had been plowed up and piled to one side; that on the east side of the track is a reservoir, about 14 by 16 feet in dimension, made of concrete. The right of way occupied about an acre of the land, and the amount on the east side of the track was about half an acre. It was necessary to pipe water under the railroad from the reservoir to the balance of the land. The witness testified as to what he thought would be the cost of piping, crossing the track, etc., and the value of the land taken and that severed.

On cross-examination the witness said that he was on the land on the 14th of July, 1916, the day before he bought it, and saw the railroad being constructed across the land, and saw a construction train being operated on the track. He immediately went to Judge Broughton, president of the Modesto Savings Bank, and asked him if he knew anything about a right of way, that they had put a railroad there since he had contracted to buy the land, and that Judge Broughton replied to him: "I knew nothing of it; they haven't got any right of way from me." That the witness investigated and found they had no right of way. That he did not go to the railroad company to see why they were on the land, but spoke to their surveyor, Mr. Lindsey, probably within a week after the sale. That Mr. Lindsey told him to go and see Mr. Bearce, president of the defendant corporation, but that he did not go to see him; he went to his attorney, who began trying to get a settlement out of the railroad. It appeared that, in the month of May, 1916, and previously to bidding on the property, having in view the purpose of purchasing it, the plaintiff visited and examined the property. At that time no work had been done on the rairoad right of way, and respondent saw no indications of a railroad or preparations to build one on and through the property. He then deposited $300, and entered into an agreement that he would bid at the trustees' sale or forfeit the $300. He stated that he bought the land after seeing the railroad there because if he did not he would have to forfeit the $300; that he would not have paid $2,000 for the property had he known the railroad was there when he "put his contract up."

J. R. Broughton, president of the Modesto Savings Bank, testified that at the date of the trust deed from the Kerrys the trustees, A. L. Cressey and J. J. McMahon, were directors of the bank; that they had nothing to do with making the loan more than approving it at the monthly meeting of the board of directors; that they are the parties who regularly act as trustees for the bank. Questioned as to what he did in making the loan, with reference to an examination of the land, the witness said: "Well, we were familiar with the quality of the land, and were satisfied it was good security for the amount we made the loan, and satisfied that the title was all right"; that they had an abstract prepared and relied upon that; that he had resided in Stanislaus county for 39 years, and for 30 years had been familiar with the quality and value of lands in the county; that at the time the loan was made to Mrs. Kerry he had no knowledge that the defendant claimed any interest in the land; that while the bank held the trust deed it never gave the railroad company a right to cross the land in question with a track.

Several witnesses testified as to the value of the land, and plaintiff rested.

The defendant called as a witness its engineer, J. C. Lindsey, who testified that, in November, 1911, a survey was made through the lands now owned by plaintiff; that the center line of the railroad was staked out with stakes each 100 feet, the stakes being approximately 8 inches above the ground; that, in July, 1915, another survey was made, and the stakes reset; that the original stakes were not there "by reason of the farmers' plowing them out and cultivating the lands"; that defendant began grading on the land in question between June 15 and July 1, 1916, the grading was completed about the 10th of July, and the track laid on the 10th, 11th, and 12th of July; on July 11th trains began running across there. The witness said that plaintiff came to him on July 16th and asked about getting payment for the right of way; witness suggested that plaintiff write Mr. Bearce regarding a settlement, and also told him that the company had a deed from a prior owner. He stated that on the 7th of July, 1916, railroad ties 6 by 8 inches, 8 feet long, were placed on the land about 2 feet apart, and that steel rails were brought onto the land on July 11th.

As to what occurred at the time of the second survey, C. G. Burnett, assistant engineer of defendant, corroborated the testimony of Mr. Lindsey.

The court found that the said savings bank took the deed of trust from the Kerrys without knowledge of the conveyance by H. C. Leffingwell to the defendant or of facts sufficient to put it upon notice of the said conveyance, and that it did not have notice at the time it took said trust deed of any claim of the defendant in and to said real estate; that said bank at the time of taking said deed of trust was an innocent incumbrancer for value, and that the said deed of trust was received by said bank in good faith and for a valuable consideration. It was further found that at the time plaintiff purchased said property at the trustees' sale he had notice of the fact that the defendant was at that time constructing across said land and premises a railroad, and knew that a railroad bed had been graded, and that ties had been placed thereon and rails had been laid upon said ties, and that railroad trains had passed over the rails. It was also found that at the trial of this action the defendant stipulated that it only claimed a strip of 50 feet wide as its right of way. Other findings were made relating to the adaptability of the land to farming purposes, the cutting of the land up into two parts by the right of way, the interference of the right of way with the proper and requisite use of a water ditch on said land for irrigating purposes, and the several items of damages suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the existence of the right of way and the maintenance of a railroad track on and over said way, etc. While, as seen, the plaintiff testified that at the time he first visited the land in contemplation of purchasing it he saw or observed no evidence of a railroad track or no indications that a track was to be built thereon, the court made no finding as to that fact.

The judgment is:

"That the plaintiff is the owner of all the land hereinbefore described, subject, however, to the easement of the defendant over and across said land upon the strip of land hereinbefore described, and the defendant has the right to maintain upon said right of way 50 feet in width a railroad."

Plaintiff was further awarded the sum of $500 as damages and his costs of suit.

[1, 2] That the deed of H. C. Leffingwell to the defendant, although delivered prior to the making and delivery of the trust deed to the Modesto Savings Bank, was not recorded until after the delivery of said trust deed to said bank, that the bank, at the time it received the trust deed, was wholly ignorant of the existence of the deed to defendant or of facts which would put it as a prudent person upon inquiry as to the fact of said conveyance or of any claim of interest by defendant in the land, and that said bank was therefore a bona fide incumbrancer for value are well-established facts in the case; the trial court having upon sufficient evidence so found. It follows, therefore, as a proposition of law, that the deed of H. C. Leffingwell to the appellant is void as to the bank. Civ. Code, §§ 1214, 1215. This, under the sections of the Civil Code just named, is determinative of this appeal, for the plaintiff is protected by and sheltered under the bona fides of the savings bank. Therefore whether plaintiff bought the property with notice of facts which, if followed up by him, were sufficient to have invested him with knowledge of the fact of the conveyance of an interest in the land to the defendant prior in date to the purchase by him, or whether he had actual knowledge of that fact, is wholly unimportant and immaterial. 27 Cyc. 1727; Logan v. Eva, 144 Pa. 312, 22 Atl. 757; Martin v. Jackson, 27 Pa. 504; Keyser v. Clifton (Tex. Civ. App.) 50 S. W. 957.

In Logan v. Eva, supra, it appeared that Mrs. Eva was the possessor in her separate right of $1,700, of which amount she turned over to her husband the sum of $1,200, to be by him invested in real estate, title to which was to be in her name. The husband bought the property with said money, but in violation of the directions of his wife and of his trust took title in his own name, and thereafter borrowed money from one Keesley and gave the latter a mortgage on said property as security for the loan. One Logan, who then had notice of the trust, purchased the property at the foreclosure sale. There, as here, it was contended that Logan, having notice of the trust in favor of Mrs. Eva or her equitable title thereto, acquired no title to the land by the conveyance to him under the foreclosure sale. The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, refusing to sanction the contention, said:

"It is well settled that a purchaser of land is unaffected by a secret trust or equity unknown to him, and that he may pass title thereto, untrammeled by the trust, to a person who has notice of it. 'A mortgagee is regarded as a purchaser, and is protected from all secret equities and trusts of which he had no notice. Heister v. Fortner, 2 Bin. [Pa.] 40 [4 Am. Dec. 417]; Cover v. Black, 1 Pa. St. 493. Notice to a purchaser at the sheriff's sale of the mortgage comes entirely too late, if the mortgagee had no notice when the mortgage was executed.' Martin v. Jackson, 27 Pa. St. 504 [67 Am. Dec. 489]."

The court in that case further said:

> "It must be borne in mind that the rule which protects a purchaser with notice is not the outcome of a tender regard for him. It is the logical sequence of the doctrine that a bona fide purchaser, without notice of a secret equity, takes a title unaffected by it. If such a purchaser could only pass his title to persons ignorant of the trust, the market value of his property would be depreciated by the restriction, and his enjoyment of it would be very much impaired. Hence the law declares that the knowledge of his vendee is not in the way of the transmission of his title, untrammeled by the trust."

In Keyser v. Clifton, supra, it is held that—

> "The bona fides of the mortgagee as to the title passes to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, regardless of the knowledge of the latter."

Counsel for the appellant insists that the rule enunciated in the above cases has never been and is not now the rule in California, and in support of his position cites the cases of Eversdon v. Mayhew, 65 Cal. 163, 3 Pac. 641, and Kenniff v. Caulfield, 140 Cal. 34, 73 Pac. 803. Those cases, as to the facts, are wholly different from this, and they merely deal with and apply the well-settled rule that one who takes a conveyance of real property with notice of a prior equity or title of another in or to such property acquires no title thereto, or acquires the property subject to the prior equity or interest of which he had knowledge or notice when he received the conveyance. The cases are not in point here.

That the rule applied in the cases first above referred to is the California rule is clear from the provisions of section 1214 of the Civil Code. Moreover, the rule is so just and sound in principle that it ought to be the rule of decision in every jurisdiction in cases whose facts are analogous to those of the instant case.

We are persuaded that there is no merit in this appeal, and the judgment is accordingly affirmed.

1. Pleading 🔑127(2) — Answer — Admission of Possession of Property.

In action to recover personal property, together with damages for withholding the same, defendants' answer, denying that they took possession as alleged, or that they are still unlawfully withholding or unlawfully detaining said property, held as a matter of law an admission of possession at the time the action was commenced.

2. Pleading 🔑127(2) — Answer — Admission of Possession.

Answer, alleging that defendants are the owners and entitled to immediate possession, and that defendant E. has been seriously damaged by wrongful action of plaintiff in taking said property from him under Code Civ. Proc. § 509 et seq., held an admission by defendants that the property was in their possession at the time action was commenced.

3. Replevin 🔑72—Claim and Delivery—Joint Tort-Feasors—Evidence.

Record held to conclusively show that respondent E. was a joint tort-feasor both in taking and withholding of the property in question from plaintiff, and that therefore the court should have adjudged that he, as well as the other defendants, was liable for damages resulting from their withholding of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the Ammex Motion Picture Manufacturing Company against J. E. Ervay and others, doing business under the firm name and style of the Bell Motion Picture Manufacturing Company. From the judgment rendered plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Patterson Sprigg and Dwight D. Bell, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Henning & McGee, of San Diego, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff, on the judgment roll alone, from a judgment in its favor, decreeing that defendants, or any of them, were not the owners of that certain personal property to recover which, together with damages for withholding same, this action is brought; and further decreeing that plaintiff have judgment against all the defendants, except Ervay, for $500, rental value for the use of the property.

[1, 2] While the suit was pending the property in question was delivered to the plaintiff under the provisions of section 509 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is alleged in the complaint "that on or about the 18th day of March, A. D. 1915, the defendant J. E. Ervay forcibly, wrongfully, and unlawfully entered in and upon said premises and took possession of the same, together with all the personal property hereinafter set forth," and that "said defendants still unlawfully withhold and detain said property." The defendants by their answer deny that they took possession as alleged, or that "they are still unlawfully withholding or unlawfully detaining said property," which, as a matter of law, is an admission of possession of the property at the time of the commencement of the action. The answer further alleges that "these defendants are the owners and entitled to the immediate possession of said property"; and, further, a specific allegation is made "that defendant Ervay has been seriously damaged by the wrongful action of the plaintiff in taking said property from him," etc., referring to the taking by the sheriff under affidavit with order indorsed thereon, and undertaking, as provided by sections 509 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. This, we think, is an admission by defendants that the property was in their possession at the time of the commencement of this action.

The court also finds that—

> "At all times in said complaint mentioned the said defendants Ervay and Bell forcibly, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and without any right, entered in and upon and took possession of said premises, together with the personal property therein contained, to the exclusion of the rights of said plaintiff."

Though somewhat uncertain in its terms, how can this finding be construed, in the light of the admissions of the answer, other than as a statement that both defendants at all times had the possession and control of this property?

[3] It therefore conclusively appears from the record before us that the respondent Ervay was a joint tort-feaser, both in the taking and withholding of said property from plaintiff, and that therefore the court should have adjudged that he, as well as the other defendants, is liable for all damages resulting from their withholding of the property.

Judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to enter judgment in accordance with the views herein expressed.[1]

KLEINECKE v. NORTH CONFIDENCE MINING & DEVELOPMENT CO. et al. (Civ. 1968.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Finding on Conflicting Evidence — Conclusiveness.

A finding on conflicting evidence, if supported by substantial evidence, is conclusive on appeal.

2. Corporations 🔑116—Stock—Option to Repurchase—Passing of Time Limit.

Where an oral option to repurchase shares of stock was limited as to time which had expired without attempt to take advantage of the option, the optionee no longer had any claim upon the shares.

If a sale of corporate stock had been accompanied by an unconditional agreement to reconvey upon payment of an indebtedness, for which the stock was formerly collateral security, such condition as a matter of defeasance might be established by parol.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ella Kleinecke against the North Confidence Mining & Development Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed.

J. C. Webster, of Sonora, for appellants.
Frank W. Street and Horace M. Street, both of Oakland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brought the action to compel the defendant corporation to transfer to her on its books and to deliver to her a certificate for 47,156 shares of its capital stock, of which she alleged she was the owner. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and findings and judgment were in favor of plaintiff. Defendants appeal from the judgment on the grounds that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the decision and that the decision is against law.

It appears from the findings of the court: Defendant corporation is organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, with a capital stock of $75,000, divided into 75,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. On July 16, 1908, defendant Chute borrowed $6,000 from plaintiff, giving to her his promissory note for said sum, payable in six months, with interest, and indorsed and delivered to plaintiff three certificates representing in the aggregate 47,156 shares of the capital stock of the defendant corporation then owned by him, as security for the payment of said note. Some payments of interest were made by defendant Chute, and he received from plaintiff an additional loan and on July 16, 1912, he executed and delivered to her his promissory note for $8,580, and plaintiff continued to hold said shares of stock as security for the payment of the latter note, the first note being destroyed. The court found that said security was on May 10, 1915, worth no greater sum than $10,000.

The plaintiff testified that in 1913 she removed from Sonora to Berkeley; that in the month of May, 1915, she visited her daughter, Mrs. C. P. Jones, in Sonora, and on the 10th of May, met Mr. Chute at the house by appointment. She testified:

> "I said to him: 'Mr. Chute, I have a proposition to make to you in regard to this stock that I hold; I don't want it any more as security.' I had had so much trouble, and I didn't want to hold it any more with a string tied to it, I want it for my own. He said, 'Mrs. Kleinecke, anything you ask me to do I would do,' and after a few minutes he said, 'It would be necessary for you to have your papers with you to have a transaction of that kind.' I said, 'I have brought them with me for that purpose.' He said, 'This is no place to talk, so we will go inside.' We went inside the room he had occupied and there was a desk in the room; he went to the desk and sat down to it and I got the papers and handed them to him, that is, the note and other papers that were security, that is, the paper that he had written when he gave me the note stating that I was holding the certificates of stock as security. I had these two papers and gave them to him. He said, 'These papers must be destroyed.' I said, 'All right.' He said, 'You take these and destroy them.' * * * I took the note and went to the stove and burned the papers up; I went back into the room. * * * Mr. Chute said, 'If I give you this stock I want you to give me an option to repurchase it.' I said, 'Certainly, I would do that.' Then he went to work and figured up the amount that would be actually due me up to July 16, 1916, if the note hadn't been destroyed. The amount ran to something over $12,000 and I agreed to let him repurchase the stock from me for the amount of $12,000. This option to repurchase the stock to run until the 15th day of July, 1916."

Witness said Mr. Chute gave her the following form of option, which was in his handwriting:

"Know all men by these presents, that I, ——, being the owner of —— shares of stock in the ——, do hereby agree with —— to deposit the said shares —— of stock in escrow in a bank at any time he may designate within a period of (2) years from date upon the deposit by him or his assigns to my credit in said designated bank, the sum of —— dollars."

The witness said she remained in Sonora two or three days and then returned home and received from Mr. Chute a letter, dated May 16, 1915, in which he wrote:

"I will prepare that option to purchase your stock and send it to you soon. One of the parties told me yesterday, that if the weather would clear up, that the matter would soon assume a definite shape."

Under date of June 6, 1915, defendant Chute wrote to plaintiff as follows:

"I will in all probability send you form of option to sign so that you can sell your stock in a short time and I can make a commission on the sale you understand."

In a letter dated June 29, 1915, Chute wrote plaintiff that he was hoping to sell the mine, and said:

"I want you to be able to sell your stock."

On cross-examination, witness identified an affidavit made by her on August 25, 1916, in an action by C. S. Fitch against the defendant corporation, in which she claimed ownership of 52,156 shares of the stock of the corporation; and she also identified a notice dated November 24, 1915, filed in the Tuolumne county records, in which a similar claim was made. The court found that these claims were made through mistake of plaintiff's attorney, so far as 5,000 shares were concerned, she holding a certificate for that number of shares as security on another matter.

Grace Jones, daughter of plaintiff, corroborated the latter's testimony as to the burning of some papers in the stove on the occasion of the visit of Chute to the house.

It appeared that Mr. Chute did not send to plaintiff a form of option for her to execute, nor did she prepare or sign one. The option was to run to July 15, 1916. Mr. Chute not having exercised his right under it, plaintiff, some time after the right had expired, commenced the action. Defendant Chute testified in his own behalf. His testimony as to what occurred on May 10, 1915, between him and plaintiff agreed in some particulars with that of plaintiff, but as to the destruction by burning of his note and the transfer of the shares of stock of the defendant company to her in discharge of his indebtedness, his testimony is in sharp conflict, being in effect that the status of the shares was not changed but remained in pledge, and that what took place with reference to an option was, as he testified, with this understanding, that his ownership is unquestioned and that he did not sell to her this stock.

The court found that on the 10th day of May, 1915, "plaintiff accepted from defendant Richard Chute said 47,156 shares of stock in full payment of said promissory note, and plaintiff then and there surrendered said promissory note to said defendant as fully paid and discharged, and plaintiff ever since on or about May 10, 1915, has been and now is the owner and the possessor of said shares of the capital stock of said defendant," the mining company; that defendant Richard Chute has no right or interest in said shares, but that they still stand upon the books of said company in his name; that on April 18, 1917, plaintiff demanded of said mining company that it execute and deliver to her, in her name, its certificate for 47,156 shares of its capital stock, standing in the name of said Richard Chute, and that at the time said demand was made plaintiff presented to said mining company the said certificates held by plaintiff, representing said 47,156 shares, for cancellation upon the issuance of a new certificate or certificates, in the name of plaintiff, for said stock, but the said mining company refused to comply with said demand.

Chute made an absolute transfer of the shares of stock to plaintiff in discharge of his indebtedness to her. The court found, on conflicting evidence, that he made such transfer. Under the settled rule we cannot disturb the finding, as it is supported by substantial evidence.

[2, 3] Appellants contend, under the principle stated in Rohrle v. Stidger, 50 Cal. 207, and other cases cited, that the transfer of the shares, May 10, 1915, "was by way of security and that the sale was not absolute." The evidence on which the court based its finding was that the sale was absolute, and the promissory notes which constituted the consideration were surrendered and destroyed as fully paid. The option to repurchase was limited as to time of acting under it, and that time having expired without any attempt made to take advantage of it, the optionee no longer had any claim upon the shares.

Respondent makes the point that the agreement or option to purchase the stock, being for a sum over $200, is invalid because not in writing (Civ. Code, § 1624); furthermore, that there was no consideration for the agreement nor was any part of the purchase price paid. No option was ever made in writing. In one of his letters Chute said he would send plaintiff a form of option for her to sign, but he did not send it. In other of his letters he wanted her to be able to sell her stock. As already stated, the verbal option expired July 15, 1916.

If the sale had been accompanied by an unconditional agreement to reconvey upon payment of the indebtedness, such condition as matter of defeasance might be established by parol. But there was evidence justifying the finding that no such condition was part of the transaction. The option, as we have seen, was given for a stated period of time and was never sought to be availed of.

We think the findings are supported by the evidence, and that they support the judgment.

The judgment is affirmed.

METROPOLITAN REDWOOD LUMBER CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al. (Civ. 2912.)

MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷373—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION—INJURIES RESULTING FROM QUARREL BETWEEN EMPLOYÉS.

Personal injuries to one acting in the capacity of storekeeper, due to a personal attack upon him by a bookkeeper, an employé of equal rank, following a quarrel between them, cannot be made the basis for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Proceedings for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Henri Gireaux, employé, opposed by the Metropolitan Redwood Lumber Company, employer, and the Ætna Life Insurance Company, insurer. Award for applicant, and employer and insurer petition for a writ of review. Award annulled.

Redman & Alexander, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. The following are the undisputed facts in the case. The petitioner, Metropolitan Redwood Lumber Company, maintained a store at a small town named Metropolitan in Humboldt county. Henri Gireaux, the applicant for compensation before the Industrial Accident Commission, was an employé of said petitioner in the capacity of storekeeper having in charge its stock of merchandise in its said store. One J. T. Cleary was also employed by the said petitioner as its bookkeeper in said store. The post office of the town was at the store, and the said J. T. Cleary was the postmaster, receiving in addition to his salary as one of said petitioner's employés a salary of $10 per month from the United States government for acting as such postmaster. The post office seems to have been an adjunct of the store, and the several employés of the petitioner carried the mail to and from the post office and the railway station. A discord had arisen between Gireaux and Cleary, the former having insisted on charging to the latter's account some small items of merchandise, such as candy, which the latter had taken without charging himself. Some trouble over making change between the two intensified this discord. Just prior to the collision causing the applicant's injuries he had carried the mail across to the train and was coming back to the store with the return bag of mail when he was met by Cleary, who was taking some mail to another train, but who, upon meeting Gireaux, without further or other provocation, dropped his mail and made a personal attack upon Gireaux, striking him violently and causing the injuries for which he sought compensation. So far as the petitioner herein, their employer, was concerned, the two men were of equal rank as its employés, neither being the superior of the other in his employment.

The Industrial Accident Commission by a divided vote made the award assailed in this proceeding. The only question presented for our consideration is as to whether the said applicant was entitled to such award as for an injury arising out of his employment.

While the authorities cited by the respective parties hereto from other jurisdictions are in conflict as to the right of employés to compensation in this class of cases, we are unable to distinguish in principle between this case and the cases of Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 682, 158 Pac. 212, L. R. A. 1916F, 1164, and Fishering v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 690, 158 Pac. 215. It is true that in each of these cases, as in this case, the applicant at the time of his injuries was in the course of his employment; in each of those cases the act of the fellow employé which was the immediate cause of the injuries was a playful or, at least, not a willfully intentional act arising out of ill will on the part of the person causing said injuries; but the reasoning of the Supreme Court in each of the above-cited cases, as well as the authorities given in support thereof, apply equally to a case where the injury was intentionally inflicted. In the case of Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, the learned justice writing the opinion, in his very full résumé of the authorities touching this question, calls attention to an exception to the general rule on nonliability of the employer for injuries resulting from either the playful acts or intended assaults of fellow employés, which exists where the fellow employé committing the injury did so while in an intoxicated state of frenzy and passion, which was his habitude, and which rendered it unsafe for him to be permitted to work with his fellow employés, and which condition was known to his employer, who would thus be negligent in subjecting his peaceable servants to such known risk. A second exception is also noted in the cases cited which arises in in cases where the injured employé was the superior in rank to the one causing his injuries, the assault arising out of an attempted exercise of discipline on the part of the superior employé. Neither of these exceptions can be given application to the case at bar.

The following authorities fully sustain our view that ordinarily and outside of the exceptions above noted injuries suffered by employés due to quarrels between themselves may not be made the basis of compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Acts: Jacquemin v. Turner, etc., Co, 92 Conn. 382, 103 Atl. 115, L. R. A. 1918E, 496; Stillwagon v. Callan Bros., 183 App. Div. 141, 170 N. Y. Supp. 677; Union S. M. Co. v. Davis (Ind. App.) 115 N. E. 676; Mountain Ice Co. v. McNeil, 91 N. J. Law, 528, 103 Atl. 184, L. R. A. 1918E, 494; De Fillippis v. Falkenberg, 170 App. Div. 153, 155 N. Y. Supp. 761; Tarpper v. Weston, etc., Co., 200 Mich. 275, 166 N. W. 857, L. R. A. 1918E, 507.

The recent case of Kimbol v. Industrial Accident Commission, 173 Cal. 351, 160 Pac. 150, L. R. A. 1917B, 595, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 312, to which our attention has been directed, arose out of quite a different state of facts; and, if there is anything contained in the opinion therein touching this case, it must be taken as supporting rather than opposing the views above advanced.

It follows that the award of the commission must be held to have been in excess of its jurisdiction, and must therefore be annulled. It is so ordered.

1. Master and Servant 🔑219(5)—Injuries to Servants—Assumption of Risk—Falling Walls.

The employé engaged in removing junk from burned premises assumes the risk of injury from the falling of unsupported brick wall.

2. Master and Servant 🔑155(1)—Duty to Warn Servants.

An employer is under no duty to warn employés of an obvious and apparent danger, such as the danger that an unsupported brick wall left on burned premises will fall.

3. Master and Servant 🔑101, 102(2)—Safe Place to Work.

A master is compelled to provide for his servant a place in which to work not absolutely safe but as safe as he can make it under the circumstances, and having used usual or requisite precautions to that end his duty is performed.

4. Master and Servant 🔑318(1) — Independent Contractors—Removal of Junk from Burned Premises.

Contractors to remove junk and débris from burned premises, of which they were given possession with exclusive control of the work, held independent contractors, so that the owners were not liable for contractors' negligence causing injury to an employé when an unsupported wall fell.

5. Master and Servant 🔑322—Independent Contractors—Latent Defects—Duty to Warn.

Owners employing independent contractors to remove junk and débris from burned premises are under duty to warn the contractors or their employés of the latent defects in unsupported brick wall left standing.

6. Master and Servant 🔑330(1) — Independent Contractors—Res Ipsa Loquitur.

The maximum of res ipsa loquitur cannot be invoked against owners sued for injuries to an employé of independent contractors having exclusive control of the removal of junk and débris from burned premises on which unsupported brick walls were left standing one of which fell on the employé.

7. Master and Servant 🔑330(1) — Independent Contractors—Burden of Proof.

In an action against owners for the death of an employé of independent contractors to remove débris and junk from burned premises on which unsupported brick walls were left standing, the burden was on plaintiff to show the accident was due to the owners' negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Helena Brown and others against the Board of Trustees of the Leland Stanford Junior University and William G. Stimmel. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Lee, of Red Bluff, and George R. Freeman and Frank Freeman, both of Willows, for appellants.

McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, and Wilson & Wilson, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. The action was brought by Helena Brown, the widow of Alexander Brown, and by ten children and grandchildren of the deceased, to recover damages for the death of said Alexander Brown, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants. The corporation, defendant, was the owner of a tract of land in Tehama county known as the "Stanford Vina Ranch," and defendant Stimmel was the superintendent thereof. Upon the close of plaintiff's case the court granted a motion made by defendants for a nonsuit, judgment followed in their favor, and plaintiffs prosecute this appeal from said judgment.

The record discloses the following facts: On and prior to August 18, 1915, there was upon the Stanford Ranch a building known as the winery, which was constructed with brick walls and which contained a large amount of machinery. This building was destroyed by fire on said date, but the brick walls remained standing.

On September 15, 1915, Daniel R. Buckley, a member of the firm of Buckley & Brownstone, tendered to defendant Stimmel, as superintendent of the Stanford Vina Ranch, the following offer, in writing:

"I hereby offer you $700.00 for all the metal and iron in the fermenting house, engine room (except boilers), distillery, and carpenter shop and the scrap pointed out in the yard near the tool washerhouse and the scrap in the boneyard. * * * As part of the consideration I agree to clean up and remove all metal and iron of every kind and description from the ruins of the buildings described above without any expense whatever to you. I agree to remove this iron and metal before October 20, 1915. Sincerely yours, Daniel R. Buckley.

"Accepted and receipt of $100.00 acknowledged. W. G. Stimmel. Supt."

The deceased, Alexander Brown, was employed by Buckley & Brownstone to assist in the work of removing the metal from said building, and on September 24th, while so employed, one of the walls of the building fell upon him and caused his death. No one was with him at the time, the nearest witnesses being from 200 to 300 feet distant.

The complaint alleged that after the fire the brick walls of the winery were left standing unsupported; that they were dangerous and menacing and were known to defendants so to be, but that they failed to guard against such danger; that defendants were careless and negligent in failing to take down such walls or to take measures to protect persons against danger. This negligence, together with the alleged fact that defendants did not warn decedent of the defective and unsafe condition of the walls, "and in carelessly and negligently permitting said decedent in or near the vicinity of the said brick wall," are alleged to have resulted in the death of decedent; and it was further alleged that Buckley, Brownstone, and the decedent had no knowledge of the defective and unsafe condition of said walls.

Arthur R. Thorpe testified that Brown, at the time the wall fell on him, was engaged in removing hoop iron from the fermenting room. T. J. Frost testified that he heard the crash when the wall fell and ran to the scene of the accident; that it was the south wall of the building that had fallen. The defendant W. G. Stimmel, called as a witness by plaintiffs, testified to the same fact, and Mrs. Helena Brown testified as to the injuries received by her husband, his age, etc., and there was also testimony as to the amount decedent was earning as wages.

The motion for nonsuit was properly granted. The evidence shows that the fire which destroyed the distillery or winery building occurred several weeks prior to the date of the accident causing the death of the deceased. As the complaint alleges, the evidence shows that the walls of the building were of brick and that said walls remained standing from and after the fire until the date of the accident. There is no evidence that there was any hidden or concealed defect in the walls by reason of which they or either of them were more likely to fall than from the mere fact that they stood unsupported. In other words, there was, so far as the evidence shows, no other danger in the walls to persons working or employed about them, or who might for any reason have been near or about them, before the accident, than such danger as was plainly obvious to any person of average intelligence and sense, viz. that they stood unsupported. The evidence does not directly show what caused the wall to fall. As to that, the only evidence is the circumstance that the walls remained standing until the work of removing the junk and débris from between them was begun and that the falling of the south wall of the distillery which caused the accident occurred while the said work was in progress. At the time of the accident the deceased had been engaged for several days in removing the junk from the burnt building.

[1] From the facts it is clear that the deceased, as readily as the defendants or any other person, by the exercise of his faculties of sight and judgment in an ordinarily diligent manner, could have observed and known of the danger to life and limb attending employment in and about the unsupported walls of the burnt building, where, at the time of the accident, he was employed. Indeed, no one but a person entirely bereft of all common sense could fail to perceive, upon mere casual observation, the danger in large brick walls standing without any support whatever, and that it would be necessary for one employed about them as the deceased was to exercise proper care for his own safety as against the contingency of their falling or toppling over while he was so employed. It is therefore very plain that the deceased, in taking and entering upon the employment while in the prosecution of which he suffered injury, himself assumed the risk of the employment. The case was not one in which the defendants, if at all liable, were required to instruct or warn the deceased of the danger of the employment to which he had been assigned.

[2] The law casts upon an employer the duty of warning or instructing his employés of the danger of the employment to which he assigns them only when such danger is concealed or hidden, or where inexperienced youths or persons are assigned to employment on, in, or about complicated and naturally dangerous machinery or mechanical contrivances. Where, as here, though, the danger attending the employment is obvious and apparent, no duty to warn or admonish employés of such danger is imposed upon the employer. See 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 94, and cases cited. Labatt, in his work on Master & Servant, vol. 1, p. 522, states the rule as follows:

> "The failure to give instructions is not culpable when the servant might, by the exercise of ordinary care and attention, have known of the danger, or, as the rule is also expressed, where he had all the means necessary for ascertaining the actual conditions, and there was no concealed danger which could not be discovered."

[3] It is true that the rule is that the master is compelled to provide for his servant a place in which to work, not absolutely safe, which is often an impossibility, but as safe as he can make it under the circumstances, and when the master has used the usual or requisite precautions to that end, his duty to his servants in that respect has been performed. On the other hand, "the law demands that one who is working in a place where he is exposed to danger shall himself exercise his faculties for his own protection, and does not permit a recovery for damages resulting from a neglect of this rule." Kenna v. Central Pac. R. R. Co., 101 Cal. 29, 35 Pac. 333; Brett v. Frank & Co., 153 Cal. 272, 94 Pac. 1051; Mugford v. Atl., Gulf & Pacif. Co., 7 Cal. App. 678, 95 Pac. 674. Labatt, vol. 1, § 332, states the rule as follows:

> "A servant is not in the exercise of ordinary care unless, at each stage of his work, he makes an effective use of his bodily and mental faculties, and observes as attentively as is reasonably possible under the circumstances the condition of the instrumentalities by which his safety may be affected, and the results of their operation by himself or others, in so far as that operation may tend to subject him to danger."

[4] Thus far we have considered the case upon the theory that the defendants were the employers of the deceased or legally sustained that relation towards the deceased. We are, however, clearly of the opinion that Buckley & Brownstone, by whom the deceased was employed, were independent contractors. By their contract with the defendants they agreed, among other things, to remove the junk and débris from the burnt premises. Under the contract, they not only were entitled to and were given possession of the premises pending the completion of the contract, but had full, unrestricted, and unqualified control over the manner in which or the means by which the work of removing the junk was to be done. The defendants had no authority to say or direct how the work should be performed or the mode of doing the work contracted for. "The chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right of control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for." Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 99, 78 Pac. 337, 338; 16 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law [2d Ed.] p. 187; Buckingham v. Commary-Peterson Co., 178 Pac. 318, 325. "An independent contractor is one who, in rendering services, exercises an independent employment or occupation, and represents his employer only as to the results of his work, and not as to the means whereby it is to be accomplished." Green v. Soule, supra.

The extent of the interest of the defendants here in the work which Buckley & Brownstone contracted to perform for them was in having the junk and débris removed from the destroyed buildings. They were not at all interested in how that work was to be done or accomplished by the parties who had undertaken it. As before stated, the means that the latter might employ to carry out their contract constituted a matter of utter indifference to the defendants—indeed, a matter with which they had no authority or right to interfere, unless the means adopted for that purpose were such as might result in the destruction of other property of the defendants.

[5] It results that the defendants could in no event be held liable for any negligence of which the contractors might have been guilty in prosecuting the work under their contract and which negligence might have been the direct cause of injury or damage to a third person or an employé. Of course, while, as the learned trial judge in his written opinion declared, a party has the right to use his own property in any way he sees fit, and the further right, if he desires, to maintain dangerous structures thereon, he must not maintain anything on his property in the nature of a trap which would injure people who are there by his invitation, "or, as the decisions express it, he is not to permit unseen dangers to those who have a right to visit his premises either upon his invitation or on business." And, if this was a case where there existed a latent or hidden defect in the walls fraught with danger to those working or being about and near the walls, or a dangerous defect other than that which was obvious to any person of common intelligence or sense, and of which defect the defendants had knowledge but of which neither the contractors nor the deceased were aware at the time they entered upon the work of removing the junk and débris from the premises, it would undoubtedly have been the duty of the defendants to warn the contractors or the deceased of the added danger following from such latent defect, and failure on their part to do so in such case might justly subject them to liability for any damage resulting from such defect. But, as shown, the record here discloses no such case.

[6] For the reason that Buckley & Brownstone were independent contractors, and at the time of the accident had exclusive control of the thing causing it, the rule of res ipsa loquitur, which counsel for the appellants undertake to invoke in this case, does not apply. That rule, often stated in the decisions, may well be repeated here, viz.:

> "Where defendant owes to plaintiff the duty to use care, and the thing causing the accident is shown to be under the management of defendant or his servants, and the accident is such that in the ordinary course of things does not occur, if those who have the management or control use proper care, the happening of the accident, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is evidence that it arose from the lack of requisite care." 29 Cyc. 591.

The maxim merely means that when the conditions arise and exist, as indicated in the definition thereof, the burden is cast upon the defendant to explain how the accident happened, and, if he fails to do so, it must be accepted as an established fact that the accident was due to want of proper care on the part of the defendant. And it has been said that—

> "The maxim is in part based upon the consideration that, where the management and control of the thing which has produced the injury is exclusively vested in the defendant, it is within his power to produce evidence of the actual cause that produced the accident which the plaintiff is unable to present." 29 Cyc. 591; Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 193, 194, 59 N. E. 925, 52 L. R. A. 922, 82 Am. St. Rep. 630.

Thus it is very manifest that the rule or maxim of res ipsa loquitur is never applicable where the thing causing the accident is not under the exclusive control or management of the defendant or the party whose negligence it is charged is the efficient or proximate cause of the accident or his servants. There are many California cases so declaring, and a few of them may here be named, viz.: Judson v. Giant Powder Co., 107 Cal. 556, 40 Pac. 1020, 29 L. R. A. 718, 48 Am. St. Rep. 146; Kahn v. Triest-Rosenberg Cap Co., 139 Cal. 344, 73 Pac. 164; White v. Spreckels, 10 Cal. App. 287, 101 Pac. 920.

In the case at bar the evidence, as shown, discloses that Buckley & Brownstone, the contractors, and not the defendants, had control of the premises or the thing that caused the accident at the time of the accident. To them (the contractors) the burnt premises were turned over for the purpose of enabling them to perform the terms of the contract, and for that purpose they were in their possession and under their exclusive control for and during the time requisite for the completion of the contract.

[7] It follows that, if the defendants could under any view of the case be held liable for the accident and the death as a result thereof of the deceased, it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show that the accident was directly due to the negligence of the defendants. This burden they failed to sustain. Indeed, the circumstances, though very meager in a disclosure of the cause of the falling of the wall, tend to show, if anything at all in that particular, that it was occasioned by or through some act or acts of the employés occurring while they were engaged in removing the junk and débris from the premises. But, however that may be, we are firmly of the opinion that the evidence presented by the plaintiffs utterly failed to show that the defendants were in any sense or measure legally responsible for the unfortunate accident.

The judgment is affirmed.

STATE NAT. BANK v. KERFOOT et al. (Civ. 2638.)

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⚷183(1)—COMPUTATION OF PERIOD—ABSENCE FROM STATE—SUFFICIENCY OF PLEADINGS.

In an action on a note executed in another state, defendant's plea setting up the two-year statute of limitation under Code Civ. Proc. § 339, was insufficient, where it specifically admitted that defendant did not arrive within the state until a time less than two years before the commencement of the action; absence from the state being excepted in the computation of time under section 351.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the State National Bank against John S. Kerfoot, J. M. Monroe, and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Monroe appeals. Affirmed.

Morris M. Ferguson, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Bicksler, Smith & Parke, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Defendant Monroe's appeal from the judgment is presented upon the judgment roll alone, which consists of an amended complaint, the answer thereto, the findings of fact and conclusions of law, and the judgment. There was no demurrer to said amended complaint. The findings recite the fact that, as alleged by the defendant, the action was commenced on or about October 11, 1913.

The plaintiff is a corporation existing and having its place of business at Oklahoma City, in the state of Oklahoma.

The action was brought to recover the balance unpaid on a promissory note made July 3, 1911, at Oklahoma City, due 90 days after date and payable at plaintiff bank at Oklahoma City. The complaint alleged that appellant, since the note became due, has been absent from the state of California about 30 days. The answer alleged that appellant left the state of Oklahoma during the latter part of October, 1911, and arrived in Los Angeles on or about November 1, 1911. and ever since that time has been within the state of California, except about three weeks in August, 1914 (which three weeks, therefore, were after the commencement of this action). The answer further pleads that the action is barred by the provisions of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it being an action to recover upon a contract founded upon an instrument in writing executed out of the state. The court found that appellant "has lived within the state of California since November 2, 1911."

The complaint further alleged that by mutual agreement of the parties to the note the time of payment thereof was extended to fall due January 25, 1913. The defendant denied this allegation, but the court found, presumably upon sufficient evidence, that, by arrangement made between the plaintiff and appellant's joint co-obligors, said co-obligors executed to defendant their promissory note for the unpaid balance of the principal note as collateral to said principal note, "in consideration that plaintiff extended the time of payment on the note sued upon herein to certain definite dates, which was done and executed."

We think that the questions argued by counsel concerning the extension of the time of the maturity of the note need not be discussed on the decision of this appeal, since at all events the note sued on was due when this action was commenced, and we are of the opinion that upon the facts admitted by appellant in his answer the statute of limitations had not run in his favor on the obligation in question. For the action was commenced within less than two years after he arrived within the state of California. If, when the cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the action may be commenced within the term limited by the statute, after his return to the state. Code Civ. Proc. § 351. In Dougall v. Schulenberg, 101 Cal. 154, 35 Pac. 635, the court said:

> "The defense of the statute of limitations must be specially pleaded, otherwise a complaint is good although it shows on its face that the cause of action is barred. If therefore it was necessary for the plaintiff to allege that his case was within some exception to the statute of limitations, because it was presumably barred, it was only necessary for him to do so to prevent a demurrer on that ground. It was still necessary for the defendant to plead the statute to raise any issue upon that subject. * * * This plea is equivalent to saying that plaintiff's action was not brought within two years after the cause of action accrued; or, perhaps, in this case, to the statement that the defendant had been in this state for more than two years after the cause of action accrued and before the action was commenced."

So here, defendant's plea of the statute of limitations, when considered separately from the other allegations of his answer, is equivalent to a statement that the defendant was in this state for more than two years after the cause of action accrued. But in this case that plea is qualified by the specific admission that appellant did not arrive within the state until the 1st day of November, 1911, which was less than two years before the commencement of the action.

In view of the facts above stated, we find no sufficient reason for sustaining defendant's appeal, which he argued only with reference to the matters above noted, and, which he bases solely upon the ground "that the findings do not support the judgment and that there is a failure to find upon a material issue."

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. CABALLERO. (Cr. 647.)

1. Homicide ⟹228(1)—Sufficiency of Evidence—Corpus Delicti.

In murder trial, evidence tending to show that the body found in the débris of a burned building was the body of the alleged victim, and that he was killed by a shot fired by accused or one of his confederates, held sufficient proof of corpus delicti.

2. Criminal Law ⟹543(1)—Depositions—Admissibility in Evidence.

In prosecution for homicide, deposition of a witness for the state, consisting of testimony taken at the preliminary hearing before the committing magistrate, held properly introduced in evidence under Pen. Code, § 686, subd. 3, where it was shown that such witness was without the state in the United States military service; the state not being bound to produce him, and there being no process by which his attendance could have been compelled.

3. Criminal Law ⟹232 — Preliminary Hearing—Rights of Accused—Counsel.

Where the committing magistrate allowed one accused of murder a reasonable time to send for a counsel and postponed the examination for that purpose, in full compliance with Pen. Code, § 859, and no counsel then appeared, his proceeding with the hearing, under Pen. Code, § 860, without waiting further, was not abuse of discretion.

4. Criminal Law ⟹823(2)—Instructions—Comment on Facts — Cure by Other Instructions.

In murder trial, instruction commencing with the phrase, "The commission of the homicide by defendant being proved," which instruction was withdrawn when the jury was recalled, held not erroneous, as being a comment on the facts in violation of Const. art. 6, § 19, when considered in connection with other instructions given, irrespective of whether the court could thus cure an erroneous instruction.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of murder and sentenced to imprisonment for life. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The court received in evidence the testimony of one W. A. Wiedenbeck, taken at the preliminary examination before the magistrate; it appearing that, at the time of the trial in the superior court, Wiedenbeck was absent from the state of California, being at that time at Camp Lewis, Wash., in the service of the government of the United States. It was shown by this testimony that on the 14th day of March, 1914, Frank Volney Johnston, the man alleged to have been killed at that time, was the manager of a store at Tecate, in San Diego county. The witness was assistant postmaster and clerk in the store. A post office was located in the store. Between 8 o'clock and half past 8 o'clock on the evening of that day, while Johnston was sitting in the post office and the witness was in the store, three men came to the door, and one of them fired a shot at the witness. Two of these men threw down the witness and tied his arms behind him, while another ran over to the post office and "covered" Johnston. When the two men had tied the witness, they ran out, and as they ran out there was one more shot fired. Then they came back and took the witness to the post office, where the safe was, and demanded that he open the safe, which, however, he did not do. During these proceedings, the witness recognized the defendant by his eyes and by his voice. The men were masked with bandanna handkerchiefs.

There was another witness who approached the store after the shots were fired and saw a man robbing the till in the store, whom he recognized as the defendant. A few minutes later the store was found to be on fire, and it was destroyed by the fire. In the débris of the store after the fire there were found the remains of a human body. The head and limbs were burned off so that the body could not be recognized as that of any known person. Through the heart there was a hole which the evidence tends to show was produced by a bullet. Wiedenbeck testified that he never saw Johnston again after the fire; nor is there any witness who claims to have seen him alive after that time.

[1] Appellant claims that the verdict is contrary to law, in that there was not sufficient proof of the corpus delicti. He claims that there is no proof that Johnston, the person alleged to have been murdered, was actually dead. In our opinion, there is no merit in this contention. The surrounding circumstances shown by the evidence, together with the direct testimony of Wiedenbeck to which we have referred, strongly tend to prove that the dead body found after the fire was the body of Johnston; that he was killed by a pistol shot; and that the shot was fired from a pistol in the hands of the defendant or of one of his two confederates at the time and place in question.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling his objection to the introduction in evidence of the deposition of the witness Wiedenbeck. It is provided by the Penal Code, § 686, subd. 3, that—

> "Where the charge has been preliminarily examined before a committing magistrate and the testimony taken down by question and answer in the presence of the defendant, who has, either in person or by counsel, cross-examined or had an opportunity to cross-examine the witness; * * * the deposition of such witness may be read, upon its being satisfactorily shown to the court that he is dead or insane, or cannot with due diligence be found within the state."

[3] When the district attorney offered in evidence the testimony of Wiedenbeck taken at the preliminary examination, counsel for defendant made his objection as follows:

> "I wish to enter my objection to the introduction of that testimony on the ground that it is incompetent, and in violation of the constitutional rights of this defendant. The defendant was brought before the justice of the peace, and the defendant demanded the services of counsel, and the court denied defendant the services of counsel and went ahead with the preliminary examination."

The proceedings before the justice of the peace were shown to be as follows: On July 2, 1918, the charge against the defendant being called for preliminary examination before the justice of the peace, a shorthand reporter and an interpreter in the Spanish language were duly appointed and qualified. The complaint was read and was translated to the defendant in Spanish by the interpreter. The court asked defendant if he had an attorney, and defendant replied, "My cousin will come to my aid and secure an attorney for me." The court informed the defendant that if defendant had an attorney he was entitled to have him attend at all stages of the proceedings and that defendant was entitled to have a peace officer deliver a message to any attorney he might designate, free of charge. Thereupon the hearing was continued until the 15th day of July, 1918. At that time the defendant appeared unaccompanied by counsel, and informed the court that he was waiting for attorney Valenzuela, who had told defendant that he "had to be here." The court replied that Valenzuela knew that the case was set, as he had examined the record, and knew that the case was set for 2 o'clock; whereas it was now half past 2. The court thereupon directed that the hearing proceed. It was under these circumstances and at that hearing that the testimony of Wiedenbeck was taken. The defendant, being asked if he wanted to ask the witness any questions, replied that he had to have Valenzuela so that he could ask the questions. The result was that no cross-examination was had. In addition to the foregoing facts shown by the record of testimony and proceedings before the committing magistrate, the district attorney testified that at said time of the preliminary examination the defendant claimed that Mr. Valenzuela was his attorney. "We got Mr. Valenzuela; it was some time after half past 2, about the time of the taking up of the preliminary examination. Mr. Valenzuela came down and said he was not going to represent him, and would not represent him; he wanted him to, but he was not willing to do it;" that the defendant did not ask to have any other counsel sent for on that occasion.

The magistrate allowed the defendant a reasonable time to send for counsel and postponed the examination for that purpose, in full compliance with the requirements of section 859 of the Penal Code. Section 860 of that Code says:

> "If the defendant requires the aid of counsel, the magistrate must, immediately after the appearance of counsel, or if, after waiting a reasonable time therefor, none appears, proceed to examine the case."

We are unable to say that the committing magistrate abused the discretion vested in him when he determined that he had waited a reasonable time for the appearance of counsel for the defendant at that hearing.

The case is in very definite contrast with that of People v. Napthaly, 105 Cal. 641, 39 Pac. 29, where it was held that the court erred in refusing to set aside an information upon the ground that the defendant had not been legally committed by any magistrate before the filing of the information; it having been made to appear that at the preliminary examination before the magistrate the defendant was not represented by any counsel and that the magistrate refused to continue the examination for the purpose of enabling him to employ counsel, and entirely failed to inform the defendant of his rights as required by the provisions of the Penal Code. Counsel for appellant claims that due diligence was not exercised to produce the witness Wiedenbeck at the trial of this case. The obvious reply is that, when it was shown that Wiedenbeck was without the state of California, by showing he was at that time at Camp Lewis in the state of Washington, the district attorney was discharged from further obligation to produce the witness at the trial, since there was no legal process by which he could have compelled such attendance. We hold therefore that sufficient foundation was established for the introduction in evidence of Wiedenbeck's testimony at the preliminary examination, and that the court did not err in overruling defendant's objection thereto.

[4] An instruction, which we will call the eighteenth instruction, to the jury was as follows:

> "You are further instructed that, upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved, the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation or that justify or that excuse it devolves upon him unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime committed only amounts to manslaughter or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable."

Appellant points out that this instruction was wholly inapplicable and was not based on any fact or issue in the case. This criticism is justified by the fact that unquestionably under the evidence either the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree or he was not guilty at all, and his sole contention was that he had not committed the crime and was not present when the acts were perpetrated. Evidently recognizing this as the true state of the case, the court, at a time when the jury had been recalled at its request for another purpose, withdrew that instruction and directed that the jury "treat that instruction as if it had never been given; give it no consideration whatever in seeking to reach a verdict."

Appellant further criticizes the instruction as being an indirect comment on the facts, in violation of section 19 of article 6 of the state Constitution, which provides:

> "Judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law."

The instruction given is in the language of section 1105 of the Penal Code. In People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 Pac. 515, where the same instruction was given, it was claimed by appellant that the phrase, "the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved," constituted an intimation or statement by the court that the fact that the defendant intentionally fired the shot had been proven. But the court said that the signification of the clause was the same as if the sentence began thus: "When, upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant has been proved," etc. It was held that thus understood the clause did not constitute a statement of fact by the court. The case was there distinguished from People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63 Pac. 1001, which is relied upon by appellant here. In People v. Grill, supra, the Supreme Court further noted that in other instructions the jury had been told that they were the exclusive judges of the facts, and that the prosecution must show defendant's guilt and every fact essential to a conviction beyond a reasonable doubt, together with other proper instructions given. Whereupon the Supreme Court said:

> "In view of these instructions, it would be impossible for any jury of ordinary intelligence to have supposed that the instruction complained of was intended to state to them that the fact that the defendant had committed the homicide had been proven."

So in the case at bar the court clearly instructed the jury that it was their exclusive province to determine the facts from the evidence; that with questions of fact, the weight of evidence, and the credit to be given to witnesses, the court had nothing to do; and that the burden was upon the prosecution to establish defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. We are of the opinion that, even if the court could not cure a supposed erroneous instruction by withdrawing the same when the jury was recalled (as appellant here contends, but which we do not concede), the instruction itself, when reasonably understood and interpreted in connection with the other instructions given, was not erroneous, and the giving thereof would not constitute ground for reversal of the judgment. In People v. Wilt, 173 Cal. 477, 160 Pac. 561, referring to an instruction like that in question here and containing the phrase "the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved," the Supreme Court said, "Ordinarily, this language could not fairly be held to have any such signification" as that the court was intimating an opinion or belief that the homicide had been proved.

HARPHAM v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF VENTURA COUNTY. (Civ. 2831.)

1. Certiorari 🔑33(3)—Grounds—Acts of Board of Supervisors.

Where the board of supervisors exceeded its jurisdiction in determining that a petition by more than ten landowners asking for a storm water district, which had been filed, was a petition under Protection District Act 1895, as amended, and in naming for the hearing of the matter a day prior to any time within which under the statute the matter could be heard, certiorari lies at the instance of any one injured thereby.

2. Levees 🔑5 — Quo Warranto 🔑16 — Protection Districts—Nature of Organization.

A protection district organized under St. 1895, p. 247, as amended, having no corporate existence other than its name, is not a de facto corporation, and therefore a proceeding in the nature of quo warranto brought by the Attorney General under Code Civ. Proc. § 803, does not lie to test its right of existence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

Application for certiorari by G. E. Harpham to review certain proceedings of the Board of Supervisors of Ventura County, whereby a certain protection district was created. From action of the superior court in sustaining defendants' demurrer and entering judgment of dismissal upon motion of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. E. Harpham, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. Don G. Bowker, Dist. Atty., and Robert M. Sheridan, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Ventura, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff made application to the superior court of Ventura county for a writ of review directed to certain proceedings whereby the board of supervisors of that county attempted to create a certain protection district known as "Sespe Protection District of Ventura County." The defendants demurred to the petition and moved for dismissal of the action. The demurrer was based upon the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and that the plaintiff did not have legal capacity to sue. The motion was made upon the ground that the petitioner "has not legal capacity to sue, in this, that plaintiff is an individual and is attacking the validity of a public or quasi public corporation, and that the legal existence of same cannot be questioned by a private individual on certiorari, but only by the state of California on quo warranto proceedings." The motion was made upon the petition and upon an affidavit setting forth various proceedings had in performing the work of the supposed Sespe protection district during the two years intervening after the district was declared to be formed and before the commencement of this action. The court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend and granted defendants' motion to dismiss and accordingly entered judgment of dismissal. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The petition shows that the only petition filed before the board of supervisors was a petition signed by more than ten owners of land in a certain district in that petition described, asking for the formation of a storm water district in conformity with a certain act approved March 13, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 339), amended June 6, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 504). That petition was presented to the board of supervisors on April 7, 1916. Thereupon, on the same day, the board of supervisors passed a resolution of intention reciting that a petition had been presented praying for the formation of a protection district in accordance with an act of the Legislature approved March 27, 1895, and acts amendatory thereto, and thereupon the board by resolution declared its intention to form a protection district under said act of 1895 (Stats. 1895, p. 248 et seq.), which act has been amended at several subsequent sessions of the Legislature. Stats. 1897, p. 219; Stats. 1903, p. 328; Stats. 1909, p. 809; Stats. 1911, p. 446; Stats. 1915, p. 1493; Stats. 1917, p. 1219. The law requires that the board by its resolution of intention shall fix a time and place for the hearing of the matter, not less than 30 days after the passage of the resolution. It is only after such notice and hearing, and due disposition of the objections, if any are made, that the board may declare the protection district formed. In this case the petition shows that in its resolution of intention the board, in fixing a time for the hearing, named a day only 28 days subsequent to the passage of the resolution, and the notice was given for that day.

[1] It is apparent that, if the plaintiff is entitled to maintain a proceeding of this nature, the demurrer to his petition should have been overruled, since it states facts showing that the board of supervisors did exceed its jurisdiction in determining that the petition which had been filed was a petition under the Protection District Act of 1895, and further exceeded its jurisdiction by naming for the hearing of the matter a day prior to any time within which, under the statute, the matter could be brought to a hearing.

[2] Respondents contend that upon the showing made by them the Sespe protection district is a de facto corporation, and that its right to exist can only be determined by proceedings in the nature of quo warranto, which proceedings must be brought by the Attorney General in the name of the people of the state. In making this contention respondents must depend upon the provisions of section 803, Code of Civil Procedure, and that part thereof which authorizes the bringing of the action by the Attorney General "against any corporation, either de jure or de facto, which usurps, intrudes into, or unlawfully holds or exercises any franchise, within this state." The contention of respondents is answered by the fact that a protection district organized under said law of 1895 is not a public corporation. It was so held in Pasadena Park Improvement Co. v. Lelande, 175 Cal. 511, 166 Pac. 341, where the point is decided and the reasons fully stated. The court declared that the powers conferred by the act are essentially like those conferred upon the city councils and boards of trustees to create assessment districts for the improvement of streets. Such a district has no semblance of corporate existence other than that it has a name. The name thus given is nothing more than a convenient substitute for a description of the lands subject to assessment. The "protection district" exercises no corporate franchise and is in no particular a self-governing body. It has no life, no organs, no functions. A proceeding in the nature of quo warranto would not lie to test its right of existence. This being so, and since the matters complained of by petitioner involve an excess of jurisdiction by the board of supervisors in the attempt to perform certain functions of a judicial nature, certiorari will lie at the instance of a person who, like the plaintiff, has been injuriously affected thereby.

HOCKERSTON v. HOCKERSTON.
(Civ. 2653.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑2, 870(6)—Appealable Orders.

Where order denying motion for new trial was entered on the 17th day of August, 1915, appeal from the order should be dismissed in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 963, which took effect prior to such date, but the order may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment taken within due time, in view of section 956.

2. Divorce 🔑184(12)—Excluding Corroborative Testimony—Harmless Error.

Where plaintiff's counsel, in his offer to produce evidence additional to plaintiff's testimony, stated the facts which he offered to prove and his statement contained no facts in addition to those already stated by plaintiff herself, error, if any, in not allowing plaintiff to present corroborating testimony required by Civ. Code, § 130, in divorce suits was harmless, if the facts to which plaintiff had testified were insufficient to establish her cause of action for divorce.

3. Divorce 🔑27(6)—"Extreme Cruelty."

Striking wife in sudden quarrel was not a deliberate act or cause of action on the part of defendant husband, whereby he sought to or did become guilty of extreme cruelty within the meaning of the statute authorizing a divorce.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Extreme Cruelty.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action for divorce by Marguerite Hockerston against Frederick Hockerston. Judgment denying divorce, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Charles M. Ackerman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action for divorce wherein the defendant did not appear; and the court, after hearing the evidence, entered judgment denying the application for a divorce. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

[1] The order denying the motion for a new trial was entered on the 17th day of August, 1915. The amendment of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, taking away the right of appeal from an order refusing such a motion, took effect on the 8th day of August, 1915. It follows that the appeal from that order should be dismissed, but the order may be reviewed on appeal from the judgment, taken within due time. Code Civ. Proc. § 956; Hirsch v. All Persons, 173 Cal. 268, 159 Pac. 712.

The complaint charged personal violence committed by the defendant against the plaintiff on one single stated occasion, and alleged that by reason thereof grievous mental suffering, anguish, and distress, and grievous physical suffering and pain, resulted to the plaintiff. The facts shown by the plaintiff's testimony were as follows: On the evening of the stated day the plaintiff came home after the defendant had arrived there. Defendant inquired why the plaintiff was not at home in time. She informed him that she had been sent for to get their deed to the property which they had purchased. The defendant said that he would call that man up and tell him he had no business calling her up at that time of day. He took up a desk telephone and attempted to call the party. The plaintiff attempted to interfere. "He said he was going to call them up and cuss them out and I would not let him phone. * * * I just held my finger on the clicker while he was talking to them. * * * And he jerked it loose from me and struck me with it." At the end of the encounter "there was the print of his hand upon my shoulder, and my hand was bleeding and my finger was black where he jerked out the knuckle, and I had several bruises on my neck. Q. Do you know how many times he struck you on that occasion? A. No, I hardly do. * * * He struck me with his fist. I do not know whether it was more than once or not, but I know I fell the three times. * * * I suppose he hit me or I would not have fallen. The most I remember was getting up after the fall. * * * He was drinking or he would not have done so. He had been drinking just enough to make him excited."

At the close of the plaintiff's testimony, and without waiting for other evidence, the court expressed the opinion that the plaintiff should go back and live with the defendant, and announced that "the decree is denied." Plaintiff's attorney inquired if the court would hear any corroboration. The court replied:

> "If you are only going to prove this same circumstance, there is no occasion to waste time on it, because there is no extreme cruelty shown in that."

Plaintiff's attorney had other witnesses present in court, but admitted that he offered to do nothing more than to corroborate the testimony of the plaintiff.

[2] In view of the fact that a divorce may not be granted upon the uncorroborated admissions or testimony of the parties (Civ. Code, § 130), it would generally be error for the court to refuse to allow the plaintiff opportunity to present corroborating evidence. In this case, however, the plaintiff's counsel, in his offer to produce evidence additional to the plaintiff's testimony, stated the facts which he offered to prove by the witnesses, and his statement contains no facts in addition to those already stated by the plaintiff herself. If, therefore, the court erred at all, the error was harmless, if the facts to which the plaintiff had testified were not sufficient to establish the plaintiff's cause of action. Let it be assumed that other witnesses had testified to those same facts, and the result of the case would not be changed.

[3] It should further be noted that, notwithstanding the judge's first announcement that "the decree is denied," the court did not treat the case as closed at that time. On the contrary, plaintiff's attorney was permitted to make his offer of further proof, and two or three additional questions were asked of the plaintiff and answered by her. The court then again announced its denial of a decree of divorce. Assuming full proof and ample corroboration of the facts testified to by the plaintiff, those facts do not show any deliberate act or course of action on the part of the defendant whereby he sought to or did become guilty of extreme cruelty within the meaning of the statute authorizing divorces upon the ground of extreme cruelty. So far as the evidence shows, the defendant may have been usually affectionate and considerate in every way toward the plaintiff, except in the instance of this sudden quarrel, wherein it seems clear that the acts of both parties to the altercation were done under the excitement of a sudden and unpremeditated disagreement. Admitting that the defendant's acts were wrong and unjustifiable, the circumstances were not such that, standing separate and alone, as they do, they constituted a cause of action for divorce. Some latitude for the exercise of discretion is permitted to the court in determining what constitutes extreme cruelty, and in this instance that discretion was not abused by the court.

The appeal from the order is dismissed. The judgment is affirmed.

MITCHELL v. EXCELSIOR WATER & MINING CO. (Civ. 1989.)

1. WITNESSES ⚷269(8)—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

In an action for loss of plaintiff's cattle through the failure of defendant with whom they were pastured to furnish feed and shelter, in view of the fact that plaintiff on direct examination asked defendant's stock foreman how many cattle were kept on defendant's ranges at the time referred to, defendant's questions to the foreman as to whether there was not ample feed were pertinent cross-examination.

2. EVIDENCE ⚷481(1)—OPINION—TESTIMONY OF STOCK FOREMAN.

In an action for loss of plaintiff's stock on account of defendant's negligence in failing to supply proper feed and shelter, questions by defendant to its stock foreman called on direct examination by plaintiff held not improper as seeking to elicit expert testimony, having to do only with whether defendant's range was adequate to feed the cattle on it, and not involving scientific inquiries.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷1058(1)—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

In an action for death of plaintiff's stock through the negligence of defendant in failing to furnish proper feed and shelter, exclusion of evidence of defendant's foreman as to the sufficiency of defendant's range feed to take care of the cattle held harmless to defendant, in view of the evidence received.

4. Trial 🔑47(2)—Proof of Defense—Objection to Testimony.

In an action for the death of plaintiff's stock through the negligence of defendant in failing to furnish feed and shelter, where defendant's foreman was called as a witness by plaintiff, who objected when defendant attempted to elicit from him the sufficiency of defendant's range pasture to take care of the stock, the objection being that the questions were not proper cross-examination, and defendant made no further effort to prove the ranges were not overstocked, defendant was not improperly kept from making proof of such defense.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑1001(1)—Review—Verdict.

Whenever the question is raised on appeal as to the side on which the evidence preponderates, and there is testimony supporting the conclusion of a jury, which testimony is not inherently improbable, the answer always must be that the jury has conclusively decided the question.

6. Animals 🔑23(2)—Grazing Live Stock—Duty of Depositary — Sufficiency of Evidence.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain finding for plaintiff that defendant did not supply his cattle with sufficient feed and shelter in performance of the duty of an agister or a depositary of living animals stipulated by Civ. Code, § 1834.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by C. C. Mitchell against the Excelsior Water & Mining Company, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Metteer, of Sacramento, and W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant.

James Snell, of Grass Valley, and Edward B. Stanwood, of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. Plaintiff in his complaint alleged, in effect, that, in the fall of 1916, he delivered 188 head of horned cattle and one horse to defendant upon defendant's range near Smartsville, in the county of Yuba, for the purpose of being pastured during the winter of 1916–17; that, after receipt of the animals, defendant negligently and carelessly failed to furnish them with proper food and shelter, and, because thereof, the horse and 59 head of cattle died, and others of the animals were lessened in value, and as a result thereof plaintiff was damaged in the sum of $7,400.

Defendant by its answer admitted the receipt of certain animals from the plaintiff for the purpose of pasturage for a consideration, but denied any negligence or carelessness on its part, denied any damage suffered by plaintiff, and denied that any of the animals died because of any carelessness, negligence, or want of proper care on defendant's part.

The cause was tried before a jury, which rendered its verdict in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $2,000. Judgment was entered on the verdict, defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment.

Appellant concedes that there was a conflict in the testimony which the jury resolved in favor of plaintiff, and concedes that the cattle which died were undoubtedly worth the amount found by the jury.

The only question presented for our decision is as to certain rulings of the court in sustaining objections of plaintiff to two questions asked by defendant on cross-examination of R. E. Colling, stock foreman for defendant, who was called as a witness on behalf of plaintiff. The record on this point is as follows:

"Defendant's Counsel: Q. Mr. Colling, you have been asked about the number, taken under ordinary conditions, that range during the winter of 1916–17 was not overstocked, was it?

"Mr. Snell: The witness is not qualified to answer that.

"The Court: Make your objection.

"Mr. Snell: We object on the ground there is no foundation for the introduction of this evidence, and it is not proper cross-examination.

"The Court: Sustained.

"Mr. Carlin: Q. Is it not a fact that there was ample feed on that range to feed all that stock?

"Mr. Snell: We object on the ground that it is not proper cross-examination, and the proper foundation has not been laid for the introduction of this evidence.

"The Court: Sustained."

From the testimony introduced by plaintiff, it appears: That, for several years prior to the year 1916, he pastured stock on the ranges of the defendant. That, in the months of October and November of the year 1916, he sent to the defendant's ranges certain numbers of cattle for the purpose of pasturing them thereon, under a previously made agreement with the defendant. These cattle were taken to said ranges for the plaintiff by one Josiah Sherman, who testified that, on taking said stock to said ranges, he said to one R. E. Colling, stock foreman of the defendant, that he (Colling, acting for defendant) was to feed the cattle in case it became necessary to do so; that is to say, the defendant was to feed the cattle hay if the pasturage became short and inadequate for that purpose. That he "asked him (Colling) what the charge would be if the cattle were fed off his hay; he said 10 cents a day." Sherman then said to Colling:

"Any cattle it is necessary to feed, give it to them and present your bill to Mr. Mitchell. That was my instructions."

It further appears from the testimony that on the defendant's ranges in the fall of 1916 there were pastured approximately 1,600 head of cattle. The ranges embraced, approximately, 3,500 acres of range lands, of which something more than 400 acres were irrigated. The defendant also laid in an unusually large supply of hay in 1916 for the purpose of meeting the contingency of a cold and severe winter, the result of which, if it happened, would be a shortage of pasturage followed by the inadequacy of the range feed to supply the stock pastured thereon. It happened that, with the arrival of the first of the winter months, cold north winds prevailed, and they were followed by cold rains, sleet, and frosty weather, which continued into the month of February, 1917, with the result that the ranges became comparatively barren of feed or so short in that particular as to render them wholly insufficient to feed properly the large number of cattle then grazing thereon; the defendant being thereupon compelled to feed the stock from the hay with which it had provided itself for the purpose of meeting such a situation.

There is testimony that plaintiff's cattle, when delivered to Colling on the defendant's ranges, were in excellent condition; that later on, after having been on the ranges several weeks, they lost weight and were in bad condition; and that a number of them died. There is ample testimony to support the claim of the plaintiff, and the implied finding of the jury, that the death of the plaintiff's cattle was due to want of sufficient feed or nourishment.

The record further shows that, under date of January 1, 1917, Colling wrote as follows to plaintiff:

> "Dear Sir: Just a few lines to notify you about your stock. I told your boy to tell you, but I thought he might have overlooked it. You have 3 dead ones now and if there isn't something done in the near future you will have a heavy loss for some of them are getting very thin and need hay very bad now and we haven't but very little hay and don't know whether we can get any more or not. Hoping to hear from you by return mail, I remain,
> "Very respectfully, R. E. Colling."

To the above letter the plaintiff replied, under date of January 3, 1917, and, among other things, said in his letter:

> "Anything that needs hay, feed them. That is the way they have always been taken care of down there. If I had knew you had no hay earlier in the season, I would have made a different arrangement. * * *"

Under date of January 4, 1917, the plaintiff addressed to said R. E. Colling a letter in the following language:

> "Do not let my cattle die for want of feed, as I sent them down to be well fed and taken care of; fed them, if necessary."

On February 1, 1917, the defendant, through its secretary R. Beatty, sent to the plaintiff a letter of which the following is a copy:

> "You are hereby notified to remove your stock placed on the lands of the Excelsior Water & Mining Company, for the reason that the pasture is insufficient, owing to unusual cold weather for the past two months."

As supporting their contention that the court below committed prejudicial error in making the rulings of which they here complain and to which reference is hereinabove made, counsel for the appellant, in their brief, say:

> "Plaintiff made Mr. Colling his witness, and throughout his testimony the court will see that persistent effort was made to show that the ranges were in fact overstocked. He was shown to be fully qualified as a witness to testify to the condition of the range. He was the range foreman in charge of all the stock; had an experience of more than five years in such work, and over one year on these very ranges. He knew the ranges thoroughly, knew the number of stock on the ranges, and had ample experience to qualify him to testify as to the capacity of the ranges to feed the stock placed therein during the pasturage or feeding season."

[1, 2] We are inclined to think that, inasmuch as the plaintiff, on direct examination, asked Colling how many cattle were kept on the defendant's ranges at the time referred to, the questions constituted pertinent cross-examination. Nor do we think the questions called for expert testimony, within the strict legal concept of that phrase. While, of course, they invited the expression by the witness of his opinion of the matter to which they were addressed, they did not involve scientific inquiries or the elucidation of a subject beyond the competency of ordinary witnesses who have means and habits of observation. Colling's practical experience of several years as an agister or a foreman of a stock-grazing range undoubtedly qualified him to express a satisfactory opinion as to whether the ranges were overstocked at the times mentioned—that is, whether more cattle were taken and kept on the defendant's range lands than they, with respect to feed, were capable of accommodating in a sufficient or proper way.

[3, 4] But, in view of the evidence received, the rulings foreclosing answers to the questions were without prejudice. As shown, both the defendant and its foreman stated in letters to the plaintiff that there was not sufficient herbage produced on the ranges to supply his cattle with feed necessary to their proper sustenance. It was for that reason that the defendant notified the plaintiff to remove his stock from the ranges. It was so declared in express language in the letters from defendant and its agents to the plaintiff. The letter to the plaintiff from Colling, dated January 1, 1917, stated that some of the latter's stock had already died. As seen, there is testimony that the cattle of plaintiff, when taken to the defendant's ranges, were in robust physical condition, but that they began to fall off in weight within a few weeks after they were placed thereon. Upon this testimony, and that furnished by the letters mentioned, the jury could reasonably and justly have determined, and undoubtedly it did thus conclude, that the cause of the death of plaintiff's cattle was the insufficiency or shortness of the feed on the defendant's ranges. If the witness had been permitted to answer the questions and had said that the ranges were not overstocked, the fact would still have remained that the defendant expressly admitted that, whatever the cause, there was insufficient feed upon the ranges to afford sufficient nourishment for the cattle. But there is still another consideration to which attention may well be directed in this connection. The defendant, in making its defense, was entitled to show, if it could, that the ranges were not overstocked, that there was sufficient feed growing on the ranges to supply in proper measure all the cattle grazing on said ranges, and that the death of certain of the cattle of the plaintiff was due to some other cause than that of starvation or want of sufficient feed. The objection to the questions referred to was not upon the ground that they called for immaterial or irrelevant testimony, nor would such ground of objection have been tenable. There was therefore nothing in the court's rulings indicating or intimating that the defendant would not have been permitted to make or to attempt to make the proof suggested. But the defendant, in its defense, made no effort to prove that the ranges were not overstocked or that there was no greater number of cattle grazing on the ranges than the feed thereon would accommodate or supply. The witness Colling, defendant's foreman, to whom the above questions were propounded by defendant when he was testifying as plaintiff's witness, was called by the defendant as a witness, but was then asked no question as to that matter. The subject-matter of the questions was peculiarly one of defense, and it would seem that defendant has little ground of complaint when, having been refused permission by the court to go into it on cross-examination of plaintiff's witness, it failed even to attempt to bring it in as a matter of defense, to which it was pertinent and appropriate.

[5] While the points above considered are conceded by counsel for defendant to present the only questions of importance here, and, indeed, in one part of their brief admit that there is a conflict in the evidence which the jury has determined against defendant, yet, nevertheless, they declare in another part of their brief that the preponderance of the evidence was in favor of appellant. Whenever the question is raised on appeal as to the side on which the evidence preponderates, and there is testimony supporting the conclusion of a jury or the findings of a trial court, which testimony is not inherently improbable, the answer must always be that the jury or the trial court has conclusively decided the question. In other words, the preponderance of the evidence in such case must always be held by a reviewing court to be with the victorious party in the court below, for the jury or the trial court has so found after subjecting all the testimony received before it to the tests whereby only may the credence and the weight to which it is justly entitled be determined. In this case, as has been herein already shown, the plaintiff and his employé, Sherman, testified that, upon the delivery of the former's cattle to defendant's ranges, said stock was in a strong and healthy physical condition, and, furthermore, declared that they, at the same time, had or entered into an express understanding or agreement with the defendant or its duly authorized agent that, in case there became, for any reason, a shortage of growing feed on the ranges, the defendant would furnish and feed plaintiff's stock with hay. The jury was apparently justified in finding, as impliedly it did find, that the defendant did not keep this agreement, and that, as a consequence, there being a shortage of growing feed on the ranges properly to feed the stock, a number of the cattle of plaintiff died from starvation or lack of sufficient or proper nourishment.

[6] The law provides (Civ. Code, § 1834) that "a depositary of living animals must provide them with suitable food and shelter, and treat them kindly." In this case the verdict implies that the defendant's conduct in the matter of the treatment of the plaintiff's cattle, or at least a portion of them, failed to measure up to the obligation imposed upon an agister or a depositary of living animals by said section, and we think, as before stated, that there is ample testimony disclosed by this record which supports the conclusion of the jury.

MONROE v. PLEASANTS et al. (Civ. 1965.)

1. Trial ⟹397(4)—Findings—Necessity — Absence of Evidence.

There being no evidence of taxes being assessed, there is no call for finding thereon relative to the question of adverse possession.

2. Adverse Possession ⟹89—Payment of Taxes.

The requirement of the payment of taxes as an element, under Code Civ. Proc. § 325, subd. 2, of adverse possession, does not apply where no taxes have been assessed.

3. Adverse Possession ⟹95—Taxes—Burden of Proof.

The burden of proof as to assessment of taxes, which should be paid as an element of adverse possession, is on the party combating claim of adverse possession.

4. Appeal and Error ⟹1068(3)—Harmless Error—Uncertainty in Judgment.

It is immaterial to plaintiff if judgment is less certain than it might have been as to quantity of water awarded to defendants; finding that plaintiff is not entitled to any of the water flowing in the stream being amply supported.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by J. J. Monroe against Mary Pleasants and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for appellant.

Daly B. Robnett, of Alturas, for respondents.

HART, J. Plaintiff brought the action to have defendants enjoined from diverting fourteen-fifteenths of the waters of Dodson creek, in the county of Modoc, and to have it decreed that plaintiff was entitled to that quantity of water from said stream for the irrigation of certain lands owned by him. He claimed to be the owner of all the waters of said stream by appropriation by his grantors, more than 40 years prior to the commencement of the action, but alleged that he had permitted defendants to use one-fifteenth of said water for the purpose of irrigating a small garden and some fruit trees. Plaintiff also claimed ownership by prescription, alleging open, notorious, and adverse possession and the payment of all taxes levied against his water rights, dams, and ditches for more than 5 years preceding the commencement of the action.

By way of separate defense, defendants alleged in their answer that defendant, Mary A. Pleasants and her grantors, for more than 38 years prior to the commencement of the action, had been the owners of certain lands, 60 acres of which were riparian to the watershed of said Dodson creek, and were entitled to the water thereof for purposes of irrigation, and that 50 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, were reasonably necessary for the irrigation of said lands. Ownership of said waters by appropriation and also by adverse possession was also alleged. The answer prayed that defendants be adjudged the owners of 50 inches of the water of said stream.

Plaintiff alleged that at the beginning of the irrigating season the creek carried 200 inches of water, while defendants denied that it ever contained more than 50 inches; all parties alleging that it diminished to practically nothing during the dry seasons.

The judgment was in favor of the defendants, and the appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The claim for a reversal of the judgment is based upon these propositions: (1) That certain findings essential to the support of the judgment are not supported by the evidence; (2) that defendants, having relied on adverse user or a prescriptive right to the water, did not prove, and the court therefore made no finding, that they and their predecessors, etc., "have paid all the taxes * * * which have been levied and assessed upon" said water right (Code Civ. Proc. § 325, subd. 2); (3) that the judgment is uncertain, in that it awarded all the water of the stream to the defendants instead of a definite number of inches.

1. The following findings are those attacked by the appellant as not supported by the evidence: (1) That the quantity of water flowing in Dodson creek does not exceed 50 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure; (2) that at least 60 acres of the land of the defendant Mary Pleasants is irrigable from said stream and is riparian thereto, and that 50 inches of water are reasonably necessary for the growing of crops on said land; (3) that defendant Mary Pleasants, commencing with the year 1886, and for more than five years continuously thereafter, openly, notoriously, uninterruptedly, peaceably, and adversely diverted and used all the waters of said stream for the irrigation of her said lands and was so using them at the time of the commencement of the action; (4) that all of the water of said stream is necessary and indispensable to the proper irrigation of said defendant's lands; (5) that since the beginning of the year 1886 plaintiff and his grantors made no beneficial use of said waters, but that defendant Mary A. Pleasants did.

The lands of defendants are situated on Dodson creek above those of the plaintiff.

In the year 1873, one Richard C. Robinson, the original homesteader of 160 acres of plaintiff's land, filed in Siskiyou county, of which Modoc county at the time was a part, an appropriation of 100 inches of water of the flow of Dodson creek. In 1875 Robinson conveyed his right, title, and interest in the homestead and in his said water right and a certain ditch to one Charles U. Snyder, who secured a patent for the land in 1877. In 1885 Snyder became financially involved and made an assignment to one Louis Sachs of about 2,200 acres, known as the Willow ranch, including the land of plaintiff, which the latter acquired in 1905 and has owned ever since.

Walter Bonner, a witness called on behalf of plaintiff, testified that he first became acquainted with the lands of plaintiff and defendants in 1875; that he worked on plaintiff's land in 1899 and in other years; that hay had been raised on the land since 1875; and that the crop must have been irrigated by water from Dodson creek. It was stipulated at the trial that Frank Plummer and one Gillette, if present, would testify to substantially the same facts as did the witness Bonner.

J. M. Kirkpatrick testified that he had been acquainted with the land of plaintiff since 1900; that in the fall of that year he had purchased some clover and timothy hay grown on said land; that he bought the land in 1903 and sold it to the plaintiff in 1905; that while he owned it he produced hay from about 75 acres which he irrigated from the waters of Dodson creek; that he could not have produced the hay crop without irrigation.

The plaintiff testified that from the time he bought the place in 1905 he had cultivated and irrigated about 110 acres and raised wild hay thereon.

In 1878, one W. H. Vineyard homesteaded the lands now belonging to defendants and filed with the county recorder of Modoc county a notice of location of 50 inches of the waters of the stream in question, which was called in the notice "Deep Gulch." From 1878 on he used the water for irrigating a garden, orchard, and berries, and used the water for the house and stock. In 1885 Vineyard deeded his "water right and water ditches, * * * the same being the water claim located" by the notice above mentioned, to George W. Pleasants, husband of defendant Mary Pleasants, and they moved onto the land in 1886 or 1887. Mrs. Pleasants testified that at that time there was on the place a young orchard of about 35 or 40 trees, some berry bushes, and a garden spot; that they irrigated these, and that the trees bore the second year they were there; that later they enlarged the garden and also fenced in a pasture which they irrigated; that they endeavored at all times to use 50 inches of water, but had to guess at it, as they had no headgate in. She said that some of the water they used went back into the creek "and we figured that the subirrigation and the waste water would be enough for the Willow ranch lands."

Mrs. Pleasants' two sons, Clyde C. and Porter H. Pleasants, testified that defendants always used all the water for irrigation; that they raised alfalfa, grain, hay, and garden stuff and had fruit trees; and that the water was necessary for the cultivation of said crops.

At different times, while plaintiff's lands were included in the Willow ranch, Grant I. Taggart, H. Barnes, and Frank Barnes were managing the ranch. They testified that they never used the water or made any claim to it and that Mr. Pleasants was using it.

In the year 1907–08 plaintiff leased his land to one Ernest Chandler, who testified that he used such water as was permitted to come down; that he knew defendants were using the water; and that he (Chandler) needed much more water than he got.

It appeared that the flow of the water had never been measured, but several witnesses testified that there were about 50 inches of water in the stream. It is enough to say upon the point under consideration that the foregoing statement of the evidence is itself sufficient to show that the challenged findings are amply supported.

[1-3] 2. Conceding, for the purposes of this case, that to establish a prescriptive title to a water right growing out of a stream or creek to which the lands of the party claiming the right are riparian, it is necessary to observe the requirement in that respect as to land of the proviso of subdivision 2 of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and so show that all the taxes which have been levied and assessed thereon have been paid by the party claiming title by prescription and his predecessors and grantors, the answer to the contention of the appellant that the failure of the court to find that taxes had been levied and assessed on the water right and paid by defendants is fatal to the judgment is found in the fact that there is no evidence in the record that any taxes were or had ever been levied and assessed upon the water right in question, and therefore there was no call for a finding as to that proposition. Heilborn v. Last Chance Water Ditch Co., 75 Cal. 117, 123, 17 Pac. 65; Oneto v. Restano, 78 Cal. 374, 379, 20 Pac. 743; Spargur v. Heard, 90 Cal. 221, 229, 27 Pac. 198; Baldwin v. Temple, 101 Cal. 396, 404, 35 Pac. 1008; Silva v. Hawn, 10 Cal. App. 544, 551, 102 Pac. 952; Smith v. Smith, 21 Cal. App. 378, 380, 131 Pac. 890. These cases hold that the requirement of the payment of taxes as an element of adverse possession does not apply where no taxes have been assessed. "And," it is said in Oneto v. Restano, supra, "the burden of showing that taxes have been assessed is upon the party combating the claim of possession." See, also, as to the latter statement, Baldwin v. Temple, 101 Cal. 404, 35 Pac. 1011, supra.

[4] 3. In support of the proposition that the findings and judgment are uncertain, in that the quantity of water which the defendants are thereby awarded is not specified in inches, the appellant cites the case of Riverside Water Co. v. Sargent et al., 112 Cal. 230, 44 Pac. 560. In that case, which involved a controversy as to the relative rights of the plaintiff and defendants to the use (acquired by appropriation) of water flowing in the Santa Ana river, in San Bernardino county, the court found that plaintiff was the owner of all the water flowing in said river, "except so much thereof as defendants are entitled to take and use, as hereinafter stated," and that defendants had, for more than six years before the commencement of the action, continuously diverted water from said river by means of "said dam and ditch, and has the right to take the water by those means 'to the extent of the full capacity of said ditch, and * * * during the irrigating season, * * * to wit, from the 15th day of April to the 15th day of September of each year, * * * to the extent of all the water being and flowing in said river at the place of said diversion." The judgment substantially conformed to said findings. The court, reversing the judgment, said:

> "The decisions of this court establish that in cases like the present the findings and judgment must fix the extent of the superior right, viz. the quantity of water to be allowed to the party whose claim is paramount; otherwise, the judgment fails to attain the certainty necessary to an estoppel upon the main subject of the litigation. [Citing cases.] In this instance, the court has not found the disputed quantity nor data from which it may be calculated. In view of the fact, well known, that the carrying capacity of a water ditch is subject to rapid changes, being affected by the nature of the soil through which it passes, the rapidity and consequent scouring force of its current, the care it receives, and other matters more casual, the finding here seems well devised, as said in Lakeside Ditch Co. v. Crane, 80 Cal. 182 [22 Pac. 76], to 'lead to future disputes and litigation.'"

There is a clear distinction between that case and this. Here the finding is that the plaintiff is entitled to the use of none of the waters of Dodson creek, but that the defendants, having since the year 1886 continuously used all the water thereof for beneficial purposes, are entitled to all said water, and it is further found that the quantity of water flowing in said stream does not exceed 50 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure. The judgment follows the findings. Thus it will be noted that here there is but one right dealt with by the findings and judgment—the right of the defendants. The evidence is sufficiently ample to support the finding that the plaintiff is not entitled to any of the water flowing in said stream. Therefore, even if the judgment were less certain than it could have been made as to the quantity of water awarded to the defendants, the fact of such uncertainty is immaterial to the plaintiff. Watson v. Lawson, 166 Cal. 235, 243, 135 Pac. 961. Of course, where there are two adverse claimants of a water right, and the court finds that both are entitled to the use of the water of a stream, there should be as definite a judgment as the circumstances or conditions will permit defining the respective rights of the parties to the water or fixing the proportion of the water each is entitled to, and the manner and times of use and diversion, so that each, particularly the second or inferior claimant, may know when his right attaches. Watson v. Lawson, supra. It is clear to our minds, from an examination of the evidence, that the court has done this here. There is testimony which shows that the quantity of water flowing in the stream was fluctuating. On occasions, according to the seasons, there would be a very small or limited amount of water in the creek, while on others there would be a reasonably fair flow, not, however, exceeding 50 inches, according to the well-supported finding of the court. It would seem, therefore, that the court did the best it could do under the evidence and the circumstances by finding the maximum quantity of water flowing in the stream at any time and then finding that the defendants were entitled to all the water up to that maximum.

There is some claim that the evidence does not show that the defendants used all the water of the stream. There is some testimony that certain of the waters of the creek did flow on to the Robinson place on certain occasions. But the testimony further shows that when water from the creek did reach the Robinson land it was occasioned either by the flood water in the first part of spring and before any one could make any beneficial use of the water, or by water which naturally ran off the sloping lands of the defendants after they had made use of it.

There are no other points to be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

41 Cal. App. 167

TROUT v. OGILVIE et al. (Civ. 2894.)

1. Specific Performance 🔑86 — Compelling Testamentary Disposition—Character of Relief Granted.

Though specific performance in a literal sense cannot be given to compel a testamentary disposition of property after testator's death, nevertheless a court of equity may, when justified, grant substantially the same relief by treating the heirs as trustees and compelling them to convey the property in accordance with the terms of the contract.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1071(3)—Harmless Error—Finding.

If the contract to make a testamentary disposition of property as alleged in the complaint be one that equity will not enforce, it is immaterial that the finding that no contract was made is not supported by the evidence.

3. Frauds, Statute of 🔑75—Contract for Testamentary Disposition of Property—Necessity of Writing.

A contract to make a certain testamentary disposition of property, not being in writing, was invalid, in view of Civ. Code, § 1624, as amended in 1905, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, as amended in 1907.

4. Specific Performance 🔑44—Contract for Testamentary Disposition—Part Performance—Payment of Money.

The payment of money by a spouse is not such a part performance of an oral contract for testamentary disposition of property as will take the contract out of the statute of frauds, so as to justify decree for specific performance.

5. Frauds, Statute of 🔑5—Oral Contract—Marriage as Consideration.

Marriage is not of itself a sufficient consideration to take an oral contract for the making of a testamentary disposition of property out of the statute of frauds.

6. Frauds, Statute of 🔑129(12) — Part Performance — Antenuptial Agreement for Testamentary Disposition — Acts Referable to Marital Obligation.

Prior to the adoption of amendments of 1905 to Civ. Code, § 1624, and of 1907 to Code Civ. Proc. § 1973, to take an oral contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds, the acts relied on must be unequivocally referable to the contract, and personal services performed by a wife in caring for husband in his illness, and other acts performed after the marriage, were referable to the marital obligation, as well as to prenuptial oral contract for testamentary disposition of property, and would not take the contract out of the statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 155).

7. Specific Performance 🔑41 — Partly Performed Oral Contract.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1741, expressly recognizing the power of an equity court to compel specific performance of parol agreements for sale of real property, which would otherwise be invalid, under section 1624, subd. 5, it must be assumed they intended to leave their work complete, and that there is no other exception in the statute to the rule that part performance does not take oral agreements out of the statute.

8. Descent and Distribution 🔑71(1)—Determination of Heirship — Exclusive Remedy.

In suit for specific performance of a contract to make testamentary disposition of property, it is not error for court to decline to determine who are heirs of deceased, because that is a proceeding in the nature of an action to determine heirship, provided for by Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, which must be instituted in the pending probate proceedings; such remedy being ample and exclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Suit by Kate C. Trout against James G. Ogilvie, administrator of the estate of John S. Trout, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Stewart & Stewart and Harold G. Ferguson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a suit in equity to compel specific performance of a contract to make a certain testamentary disposition of property. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

[2] The claim of appellant is that she and John S. Trout, now deceased, in December, 1909, entered into an oral agreement whereby Trout was to make his will in appellant's favor. There is no claim that the agreement was induced by fraud on the part of decedent. The agreement, as alleged in the complaint, was substantially as follows: Trout proposed to appellant that if she would marry him and furnish a home for him during the remainder of his life, and would care for him, and would assist him with her money in paying off certain incumbrances then upon his property, and a balance owing upon property that he had agreed to purchase, she should inherit and succeed to his property, and, after the marriage, "in consideration thereof, and in consideration of the payment of said sums for him," he would make a will in her favor, devising and bequeathing to her all of his property. Appellant, according to the allegations of her complaint, accepted Trout's offer, and thereafter, in performance of the agreement, married him.

The complaint alleges that defendant Ogilvie is the administrator of the estate of John S. Trout, deceased; that defendants other than Ogilvie claim to be the heirs of Trout, but that they are not; and that appellant is Trout's sole heir. The answers deny substantially all the allegations of the complaint. Evidence on behalf of appellant was introduced. Defendants offered no evidence. The court found that Trout made no contract that appellant should inherit or succeed to any of his property, or that he would make a will in her favor, but that during the marriage she advanced and paid for Trout, upon property belonging to him, and for which she has received no payment, sums aggregating $300. The court declined to determine who are the heirs of Trout. This declination was placed upon the ground that, in this action, the court has no jurisdiction to determine the question of heirship. The judgment adjudges that appellant has a lien upon a certain lot, a part of the estate of decedent, for the $300 so paid by her for decedent, and that, aside from such lien, appellant take nothing.

If the contract alleged in the complaint be one that a court of equity will not enforce, it is immaterial that the finding that no such contract was made is not supported by the evidence. The rule is that it is immaterial that there is an erroneous finding upon an issue, where, if the finding were otherwise, a different conclusion would not be necessitated. We think the contract, as alleged in the complaint, is not enforceable.

[3] Sections 1624 of the Civil Code and 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure were amended in 1905 and 1907, respectively, by adding to each section a new subdivision (subdivision 7), whereby it is provided that an agreement to devise or bequeath property or to make any provision for a person by will is invalid if not in writing. The cases cited by appellant involved agreements entered into prior to the adoption of these Code amendments.

[4] Putting out of consideration, for the present, the fact that the agreement between appellant and Trout was made long after subdivision 7 had been added to each of these Code sections, and assuming, for the purpose of this decision only, that such an agreement, though resting in parol and made since the Code amendments, may be taken out of the statute of frauds by such acts of part performance as ordinarily would prompt a court of equity to grant specific performance of an oral contract to sell real property—and appellant cannot possibly invoke any more liberal construction of subdivision 7 of these two Code sections—still we cannot say that the acts of performance pleaded by appellant in her complaint justify the relief sought by her.

The allegation of the complaint is that, in his offer to appellant, Trout said:

> "That he would, after the consummation of said marriage and in consideration thereof, and in consideration of the payment by plaintiff of said sums for him, make a will in favor of plaintiff."

[5] This is tantamount to an allegation that the consideration for Trout's agreement to devise and bequeath his property to appellant was the marriage and the payment by appellant of the sums necessary to relieve Trout's property from the incumbrances thereon and liquidate the balance owing on property contracted for by him. It needs no authority to sustain the universally recognized rule that the payment of money is not such an act of part performance as will take a contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds. The remedy at law for a recovery of the money paid, with interest, is a complete and adequate remedy, and the payment does not work a fraud upon the party paying if the other party refuses or neglects to perform his part. The marriage, according to the allegations of the complaint, is the only other consideration for Trout's promise to "make a will in favor of plaintiff." But marriage is not of itself sufficient to take a contract out of the statute of frauds. Peek v. Peek, 77 Cal. 106, 19 Pac. 227, 1 L. R. A. 185, 11 Am. St. Rep. 244; Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 3; Hunt v. Hunt, 171 N. Y. 396, 64 N. E. 159, 59 L. R. A. 306; Finch v. Finch, 10 Ohio St. 505.

[6] Assuming, without deciding, that appellant is not so far bound by the allegations of her complaint as to be precluded from relying upon evidence of other considerations for Trout's promise, as, for instance, personal services agreed to be and performed by her; that is, caring for him in his illness—and evidence of such services was adduced—still appellant fails to show a case for specific performance of an agreement that, when entered into, was clearly within the statute of frauds. It is true that certain kinds of service of a very personal nature have been held to be sufficient acts of part performance to justify the specific execution of an agreement to devise real property, as, for example, where the services were of such a peculiar character that it is impossible to measure their value by any pecuniary standard, and it is evident that the parties did not intend to measure them by any such standard. Prior to the adoption of the Code amendments already adverted to, such acts of part performance—personal services of an extraordinary nature—were held to be sufficient to warrant a court of equity in granting relief tantamount to specific performance of a contract to devise or bequeath property. Owens v. McNally, supra; Flood v. Templeton, 148 Cal. 378, 83 Pac. 148. To take a contract out of the operation of the statute of frauds, however, the acts relied upon must be unequivocally referable to the contract. Acts which, though in truth done in performance of a contract, admit of an explanation without supposing a contract, are not, in general, such acts of part performance as will take the case out of the operation of the statute. 36 Cyc. 645. The acts relied upon must clearly appear to have been done in pursuance of the contract, and to result from the contract, and not from some other relation. Blum v. Robertson, 24 Cal. 142; Foster v. Maginnis, 89 Cal. 264, 26 Pac. 828; Owens v. McNally, supra, 113 Cal. 451, 45 Pac. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369; Fritz v. Mills, 170 Cal. 458, 150 Pac. 375; Peek v. Peek, supra; Van Epps v. Redfield, 69 Conn. 104, 36 Atl. 1011; Ackerman v. Ackerman, 24 N. J. Eq. 587; Phillips v. Thompson, 1 Johns. Ch. (N. Y.) 149; Pomeroy on Specific Performance, §§ 108, 109. Here the personal services performed by appellant, caring for her husband in his illness—acts performed after the marriage—are referable as well to her marital obligation as a dutiful wife as to the contract alleged in her complaint. "Husband and wife contract towards each other obligations of mutual respect, fidelity and support." Civ. Code, § 155.

It must not be inferred, merely because, for the purpose of this decision, we have assumed that there may be circumstances under which a court of equity may enforce a parol contract to devise or bequeath property, entered into since the amendment of 1905, that such assumption correctly reflects our opinion as to this very important question. On the contrary, we strongly incline to the view that, since the Code amendments in question, such contracts, if resting wholly in parol, are always unenforceable. The only case in this state, to which our attention has been called, arising out of a contract entered into after the Code amendment of 1905, is Hagan v. McNary, 170 Cal. 141, 148 Pac. 937, L. R. A. 1915E, 562. That, however, was an action at law and is not authority in a suit in equity for specific performance.

Though courts of equity, very soon after the passage of the English statute of frauds, asserted jurisdiction to decree a specific execution of verbal contracts for the sale of lands—contracts within the inhibition of subdivision 5 of our statute of frauds—nevertheless eminent judges, at different times, have seriously questioned the wisdom of allowing any exceptions whatever to the statute, and have declared their intention not to extend them beyond the established precedents. Per Field, J., in Arguello v. Edinger, 10 Cal. 158 et seq.; German v. Machin, 6 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 293; Phillips v. Thompson, supra, per Kent, Ch. There are well-considered cases wherein it is held that the doctrine of part performance—a doctrine that is exclusively the creature of equity—applies only to contracts for the sale of land, and does not extend to contracts that are violative of some other provision of the statute of frauds. Equitable Gas, etc., Co. v. Baltimore, etc., Co., 63 Md. 297, a suit in equity for specific performance of an oral agreement not to be performed within a year; McElroy v. Ludlum, 32 N. J. Eq. 828; Osborne v. Kimball, 41 Kan. 187, 21 Pac. 163; Hunt v. Hunt, supra; Oddy v. James, 48 N. Y. 685; Turnow v. Hockstadter, 7 Hun (N. Y.) 80. See, however, McManus v. Cooke, 35 Ch. D. 681, wherein Justice Kay says:

> "The doctrine of part performance of a parol agreement, which enables proof of it to be given notwithstanding the statute of frauds, though principally applied in the case of contracts for the sale or purchase of land, or for the acquisition of an interest in land, has not been confined to those cases. Probably it would be more accurate to say it applies to all cases in which a court of equity would entertain a suit for specific performance if the alleged contract had been in writing."

See, also, Pomeroy on Specific Performance, § 101.

[7] Whatever the rule may be elsewhere, it would seem that in this state the lawmakers intended that the doctrine of part performance, as applied to parol contracts within the statute of frauds, should be confined to contracts relating to the sale of lands—contracts within the inhibition of section 5 of our statute of frauds (Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 5). This seems to be the necessary consequence of section 1741 of the Civil Code, wherein express recognition is given to the power of a court of equity to compel specific performance of "any agreement for the sale of real property in case of part performance thereof." The Code section specifically excepts from the operation of the statute of frauds parol agreements, partly performed, and otherwise would be invalid under subdivision 5 of section 1624. If any other exception were intended, here was the place to make it. The framers of our statute deliberately added one express exception, and we must assume that they intended to leave their work complete. Furthermore, cases such as that in hand are of a class that frequently arise in fraud and abound in perjury. So far as we are informed, practically all of the cases of this class that found their way into our courts prior to the amendments of 1905 and 1907, whereby subdivision 7 was added to sections 1624 of the Civil Code and 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure, were equitable actions for specific performance; and if, in adding this new subdivision to these Code sections, the lawmakers did not intend to put a quietus upon all such cases where the agreement sought to be enforced rests in parol, regardless of performance on the part of the promisee, then we utterly fail to perceive what was intended to be accomplished by these most important and salutary Code amendments.

[8] In declining to determine whether defendants other than Ogilvie were heirs of Trout, the court committed no error. If, as we hold, appellant's alleged contract with Trout is invalid and unenforceable, then her sole right to receive any part of his estate is as an heir—as the surviving wife of John S. Trout. The Code has provided a special proceeding whereby any person claiming to be an heir or entitled to distribution of any part of the estate of a decedent, may file a petition in the pending probate proceeding to have the court ascertain and declare the rights of himself and all others to the estate or any interest therein. Such a proceeding is one in the nature of an action to determine heirship, and must be instituted in the pending probate proceedings. Code Civ. Proc. § 1664. The remedy thus afforded is ample and exclusive. The subject-matter of heirship is vested in the court, sitting as a probate court, wherein the probate proceeding is pending. The whole subject-matter of dealing with the estates of deceased persons is one of statutory regulation, and the policy and intent of our statute very clearly contemplates that property of decedents shall be subjected to the process of administration in the probate court. There is no other method provided by the statute whereby the existence of heirs may be conclusively established, and without doubt the jurisdiction of the superior court, sitting in probate, is both original and exclusive. Estate of Strong, 119 Cal. 655, 666, 51 Pac. 1078; Silva v. Santos, 138 Cal. 541, 71 Pac. 703. It would be an anomaly in jurisprudence if a court that is vested with full jurisdiction in matters of probate could be controlled in the exercise of that jurisdiction by the action of a co-ordinate court, or even by the same court sitting as a court of general jurisdiction.

CHAPMAN v. HICKS et al. (Civ. 2891.)

1. Mortgages 🔑38(1)—Deed Absolute as Mortgage—Evidence.

Evidence held to sustain finding that an instrument in form a deed absolute was in fact a mortgage.

2. Mortgages 🔑32(5)—Mortgage or Deed—Test.

The test of a mortgage is whether the relation of debtor and creditor continues so that there is a subsisting debt after the conveyance.

3. Mortgages 🔑32(2)—Deed Absolute—Intention.

The intention of the parties must govern, and, if a deed is made for the purpose of securing the payment of a debt, it is a mortgage, no matter how strong the language of the deed or any instrument accompanying it may be.

4. Appeal and Error 🔑1011(1)—Mortgages 🔑38(2)—Deed Absolute—Question for Court.

Although the character of a deed absolute cannot be changed to that of a mortgage save upon clear and convincing evidence, yet where there is a substantial conflict it is primarily for the trial court to determine whether the evidence is clear and convincing.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑757(1)—Examination of Typewritten Transcript.

No duty devolves on the court on appeal to examine the voluminous typewritten transcript of the stenographic reporter in search of error.

6. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑231(15)—As Affecting Efficacy of Recordation.

The fact that the acknowledgment of an instrument in form a deed absolute was taken by a notary at a time when he had a general power of attorney from the grantee does not impair the efficacy of its recordation to import notice to subsequent purchasers.

7. Acknowledgment 🔑20(1)—Who May Take—Interested Person.

Because of the probative force accorded to certificates of acknowledgment, as well as the usual important consequences of such instruments, public policy forbids the taking of an acknowledgment by a person directly interested financially or beneficially in the transaction.

8. Acknowledgment 🔑20(3)—Who May Take—Interested Person—Agent.

Where, as in this state, the taking of an acknowledgment is deemed to be a ministerial and not a judicial act, an acknowledgment may be taken before an agent, even though he have indirectly a financial interest in the transaction.

9. Mortgages 🔑139—Deed Absolute as Mortgage—Statute.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 2888, 2924, a deed absolute in form but in effect a mortgage does not pass the legal title, and the grantee, or more properly the mortgagee, is vested with a lien only.

10. Equity 🔑66—Quieting Title Against Mortgagee—Offer to do Equity.

Notwithstanding the lien of a mortgagee is extinguished by lapse of time, the mortgagor cannot without paying his debt quiet title as against mortgagee.

11. Equity 🔑66—Quieting Title Against Mortgagee—Offer to do Equity.

The rule that, notwithstanding the lien of a mortgage is extinguished by lapse of time, the mortgagor cannot without paying his debt quiet the title as against the mortgagee, is equally applicable to a grantee of the mortgagor who acquires the property while it is still burdened with a lien for the security of the debt.

12. EQUITY ⚷66—OFFER TO DO EQUITY.

Where, in action to quiet title against mortgagor's grantee, grantee filed a cross-complaint asking for affirmative relief, he became an actor as much as plaintiff and was bound to do equity by paying the mortgage debt, though the lien of the mortgage had been extinguished by lapse of time.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by William Chapman against G. Woods Hicks and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Charles Lantz, Howard F. Shepherd, and W. J. Davis, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. Elliott Miller and C. W. Byrer, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action to quiet title. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

On March 7, 1905, defendant Hicks and wife executed to plaintiff an instrument, in form a grant deed, but which the court found to be in effect a mortgage given to plaintiff to secure an indebtedness of $265 borrowed by Hicks and wife from plaintiff and evidenced by a promissory note for that sum executed by the borrowers, as payors, to plaintiff, as payee, bearing date March 8, 1905, and due three months after date. Plaintiff, on March 8, 1905, executed an instrument whereby he agreed to reconvey the property to Hicks for the amount so borrowed, if it were paid on or before the maturity of the promissory note, June 8, 1905. The instrument that the court so found to be a mortgage—upon its face a deed absolute—was recorded March 8, 1905. On March 20, 1905, Hicks and wife conveyed the property by grant deed to defendant Hudson. Hicks made several partial payments on the note of himself and wife, but the evidence shows that a very substantial balance still remains unpaid. During a period extending from April 29, 1906, to April 24, 1912, several letters were written by Hicks to plaintiff's attorney in fact, Charles Lantz, relative to payment of the note—letters which plaintiff contends interrupted the running of the statute of limitations. It was stipulated at the trial that, ever since he purchased the property, defendant Hudson has not been a resident of this state; and there is some evidence, though slight and unsatisfactory, that Hudson was not only a nonresident, but has actually been absent from the state ever since shortly after the deed to him. Defendant Hicks, though served with summons, made no appearance. Hudson, in addition to an answer, filed a cross-complaint wherein he alleged ownership in himself and that the prior deed to plaintiff was, in effect, a mortgage, and prayed for affirmative relief. In its findings the court found, not only that the deed to plaintiff was, in effect, a mortgage, but that the note and mortgage given to plaintiff by Hicks et ux. were barred by the statute of limitations, and gave a judgment wherein, denying any relief whatsoever to plaintiff and granting to Hudson affirmative relief in accordance with the prayer of his cross-complaint, it adjudged that Hudson is the owner in fee simple absolute, quieted his title as against any claim of plaintiff or defendant Hicks, and canceled the mortgage.

The appeal is taken under the alternative method. Appellant, however, has not printed in his brief, or in any supplement thereto, any part of the judgment roll; nor has he printed any part of the evidence, save copies of the letters from Hicks to Lantz and a scrap of evidence given by Hicks and Lantz respecting some of the circumstances attending the execution of the instrument which the court found to be a mortgage, together with a detached modicum of the evidence of certain witnesses designed to illustrate certain objections to the admission of evidence, but which is so fragmentary that it fails to serve the purpose.

[1] There is ample evidence to sustain the finding that the instrument from Hicks and wife to appellant, though in form a deed absolute, was in fact a mortgage. On March 7, 1905, Hicks went to the office of Lantz, the attorney in fact for appellant under a general power of attorney, for the purpose of borrowing $265 from appellant through Lantz. According to Lantz, Hicks asked him if he could not borrow the money upon a mortgage. To this Lantz replied that he would not care to handle the matter upon a mortgage, but that if any arrangements were made for a loan Hicks could make an absolute deed and at a later date an agreement to reconvey would be executed. The deed to appellant, though dated March 7, 1905, was not acknowledged until March 8th—the date when the promissory note and the agreement to reconvey were executed—when it was acknowledged before Lantz, as notary public. Hicks testified:

> "I asked if I might raise some money on this property—on one of the lots. Mr. Lantz desired the two lots as stated, and I suggested giving a mortgage. He suggested it was just the same to me, the deed with a mortgage back. I finally accepted that proposition, needing money at the time. * * * I got the agreement back."

By the words "a mortgage back," the witness evidently had reference to the agreement to reconvey—an agreement in the nature of a defeasance. From this evidence it is manifest that Lantz gave Hicks to understand that, so far as the latter's interests were concerned, a deed with an agreement to reconvey, in the nature of a defeasance, would be the same as a mortgage. Though Lantz evidently did not intend that a mortgage eo nomine should be executed, and was unwilling to accept a lien in that form to secure the debt owing to his principal, nevertheless the transaction shows that there was no consideration for a sale and conveyance to appellant, but that there was a loan to Hicks and wife—a continuing, subsisting loan—and that, to secure this loan, Lantz was willing to and did accept a conveyance to his principal.

[2] The test of a mortgage is whether the relation of debtor and creditor continues so that there is a subsisting debt after the conveyance (Husheon v. Husheon, 71 Cal. 407, 12 Pac. 410; Holmes v. Warren, 145 Cal. 457, 78 Pac. 954); and where a deed, absolute on its face, is given to secure a debt, it will be held to be a mortgage even though the parties stipulate it shall be an absolute conveyance (Hodgkins v. Wright, 127 Cal. 688, 60 Pac. 431; Civ. Code, §§ 2924 and 2925).

[4] Although, as has often been said, the character of a deed absolute cannot be changed to that of a mortgage save "upon clear and convincing evidence" (Sheehan v. Sullivan, 126 Cal. 189, 58 Pac. 543) the rule is well settled that, where there is a substantial conflict, it is primarily for the trial court to determine whether the evidence that the instrument was intended to secure the payment of a subsisting debt is clear and convincing (Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 686, 96 Pac. 357). "The presumption arising from the execution and delivery of a deed absolute in form is, undoubtedly, that it is made in pursuance of an agreement to sell, and vests an absolute title in the grantee. * * * At the same time the court has been watchful against all schemes of money-lenders to deprive unfortunate debtors of their lands at less than their value, under the claim that the transaction was a purchase, and not a loan." Locke v. Moulton, 96 Cal. 22, 29, 30 Pac. 957, 959. Here the evidence that the deed was given as security for the debt is not only clear and direct, but, in truth, is without substantial contradiction. There was never any mention of a sale, or of anything but a loan. Prior to the execution of any instrument, Hicks had applied to Lantz for the loan, and had offered to mortgage his land as security, but at Lantz's suggestion he executed instead a deed, signed by himself and wife, and took an instrument, signed by their grantee, purporting to give him an option to repurchase for the amount of the loan evidenced by their promissory note, at any time before the maturity of the debt.

In vain is appellant's contention that the deed was not a mortgage because, on March 7th, when it was executed, there was no debt. The deed was made pursuant to the understanding in accordance with which the loan was made and the promissory note and the agreement to reconvey were executed. The very object of the admission of parol evidence is to show the real nature of the transaction without regard to the mode or form or sequence in which the writings are signed and delivered. "If the defeasance forms a part of the original transaction, it is not material that it be executed at the same time as the deed." Sears v. Dixon, 33 Cal. 332.

[5] Appellant objects to certain rulings upon the admission of evidence. He has not printed in his brief, or in any supplement appended thereto, enough of the evidence to enable us to pass upon the points made in his argument. The requirement of the statute in this regard has been repeatedly pointed out. Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 680, 169 Pac. 379, and cases there cited. No duty devolves upon us to examine the voluminous typewritten transcript of the stenographic reporter in search of error.

[6] Respondent Hudson took his title from Hicks with notice of the prior recorded instrument—in form a deed absolute from Hicks and wife to appellant. The fact that the acknowledgment of that instrument by Hicks and wife was taken by Lantz as notary public, even though at that time Lantz held a general power of attorney from the grantee, or, more correctly speaking, the mortgagee, appellant here, does not impair the efficacy of its recordation to impart notice to subsequent purchasers.

[7, 8] Because of the probative force accorded to certificates of acknowledgment, as well as the usually important consequences of such instruments, public policy forbids the taking of an acknowledgment by a person directly interested, financially, or beneficially, in the transaction. 1 C. J. p. 802; Lee v. Murphy, 119 Cal. 364, 51 Pac. 549, 955; Murray v. Tulare Irrigation Co., 120 Cal. 311, 49 Pac. 563, 52 Pac. 586. But, according to the weight of authority, one who is not pecuniarily or beneficially interested in the transaction evidenced by the deed or other instrument is not disqualified to take the acknowledgment merely because he is acting as the agent or attorney for the party who is beneficially interested. 1 C. J. p. 807, § 115, and note; Bank of Woodland v. Oberhaus, 125 Cal. 320, 57 Pac. 1070; First Nat. Bank v. Merrill, 167 Cal. 392, 139 Pac. 1066. And, in fact, where, as in this state, the taking of an acknowledgment is deemed to be a ministerial and not a judicial act, such an acknowledgment may be taken before an agent even though he have, indirectly, a financial interest in the transaction, as where the acknowledgment of a deed to a bank is taken before the cashier who is likewise a stockholder of the grantee corporation. Bank v. Merrill, supra.

[9] It is not necessary to determine whether the letters from Hicks to Lantz constituted an acknowledgment or promise sufficient to keep alive the original obligation of Hicks and wife to pay the loan; nor whether, notwithstanding Hudson has been absent from the state practically ever since the execution of the deed to him, the lien of appellant's mortgage was extinguished by lapse of time so as to prevent any affirmative relief thereon in his favor as the mortgagee in the instrument so executed to him to secure his loan to Hicks et ux. Since the adoption of the Codes, a deed absolute in form, but in effect a mortgage, does not pass the legal title, and the grantee, or, more properly, the mortgagee is vested with a lien only. Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 Pac. 866; Moisant v. McPhee, 92 Cal. 76, 79, 28 Pac. 46; Locke v. Moulton, supra, 96 Cal. 21, 30 Pac. 957; Civ. Code, §§ 2888 and 2924. Having found that the deed to appellant was in effect a mortgage, and that therefore appellant, as the owner of naught but a mortgage lien, was not entitled to relief in a suit to quiet title as against the owner of the legal title (Von Drachenfels v. Doolittle, 77 Cal. 295, 19 Pac. 518; Fudickar v. Irrigation District, 109 Cal. 38, 41 Pac. 1024), the trial court would have been justified in adjudging that appellant is not the owner of the land, as alleged in his complaint. But the judgment is not thus limited. It is not simply an adjudication that appellant does not own the land. Granting to respondent Hudson affirmative relief, as sought in his cross-complaint, and treating him as an actor in the action, seeking equitable relief—as, indeed, he became upon the filing of his cross-complaint—the trial court adjudged Hudson to be the owner in fee simple absolute, that appellant and all persons claiming under him be forever barred from asserting any title to or lien upon the premises, and that the mortgage be canceled and annulled. "He who seeks equity must do equity." As a condition to affirmative relief upon his cross-complaint, Hudson is as much bound by the equitable principle enunciated in this maxim as he would be were he a plaintiff in an action seeking to quiet his title. Where equitable relief is sought by a cross-bill, the equitable tests usually applied to a bill filed by a complainant are equally applicable to the cross-complainant. 21 R. C. L. p. 502; Union, etc., Bank v. Day, 79 Neb. 845, 113 N. W. 530.

[10, 11] Though the legal title be in Hudson, and though we assume, for the purpose of the decision, that the lien of the mortgage to appellant has become extinguished by lapse of time so that appellant could maintain no affirmative action to foreclose his mortgage, nevertheless the land remains equitably burdened with the debt to secure which the mortgage to appellant was given. Hudson received his conveyance from Hicks and wife shortly after the latter had deeded the land to appellant as security for the money they had borrowed. At that time a liability to pay the debt rested upon the property as well as upon the mortgagors. No rule is more firmly established in this state than the one to the effect that, notwithstanding the lien of a mortgage is extinguished by lapse of time, the mortgagor cannot, without paying his debt, quiet the title as against the mortgagee. The rule is equally applicable to a grantee of the mortgagor who acquires the property while it is still burdened with a lien for the security of the debt. Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 707, 137 Pac. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209; Bulson v. Moffatt, 173 Cal. 685, 161 Pac. 259. "When the plaintiff is himself the debtor, the applicability of the rule is apparent. No different situation is presented where the plaintiff has bought the land before the right to foreclose the mortgage has become barred. In such case, he acquired the property subject to a valid existing lien, which was, presumably, taken into account in fixing the purchase price. Such property, when he acquired it was bound by the debt, and it would be as inequitable to relieve him of the burden without payment as it would be to thus free the original debtor." Faxon v. All Persons, supra, 166 Cal. 721, 137 Pac. 925 (L. R. A. 1916B, 1209). Where the lien of the mortgage is extinguished by lapse of time, the mortgagee has nothing that the mortgagor or his grantee can redeem in an action brought in the exercise of the statutory right of "redemption," so called, as recognized by sections 2903–2905 of the Civil Code and section 346 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Under such circumstances, an action to "redeem," whether by the mortgagor or his grantee, is, in effect, merely an action to remove a cloud, and, as was said in Raynor v. Drew, supra:

> "Since a court of equity may require justice to be done as a condition of removing the cloud, why should there be any period of limitation for such an action?"

[12] The same principle applies with equal force where the grantee of the mortgagor is seeking such relief by cross-complaint filed by him in an action to quiet title brought against him by the mortgagee. Under such circumstances the cross-complainant is an actor in the action—as much so as the plaintiff himself in the suit to quiet title—and is equally bound to do equity as a condition to the obtaining of equitable relief.

Had the court specifically found that the loan to Hicks has not been wholly repaid, and had it determined the amount that remains unpaid, this court might have remanded the cause with directions to enter a decree in accordance with the views set forth in this opinion, as was done in Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. 225, and Boyce v. Fisk, 110 Cal. 107, 42 Pac. 473. For lack of such finding, the case must be remanded for a retrial.

SLEDGE et ux. v. STOLZ et al. (Civ. 1976.)

1. Appeal and Error ⚷901—Presumption Against Error.

Error will not be presumed, and the burden is on appellant to show it.

2. Appeal and Error ⚷1169(3)—Overruling Demurrer.

Though by omission of an allegation a complaint does not state a cause of action, and general demurrer thereto was improperly overruled, yet where the appeal is on the record alone, and it making it manifest judgment for plaintiff, after a trial on the merits, was in no way based on or due to any defect in the complaint, the judgment will be sustained.

3. Mines and Minerals ⚷55(4)—Deed—Condition.

Where the sole consideration for a deed of mining claims, executed in pursuance of an agreement for development and the payment of royalties, was the payment of royalties provided for in the agreement, there was implied obligation to work the mine, which was therefore a condition of the deed, and which condition might be enforced by forfeiture.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tuolumne County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by W. N. Sledge and wife against H. E. N. Stolz and others and Tuolumne Deep Channel Mining Company. From judgment for plaintiffs, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. K. Brown, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Grant & Zimdars and Wm. H. Bryan, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action tried by the court without a jury to have a decree declaring that plaintiffs are the owners of certain mining claims free and clear from any rights acquired by defendants or any of them thereto, under the certain agreement and deed mentioned in the complaint.

A general demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendants answered and went to trial on the merits. Findings of fact were in favor of plaintiffs, and judgment was entered in accordance therewith. Defendant Tuolumne Deep Channel Mining Company (hereinafter referred to as the mining company) appealed from the judgment on the judgment roll alone.

It is alleged in the complaint that, on August 30, 1912, plaintiffs were the owners of certain described mining property situated in Tuolumne county, and on that day entered into a written agreement with defendants H. F. Stolz and J. Cabell Brown, relative to said mining claims, which is attached to the complaint as Exhibit A and made part thereof; that, agreeably to paragraph 6 of said Exhibit A, plaintiffs executed a deed of grant of said property, and placed the same in escrow with the First National Bank of Sonora, with instructions as provided in said sixth paragraph of said Exhibit A, which said deed was, prior to November 21, 1914, delivered to said defendants Stolz and Brown; that, after August 30, 1912, and prior to January 1, 1916, said defendants Stolz and Brown transferred to defendant said mining company "all their right, title and interest under said contract Exhibit A, and all their right, title and interest of, in and to the real property described in this complaint." It is then alleged (paragraph VI) "that nothing was done by the defendants, or any of them, on said real property in accordance with the terms of the said agreement, Exhibit A, and the deed made pursuant thereto, or otherwise, or at all, excepting as follows." Then follows a statement of the work done, consisting of assessment work in 1913 and 1914; also certain drilling and prospecting on said claim which "commenced in May, 1914, and continued to November, 1914, and then ceased," and no other work was done until in September 1915, and continued until December, 1915, which work was performed by three men and no more, since which time no work of any kind has been done on said property; that plaintiffs have frequently, during the year 1916 and prior to filing the complaint (which was July 3, 1916), demanded of said defendants, "under penalty of forfeiture of all rights in said property for failure so to do that they do proceed and perform work on said premises as contemplated and as provided for by the said agreement Exhibit A and the deed made pursuant thereto, but said defendants have refused and failed, and each of them has refused and failed, to perform any work on said premises since December, 1915, of any kind," and that plaintiffs notified said defendant that a "failure so to do would result in a forfeiture of all their rights of, in and to said property, and of, in and to said contract, Exhibit A"; that nothing has been paid to plaintiffs as profits derived from working said mine, and defendants have and each of them has "completely violated the terms and conditions of said contract, Exhibit A and the deed of conveyance made pursuant thereto in failing to work said mine as provided by the terms of said contract"; that defendants, other than said above-named defendants, claim to have some interest in said property, but "all of said rights and claims are subordinate to the right and ownership of these plaintiffs of, in and to said property."

The consideration mentioned in Exhibit A is $5 "and for and in consideration of the covenants and conditions hereinafter contained to be by the respective parties hereto kept and performed." By paragraph 4, the parties of the second part (Stolz and Brown) were let into possession of the mine "for the purpose of prospecting and drilling the same to ascertain what, if any, valuable mineral bearing earth, ore or rock, or placer gold, lie within, upon or under the said property;" that if it proved "to the satisfaction of all parties of the second part that there is insufficient mineral bearing earth * * * to warrant * * * developing or operating," the agreement was, upon written notice to first parties, "to be of no further force or effect," but if found satisfactory by second parties after drilling and prospecting the mine, they were to continue the work, and "shall pay over and deliver unto the said parties of the first part, or to W. N. Sledge who for that purpose is hereby constituted the agent of the parties of the first part, twenty-five per cent. of the net profits derived from the working of all mineral bearing earth * * * by the parties of the second part," which was to be paid immediately after each clean-up, which latter "shall take place not less than twice in each calendar year." Paragraph 6, referred to in the complaint, provided:

> "That the parties of the first part will, contemporaneously with the execution and delivery of this agreement, make and execute a good and sufficient grant, bargain and sale deed of the above-described mining claims and property, which said deed shall be deposited with the First National Bank of Sonora, in the town of Sonora, state of California, with instructions to said bank to deliver said deed to the parties of the second part as soon as said parties of the second part shall have expended the sum of five thousand dollars in prospecting, drilling, developing and working said mining claims and property, and the production of a writing signed and sworn to by the parties of the second part, or by either of them, setting forth that said sum has been so expended, or by the production and exhibition to said bank of satisfactory proof of such expenditure, shall be full authority to said bank for the delivery of said deed by it to the parties of the second part, and in such event said bank is hereby instructed to deliver said deed as hereinabove provided."

The agreement then provides what shall be regarded as expenses to make up this $5,000:

> "Provided, however, that said deed after its delivery by said bank shall in no way interfere with the right of the parties of the first part to receive one-fourth of the net profits derived from the working of said claims and property thereafter, nor avoid the obligation of the parties of the second part to make such payments."

Paragraph 8 provides that second parties shall commence said work of drilling, prospecting and working said mine within one year from the date of the agreement, and that "the actual work of development and operation shall be commenced by said parties of the second part within two years from and after the date hereof, and shall diligently continue and prosecute such work until such time as said parties of the second part shall determine in their sole judgment" that further work is not profitable, "in which event this agreement shall be of no further force or effect, and any rights hereunder, except those which shall have already vested, shall cease and determine."

Defendants answered; admitted the execution and delivery of said Exhibit A and said deed mentioned in the complaint; denied that nothing was done by defendants in accordance with said Exhibit A and said deed made pursuant thereto, and denied other averments relating to the alleged ceasing of work; denied that any demand had been made upon defendants to perform the work contemplated by said agreement, under penalty of forfeiture or otherwise; alleged that defendants were let into possession in May, 1914, and thereupon commenced and continued to work said mine until November 21, 1914, when defendants Stolz and Brown transferred their interest in said contract and deed to defendant, said mining company, and that thereafter said mining company prosecuted said work, describing the work done; defendant, said mining company, alleged that since the passing of said deed to defendants Stolz and Brown said mining company has fully performed "all things required of it or of its said predecessors in interest to be done under the terms of said agreement Exhibit A; alleged that plaintiffs had full knowledge of the work being done, and at no time objected thereto and the manner in which the work was being done, and by their conduct led defendants to believe that plaintiffs had excused defendants "from strict performance as to time and manner of the covenants contained in said agreement"; that defendants have not abandoned said work, nor have they any intention of so doing; alleged that, in June, 1916, plaintiffs notified defendants to proceed with the work within ten days or suffer forfeiture, and that thereupon said mining company "immediately proceeded with its preparations to continue said work of development," describing the work which followed. In paragraph VI defendants alleged that the said deed is freed of conditions, and that said deed does not require any work to be done upon the premises herein involved by these defendants or by any of them; and alleged further, that said defendants have never at any time or at all, nor did any of them, nor do they or any of them now, deny the right of said plaintiffs to receive twenty-five per cent. of the net profits derived and to be derived from the working" of said mine, "as provided in said agreement Exhibit A"; alleged that at the time defendants took possession of said mine said property "consisted of dry and naked mining locations upon part of the public domain, of nominal, uncertain and indeterminate value," but that by the work done thereon by defendants "said mining ground has been proved to be of great value, to wit, one hundred thousand dollars"; and that defendants' vested property rights therein are of the actual value of seventy-five thousand dollars.

The court made the following findings of fact: That, on August 30, 1912, plaintiffs were the owners of the mining claims referred to in the complaint, and on said day entered into the written agreement with defendants Stolz and Brown, of which a copy is found in the complaint; "that at the same time and in accordance with the provisions of said agreement plaintiffs made and executed an instrument in writing in the form of a deed of grant, bargain, and sale of said properties, which writing in terms recited the following" (refers by way of preamble to the agreement for prospecting and working the said mining claims; recites the provision of the agreement as to placing a deed to the property with the First National Bank, of Sonora, as shown in said agreement, with instructions to deliver the same to said Stolz and Brown upon their compliance with the conditions of said agreement); "And whereas it was agreed under the terms of said agreement that the making, executing and delivering of this deed shall in no way affect the rights of the parties of the first part hereto (plaintiffs) to receive from said parties of the second part twenty-five per cent. of the net profits derived from the working and operating of said mining claims and property" (except said preamble no part of the deed is set forth in the findings or in the pleadings); that, prior to November 21, 1914, said bank delivered said deed upon there being filed with said bank on account of expenditures, as provided in said agreement, setting forth some of the items constituting said expenditures; that, after August 30, 1912, and prior to January 1, 1916, defendants Stolz and Brown transferred to defendant mining company all their interest in and title to said mining claims under said agreement and said deed. Finding VI is as follows:

> "That at no time after the execution of said agreement, did plaintiffs, or either of them, in any way hinder or prevent defendants, or any of them, from entering upon the said property or doing the work as contemplated in the said agreement; but that said defendants and each and all of them have failed to do any work upon said property or in connection therewith or therefor during the period from the execution of said agreement and up to the time of the filing of the complaint in this action, except the following, viz."

The work described consisted of assessment work in 1913, not exceeding the sum of $500, and certain borings, in 1914 and 1915, of the cost or value of $2,445, for prospecting purposes; that, "during the year 1916 and up to July 1, 1916, the date of the commencement of this action, defendants performed no work whatever upon or in connection with said properties"; that after July 1, 1916, and to the last day of the trial, September 7, 1917, the only work done consisted of some tunneling of an unsubstantial and temporary nature, some road work and surveying, not exceeding in value the sum of $500. Finding VII refers to the provision of said agreement, Exhibit A, requiring defendants to commence the work of drilling, prospecting, etc., within a certain time "and to diligently continue and prosecute such work" until defendants should determine it to be no longer profitable; "that defendants, or any of them, did not, in their sole judgment, or otherwise, determine that the further working or development of said claims and property was not profitable; but, on the contrary, defendants have always claimed and did determine to their satisfaction that the further working or development of said claims and property would be profitable." Finding VIII is that plaintiffs made demand of defendants that they proceed to perform work as required by said agreement and deed and defendants' failure to do so as alleged in the complaint. Finding IX is as follows:

> "That the only consideration to plaintiffs, or either of them, for the execution and delivery of said agreement and said instrument in form of a deed were the agreements made by the parties of the second part therein and thereby to prospect and work the said properties so that plaintiffs would receive a return therefrom in the form of the royalty therein provided for; and that plaintiffs, or either of them, have not received anything whatever from defendants, or any of them, resulting from the prospecting or working of said properties, or any of them, or otherwise"; that defendants "have wholly and completely violated the terms and conditions of said contract, Exhibit A and the deed of conveyance made pursuant thereto in failing to work said property as provided by the terms of said contract."

Finding X is to the effect that plaintiffs did not excuse defendants or any of them from performing the said work, nor did plaintiffs do anything to lead defendants to believe that plaintiffs were content or satisfied with the work being done by defendants; "that defendants claimed that they did not perform other or more work because they did not have the necessary moneys so to do; and after the delivery to them of said instrument in form of a deed defendants claimed to plaintiffs that defendants were not required to do any work under said agreement or said instrument in the form of a deed; and defendants thereafter repudiated any and all obligations on their part to do any work on said properties, or any of them, or in connection therewith after the delivery to them of said instrument in the form of a deed." Finding XI states as follows:

> "That as a result of said previous work of plaintiffs and of said borings and other prospecting by defendants, it has been determined that the said properties contain a gold-bearing gravel channel, which can be profitably worked and mined by proper methods therefor, but that the actual money value of said properties has not been determined with any definiteness, and the same is problematical."

Finding XII is:

> "That the execution of said agreement and of said instrument in form of a deed and their deliveries constituted one and the same transaction. That the consideration to plaintiffs for the execution of said agreement and said instrument in form of a deed and their deliveries was the performance of the work as specified in the said agreement so that plaintiffs might receive the profits from such work, and that the delivery of the instrument in form of a deed did not in any way alter the obligation of the defendants to perform the said work in the manner and at the times as provided for in the said agreement, so that the plaintiffs could receive their consideration therefor; and that said defendants received or acquired no rights under said instrument in form of a deed which in any way relieved them of the obligation to perform said work as provided for in said agreement; and that the work that defendant did upon said properties amounted only to prospecting work, and that they did no mining work whatsoever looking towards the extraction of mineral therefrom in a manner that might result in plaintiffs' receiving any payment or consideration for the execution and delivery of said agreement and said instrument in form of a deed; and that defendants have repudiated their obligation to do any of the work specified in said agreement, since the delivery to them of said instrument in the form of a deed."

Appellant states in its reply brief that—

> "The sole question before the court is, Does the complaint state a cause of action, and can the judgment based on it stand in law?"

Accordingly, appellant's argument is directed exclusively to the sufficiency of the complaint.

[1] Appellant overlooks the fact that the judgment roll discloses the result of the trial as shown in the findings of fact which constitute the real foundation of the judgment. Appellant also ignores certain well-established rules governing appellate courts where the appeal is on the judgment roll alone. It may not be amiss to recall some of these rules. "On appeal all intendments are in favor of the regularity of the action of the court. Error will never be presumed, and the burden is upon the appellant to show that it exists." 2 Hayne's New Trial, p. 1576. In Myers v. Canepa, 174 Pac. 903, appellants claimed that the rule does not reach an error committed in passing upon the sufficiency of a complaint where the question is raised by demurrer. In reply the court said:

> "Whatever may have been the interpretation put upon section 475 of the Code of Civil Procedure prior to the adoption of section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution, it settled that injury is no longer presumed from error, but must be affirmatively shown. Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238. The provision is: 'No judgment shall be set aside * * * for any error as to any matter of pleading, or for any error as to any matter of procedure, unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.' How can the court determine that defendants were injured by overruling the demurrer in this case in the absence of the record showing what occurred at the trial? It may have been that appellants consented to the trial upon its merits without objection to the evidence in support of the complaint, notwithstanding its defects. There may be presumptive waiver, which is a species of consent. As was said by Judge Hart in the original opinion: 'In considering an appeal supported by the judgment roll only, all presumptions and intendments are to be indulged favorably to and in support of the judgment. It must, in other words, be presumed that there was evidence sufficient to support the findings or the verdict, and that, whatever might have properly occurred at the trial to cure the defects of the complaint in any vital particular, did actually occur.' "

Said Judge Hayne:

> "If the judgment roll does not, therefore, itself disclose the error complained of, it is incumbent upon the appellant to make a showing de hors such judgment roll. This can be done in no other way than by a bill of exceptions, or in case of a new trial ordered, statement." 2 Hayne's New Trial, p. 1576.

[2] In the recent case of Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett (177 Cal. 560) 171 Pac. 304, the question was directly before the court where, as here, there was a trial upon the merits after general demurrer improperly overruled and judgment, as here, on the findings, and it did not appear that the facts were such as that the complaint could not have been so amended as to obviate the objection made. The syllabus correctly states the rule as follows:

> "Though by omission of an allegation, a complaint does not state * * * a cause of action, and general demurrer thereto was improperly overruled, yet, the record making it manifest judgment for defendant, after a trial on the merits, was in no way based on or due to any defect in the complaint, it will not be sustained on the ground of insufficiency of the complaint; it not appearing it cannot be amended to obviate the defect."

[3] Appellant takes the position that the contract spoke from its date, August 30, 1912, but that the deed did not speak until the date of its delivery, "and finally fixed in law the respective rights of the parties." The court found that the only consideration to plaintiff for the execution and delivery of said agreement and deed was that plaintiffs were to receive a return from the workings of the mine "in the form of a royalty," as provided in said agreement, and "that the execution of said agreement and of said instrument in form of a deed and their deliveries constituted one and the same transaction," and, further, that "the delivery of the instrument in the form of a deed did not in any way alter the obligation of defendants to pay for the said work in the manner and at the times as provided for in the said agreement so that the plaintiffs should receive their consideration therefor." These two instruments were to be, and in fact were, executed contemporaneously. The fact that the deed was not to be delivered until after certain preliminary work was done did not, in our opinion, have the effect of putting to an end the provisions of the agreement, Exhibit A, nor was it intended to have any such effect. It is an unreasonable interpretation of the transaction "that the deed hereinbefore and in said complaint mentioned is freed from conditions, and that the said deed does not require any work to be done upon the premises herein involved by these defendants or by any of them," as alleged in the answer. The deed does not appear in the record, and we know nothing of its provisions except as appears by way of preamble above set forth.

We must look to the agreement to ascertain the consideration for the execution of the deed, for it was executed and delivered pursuant to the agreement. The two documents are inseparable. We think the transaction was one where the sole consideration for the purchase price took the form of a royalty resulting from the working of the mine. In such case there is an implied obligation on the part of the grantee to work the mine to the end that the consideration may be paid, failing in which the grantor may have the property restored to himself. The cases relied upon by appellant as supporting its contention that for breaches of conditions subsequent the grantor's remedy alone is for damages do not apply here. In Downing v. Rademacher, 133 Cal. 220, 65 Pac. 385, 85 Am. St. Rep. 160, we have a case quite similar to the case before us, where, as here, an interest in a mine was conveyed by deed, and contemporaneously a separate written agreement entered into by the parties wherein it was provided that the grantee was given the exclusive right to work and mine the mining claims, and was required so to do and deliver to the grantor one-third of all the gold or other minerals taken from the mine. Said the court:

> "There is here no question of innocent purchasers without notice. The deed and the agreement constitute one instrument, and must be read as though each referred to the other and expressly incorporated its terms. And, in legal effect, what do they amount to? As between the parties, at all events, there is no such magic in a conveyance of a title in fee which can be used to do an owner out of his property. Under this contract and deed, all Downing acquired was the right to work the mine in his own way, on condition that he deliver to Rademacher one-third of the valuable minerals obtained. The conveyance was, in effect, subject to this condition."

It was held that the sole consideration of the conveyance being for a share of the proceeds of the mine, the equities of the grantor are the same as if a conditional leasehold estate had been granted; that there is an implied obligation to work the mine, in order that the consideration agreed may be paid, and as the share of the grantor cannot be determined until the mine is worked out, the grant of the mine is conditional, for the protection of the grantor. Among other cases cited in the opinion is Richter v. Richter, 111 Ind. 456, 12 N. E. 698, mentioned as "directly in point." Explaining this case, Judge Temple said:

> "Richter executed to his son a warranty deed for a farm, for an expressed consideration of $1,000. The real consideration was a contemporaneous agreement in writing, by the terms of which the son agreed to support his father so long as he should live. A few months afterwards the son refused to perform this contract. After a demand for reconveyance, the father brought suit to compel it. The defense there was the same as here, that the consideration for the deed was the agreement, and the only remedy the father had was to sue upon it. The contract purported to be a mortgage, though the court held it could not be enforced as such. It was said: 'True, neither the deed nor the mortgage state in express terms that the estate is granted upon condition, but the word "condition" is not necessary to the creation of an estate upon condition, if it plainly appears from the words used that the intent of the parties was to create an estate of that description. Stillwell v. Knapper, 69 Ind. 558 [35 Am. Rep. 240]. In the construction of deeds, as in construing other writings, courts seek to ascertain and give effect to the real intention of the parties, as such intention may be gathered from the language of the whole instrument. The intent is what the law applied itself to in deeds. Watters v. Bredin, 70 Pa. 235. If from the nature of the acts to be performed by the grantee, and the time required for their performance, it is evidently the intention of the parties that the estate shall be held and enjoyed on condition that the grantee perform the acts specified, then the estate is upon condition. This is especially so when the grantor has reserved no other effectual remedy for the enforcement of performance on the part of the grantee.' "

The principle involved in these cases was applied in Acme Oil & Mining Co. v. Williams et al., 140 Cal. 681, syl., 74 Pac. 296, which was the case of the conveyance of a leasehold interest in oil lands where the sole consideration for the lease was a royalty of ten cents per barrel of the oil produced. It was held that—

> "There was an implied covenant or condition for diligent operation of the wells, to the best advantage of both parties, which is as effective as if expressed in the lease, and is of the essence of the contract; and for a substantial breach of such implied condition, the lessor may re-enter and claim a forfeiture of the lease."

McIntosh v. Robb, 4 Cal. App. 484, 88 Pac. 517, was a mining lease case, the consideration being 10 per cent. by way of royalty of the net proceeds of any and all mining operations. The court said:

> "In contracts of this character there is an implied covenant for diligent search and operation," and the lessee is bound to proceed with mining operations with reasonable diligence.

Cases are cited in support of this principle. In the case at bar not only was this implied covenant available to plaintiffs, but it is expressly incorporated in the agreement, which latter must be read into and made part of the deed.

The court found that after delivery of the deed defendants claimed that they were not required to do any work under said agreement or said deed; "and thereafter repudiated any and all obligations on their part to do any work on said properties." Holding that view as to its obligations, appellant cannot be heard to complain that plaintiffs sought the only adequate relief open to them. Appellant's suggestion that their remedy was for damages is devoid of merit. A moment's reflection would convince the legal mind that in a case of this character damages would be difficult if not impossible of ascertainment. This fact, indeed, is one of the reasons given by the courts for enforcing the rule in these royalty cases.

The judgment is affirmed.

MAIER v. HARBOR CENTER LAND CO.

(Civ. 2838, S. F. 8687.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division One, California. May 6, 1919. On Rehearing in Supreme Court in Bank, July 5, 1919.)

1. INFANTS 🔑58(2)—DISAFFIRMANCE OF CONTRACT—RESTORATION OF CONSIDERATION —STATUTE.

If contract for the purchase of a lot by a minor was void and not subject to ratification, having been made before he reached the age of 18, the mere payment of installments after he reached the age of 18 did not remake the old contract, or make a new one to obligate him, under Civil Code, § 35, to restore the consideration as a preliminary to disaffirming the contract.

2. INFANTS 🔑58(2)—DISAFFIRMANCE OF CONTRACT—RETURN OF "CONSIDERATION."

Where a lot was sold to an infant, the seller's loss by reason of having paid commission to an agent and through deprivation of opportunity to make a valid sale was not a "consideration" to be returned by the infant as a preliminary to disaffirmance; the seller's loss being the result of its own mistake in entering a void contract.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 🔑72(2)—STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS—RUNNING AGAINST MINOR —ATTAINMENT OF MAJORITY.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 352, the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1) could not commence to run against the right of a minor to sue for the recovery of payments under his void contract to buy a lot, disaffirmed by him until such minor had attained his majority.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Action by Paul F. Maier, etc., against the Harbor Center Land Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appealed to the appellate court, which affirmed, and defendant applies for hearing in the Supreme Court. Application denied.

Faulkner & Faulkner, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the cancellation of a contract for the purchase of a lot of land, and for the recovery of moneys paid thereunder.

The facts are that Maier, a minor under the age of 18, entered into a contract with appellant for the purchase of a lot of land for $1,200. He paid $120 as an initial installment, and from time to time thereafter paid monthly installments, taxes, and interest, amounting in all to $378.05. Before arriving at the age of 21 he disaffirmed the contract, and, through his guardian ad litem, instituted this proceeding for the cancellation of the contract and the return of the moneys paid by him.

Appellant filed an answer, counterclaim, and cross-complaint, to all of which a motion to strike out was interposed, and granted except as to certain paragraphs denying material allegations of the complaint. Thereafter an amendment to the answer was filed, setting up a denial of payment to appellant, and upon this state of the pleadings the cause proceeded to trial, resulting in findings and judgment for plaintiff and respondent herein.

Appellant concedes that the contract was void ab initio, but insists that it became vitalized by the acts of the minor after he reached the age of 18 years. In this connection it is alleged, in what is designated as the fourth special defense set up in the answer, that shortly after the execution of the contract Maier reached the age of 18; that he continued to make the installment payments thereafter; that the lot was withdrawn from the market; and that appellant has suffered a loss by reason of the minor's actions through having paid to its agent a commission for negotiating the sale and through being deprived of the opportunity of making a valid sale of this lot. In the counterclaim and cross-complaint appellant seeks recoupment of these losses.

The theory of appellant, as advanced in these special defenses, is that, though the contract is void ab initio and not subject to ratification, the subsequent payments after the minor reached the age of 18 estop him from disaffirming the contract without a restoration of the consideration. In this connection the appellant sets up the damage suffered by it as constituting the consideration which respondent should restore.

[1] There are two answers to this proposition. First, under section 35 of the Civil Code it is only when "the contract is made by the minor whilst he is over the age of eighteen" that he must restore the consideration if he elects to disaffirm. If, as conceded by appellant, the contract was void and not subject to ratification, clearly the mere payment of installments after the minor reached the age of 18 did not remake the old contract or make a new one.

[2] Second, there was no consideration to be returned. Appellant's loss is the result of its own mistake in entering into a void contract. Its loss results from the failure of respondent to divulge the fact of his incapacity. The claim is, at its best, if properly pleaded, one for damages for fraud which could never be maintained separately, and hence cannot constitute a valid defense, counterclaim or cross-complaint. As said by this court in Flittner v. Equitable Life Ass'n Soc., 30 Cal. App. 209, at page 216, 157 Pac. 630, at page 633:

> "It is the policy of the law to discourage adults from contracting with infants, and the former cannot complain if, as a consequence of their violation of this rule of conduct, they are injured by the exercise of the right with which the law has purposely invested the latter, nor charge that the infant in exercising the right is guilty of fraud."

In what is termed a second special defense the appellant sets up the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339, Code of Civil Procedure, as a bar to the recovery of all sums paid more than two years prior to the commencement of the action. This position is supported by the allegation that at the time of the execution of the contract and up to the time of the appointment of the guardian ad litem the minor had a general guardian, who was, during such time, competent to act for him, and therefore to sue in his behalf.

The difficulty with this theory is that, irrespective of whether the minor had a general guardian, the statute gave him the power to disaffirm the contract before he reached the age of 21, or within a reasonable time thereafter. The right to sue for the recovery of the payments made by him could not accrue until he had disaffirmed the contract. It does not appear from the record when he did disaffirm except that it was "prior to the commencement of this action." But it does appear that he made a payment as late as November 23, 1915, and it is fair to assume that he did not disaffirm until after that date. The complaint was filed on June 21, 1916. Thus, if governed by the limitations of section 339, the action was commenced within time.

But, aside from this, this is not an action for money had and received, but is an action for the cancellation of a void contract, and the recovery of moneys paid in accordance with its terms. As such it does not come within the limitations of section 339.

The judgment is affirmed.

PER CURIAM. [3] The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First District, Division 1, is denied. We desire, however, to say, in respect to the claims made under the statute of limitations, that in our opinion a complete answer to all such claims is to be found in section 352 of our Code of Civil Procedure, in view of which the statute of limitations could not commence to run prior to the attainment of his majority by the minor. Our denial of the petition is not to be taken as an approval of the matters stated in the district court of appeal opinion in regard to this subject.

All concur, except MELVIN, J., absent.

The field notes of a government surveyor should be accepted as presumptively correct, and may be overcome only by a preponderance of evidence that the surveyor actually established a corner monument otherwise than as indicated by the notes; the burden of proof being on the party so contending to show that the stake and monument in the location contended for are those of the original surveyor and the designated boundary of the survey.

Survey to establish a boundary line between the sole owner on one side and one of several owners on the other does not estop those of the several owners on the other side who did not join in it.

4. BOUNDARIES 🔑37(3)—LOCATION OF CORNER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In ejectment, plaintiff claiming that a certain mound of rock was the location of a corner of his property, and defendant city insisting the true corner was on the other side of a creek, finding that such corner was located as claimed by defendant city held supported by the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Action by William K. Golden against the City of Vallejo. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James H. Boyer, of San Francisco, for appellant.

L. G. Harrier, of Vallejo, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action is in ejectment, and the vital question relates to the title to a strip of land through which flows a creek into a reservoir belonging to the water system of the city of Vallejo. Appellant owns the N. E. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of section 9, T. 5 N., R. 3 W., M. D. M., and the respondent owns the quarter directly east. The controversy is over the boundary between these subdivisions, and the only point in dispute is as to the location of the northeast corner of Golden's property. Appellant claims that a certain mound of rock called the "O'C. corner" (or O'Connor corner) is the proper point, while respondent insists that the lower court was justified by the evidence in finding that the true corner is on the other side of the creek, where it was located in 1892 by E. N. Eager, the county surveyor of Solano county.

The following diagram illustrates these points and also the disputed tract of land, being about 180 feet in width and a quarter of a mile in length:

The said waterway is of great importance to the city of Vallejo and it has been used as a part of its water system since 1892. No doubt this was known to Golden when he took up his part of the section in 1907, and he must have been familiar with said Eager corner and the claim of the city to this disputed tract. He waited, however, till 1914 before questioning the city's right and title to the property. This circumstance is not decisive, though, as neither estoppel nor prescription is claimed, but it can hardly be ignored in the consideration of the good faith of the parties.

🔑For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

Independent, however, of any delay by either party in claiming title, we are satisfied after a careful reading of the entire record that there is sufficient support for the court's finding that said northeast corner of appellant's land is located on the western side of the creek, substantially as testified to by said Eager.

The question is to be determined largely by a consideration of the expert evidence, the testimony of the surveyors who were called by the respective parties. It may be admitted that some support is furnished for appellant's theory, that the said "O'C. corner" was established by the original government survey as the common corner of said sections 3, 4, 9, and 10. There is some evidence that it was so recognized in the community for many years, and the testimony of plaintiff, himself a surveyor, O. H. Buckman, county surveyor of Napa county, and Surveyor B. L. Mincher rather favor appellant's view; but it is somewhat significant that in the testimony of Mr. Golden are found the following statements:

> "I made notes of this survey [his survey of the grounds], but I did not make a map of it. I have not these notes here; I don't know where they are. * * * The surveying work that I did there is not in accordance with the government rules for establishing lost corners."

Mr. Buckman also admitted:

> "I have not the notes of the survey I made for Mr. Golden. I have mislaid them and cannot find them."

On the other hand it is apparent that Mr. Eager and T. D. Kilkenny, city engineer of Vallejo, who made surveys of the premises, submitted full notes of their work and were thoroughly examined and cross-examined by the court and the parties.

Of course, this circumstance is not to be unduly magnified, but it could hardly be disregarded in viewing the conflicting testimony of said experts. Manifestly, we are not called upon to say whether the testimony of plaintiff's experts would have supported a conclusion in favor of his theory, but to determine whether there is any substantial support for the adverse finding of the court.

As to this "O'C. corner" Mr. Eager testified:

> "It had marks on it and they were not government markings. It was a stake with O'C. on it. If I had not made any survey at all and just came across that mound of rocks when I first made my survey in 1887, there was plenty about it to show me that it was not the government corner. The stake itself was a redwood stake, and it was a flat board, and the government corners are always stakes larger than a flat board. * * * The mound of stones at the O'C. corner was smaller than the government builds for the section corners. * * * It was not the government corner because government corners are never marked in the way this was."

And as to this, plaintiff himself testified:

> "The O'C. corner consists of a pile of rocks with a stake in it marked 'O'C.' The letters O. C. are cut into the stake. I first saw the O'C. corner with the same stake in it over 20 years ago. I am familiar with the manner in which section corners are marked by government surveyors. The O'Connor corner is not marked in that manner."

Clearly, the foregoing furnishes some evidence that the monument placed at said point was not the work of the government surveyor. It is not conclusive, but, in the absence of any positive evidence as to who placed said flat board and rocks, it is a circumstance tending to show that it was the work of another than the government surveyor and that it was done at a different time from the original survey, it being a fair inference that the government surveyor would pursue the usual course of the official surveyor in marking the corner. Or, if it be assumed that the original monument was destroyed or effaced and another put in its place by the government surveyor or some one else acting in good faith, it is not unreasonable to expect that the substituted monument would conform as nearly as possible to the original. We are to keep in mind that it is a question of probabilities whether the so-called monument or any monument was placed at that point by the government surveyor, and said circumstance was of some importance in determining that question. In other words, it is less probable that it was a government monument by reason of the fact that its construction was so different from the usual government monument that marks the corner of a township.

Another circumstance of greater significance is that it does not conform to, but rather contradicts, the calls of the original field notes. These notes show that when the surveyor in 1863 ran north between sections 9 and 10 he set the corner post for 3, 4, 9, and 10 amidst some live oak trees. Then running east between sections 3 and 10, he crossed the creek at 3 chains. That is, he had to run east from the corner to reach the creek. If we are, therefore, to give effect to this original report of the government surveyor, we must place the corner on the west of the creek, but the O'C. corner is on the east side.

As to this Mr. Buckman testified:

> "I recall that the field notes of the government survey say that you left the post and crossed the creek three chains east of the post. You could not do that if the O'Connor corner is the corner location. The O'Connor corner is east of the creek, while the corner referred to in that part of the field notes would be west of the creek."

Again, there is no chamisal at the O'Connor corner, whereas the field notes say that the surveyor in leaving the corner established by him left the "chamisal at post." As to this Mr. Eager testified:

> "There was chamisal near the post that I set and west of it. Chamisal is very scattering directly east of the post, and as you approach the creek it disappears altogether. I am familiar with the location of the O'C. corner and there is no chamisal anywhere near it, and there never was any chamisal near it to my knowledge. I located first in 1892 and I didn't find any there. I didn't find any there in 1887."

Mr. Golden admitted this in his testimony:

> "There is no chamisal right around the O'C. point; there is chamisal around the Eager corner."

The field notes also say that the corner was at a certain distance and angle from certain live oak trees 18 and 20 inches in diameter. As to this Mr. Eager testified:

> "I could not find the live oak 18 inches in diameter referred to in page 5 of the government field notes, or any stump or anything to correspond. I could not find any of the heavy trees or stumps near the O'C. corner called for in the government field notes. I made a search for them."

Again, on the line running south from the government corner, the field notes say there should be three creek crossings. From the O'C. corner a line running south to the southeast corner of section 16 would not cross the creek at all. The testimony of the surveyors shows this beyond controversy. Plaintiff testified:

> "If I drew a line from the O'Connor corner south to the southeast corner of section 9, I would not cross the creek before I got to the lake. The creek would be on the west side of the line."

Mr. Kilkenny's testimony is:

> "A line running south from the O'C. corner does not cross the creek at all; did not come within a chain of it. It runs east of the creek."

There are some other particulars in which the O'C. corner does not correspond with the calls of the original government survey, but we need not specify them.

As to the significance of the field notes in the determination of such questions there can be no controversy. In the case of Yolo v. Nolan, 144 Cal. 448, 77 Pac. 1007, speaking of the duty of a surveyor, in his effort to establish boundary lines, the Supreme Court said:

> "The field notes should be taken and from the courses * * * therein the surveyor should endeavor to fix the line precisely as it is called for by the field notes. He should endeavor to retrace the steps of the man who made the original survey. If by so doing the line can be located, it must be done, and, when so located, it must control. * * * He is not authorized to correct what the government has done."

[1] Of course, there are certain established rules for the interpretation of the field notes that must be applied in proper cases. One of these upon which appellant insists is contained in subdivision 2, section 2077, of the Code of Civil Procedure, as follows:

> "When permanent and visible or ascertained boundaries or monuments are inconsistent with the measurement, either of lines, angles, or surfaces, the boundaries or monuments are paramount."

The application of this rule, however, presupposes that the monument at the O'Connor corner was placed there by the government surveyor to mark the corner. But that was not established, and the court, in view of all the evidence, was justified in rejecting that theory. As we have already seen, there were some circumstances favoring appellant's view as to that monument, but, in view of the whole record, the probabilities are decidedly the other way. At least—and that is as far as we are required to go—in consideration of the rule that the field notes of the government surveyor are to be accepted as presumptively correct and may be overcome only by a preponderance of evidence that the surveyor actually established the corner monument at said O'C. corner, and that the burden of proof was upon plaintiff to show that said stake and monument are those of the original surveyor, and also that they were intended to locate the designated boundary of such survey (Pauly v. Broadnax, 157 Cal. 395, 108 Pac. 271), we cannot hold that the court erred in rejecting said O'C. monument as controlling.

Other important circumstances are disclosed by the record that tend to justify the court's position in reference to the O'Connor corner. Among these is the fact that if it were accepted as the true location, the Golden tract would contain 45½ acres instead of the normal area of 40 acres, and the city's corner, lying across the creek and adjacent to Golden's land, would be reduced to 34½ acres. Of course, consideration of quantity is often of little importance in the determination of boundary lines. Frequently other tests are more significant and satisfactory, but, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the disparity between these supposedly equal subdivisions which would thereby be created, strongly confirms the action of the court in rejecting the said O'C. corner.

It was manifestly the intention of the government surveyor to make these respective subdivisions as nearly equal as possible, and this intention might properly be regarded as a decisive factor in the rejection of appellant's claim, though otherwise the evidence might be deemed sufficient to uphold it. In this connection it may be recalled that the practice in making the government survey of a township is to begin at the southeast corner and proceed from the south and east toward the north and west, and the general rule is that any deficiency in the section or fractions thereof attaches to the last part of the survey. Theoretically, at least, the interior sections, such as 9 and 10 included herein, must contain the full number of acres called for. A stronger showing than was made by appellant would be required to justify the trial court in ignoring the presumption that the government surveyor performed his duty properly in accordance with the general custom in such matters.

Respondent calls attention to some other circumstances tending to discredit the O'Connor corner, but it should not be necessary to notice them all specifically.

As to the so-called Eager corner, it was established by the said county surveyor of Solano county upon the theory that it represented what is known as a "lost corner." He testified that he applied the rule of "proportionate measurements." Whatever criticism may be made of the particular method that he pursued in locating the corner, there can be no doubt that the evidence is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that it is substantially in accordance with the original survey.

As said in Howard v. Cunningham, 171 Pac. 978, concerning the location of a government corner:

> "The whole question is one of fact, and, the trial court having determined it, that ends the matter so far as an appellate court is concerned."

This, of course, is to be taken with the qualification that there is substantial evidence to support the trial court's conclusion, and of that there can be no doubt herein. Manifestly, there were several slight mistakes made by the government surveyor and there are some inaccuracies in his survey. But there is much stronger reason for accepting the Eager corner than the O'C. corner. It corresponds more closely with the calls of the surveyor than does the other. It is true that it does not meet every requirement, but it seems reasonable and probable that it is practically at the point selected by the original surveyor. Respondent, in its brief, follows carefully the survey of Mr. Eager and points out step by step how it conforms substantially to the calls of the original field notes. As before stated, the weight of the evidence is decidedly in favor of his survey, although on the line running north the O'C. corner comes nearer satisfying the call as to natural monuments than does the Eager corner. But, as stated by respondent, as to this course, neither of the rival corners fits the government field notes with exactness. Therein a mistake was probably made in the original survey or in the record made of it, as pointed out by Mr. Eager. Be that as it may, we cannot hold that this difficulty affects in the slightest the finding of the lower court.

Much is said in appellant's brief as to monuments and the rule that gives them precedence over courses and distances. Special emphasis is laid upon the requirement of the field notes as to certain creek crossings, and it is claimed that due consideration was not accorded to this circumstance. But as to that appellant is mistaken.

Mr. Eager's explanation along that line seems quite reasonable and satisfactory. He said:

> "The principal reason I had for not accepting the O'C. corner as the common corner of 3, 4, 9, and 10 was that it was on the wrong side of the creek. The government field notes stated that it was three chains to the west of the creek, while as a matter of fact the O'C. corner was east of the creek. It did not correspond with the check of the government notes; those were the reasons that time, and, besides, I checked the course of the creek. The course of the creek south of the O'C. corner did not correspond with the government field notes. The O'C. corner would not check with the notation in the field notes which reads: 'Running north between sections 9 and 10 on a variation of 16¼ degrees east of 49.50 chains across creek 25 links wide, course southwest, enter chamisal.' The line which I established does correspond with this course, that is another reason for leaving the corner where I did. The O'C. corner does not correspond with the measurements east and west, nor with the proportional measurements. The field notes stated that the corner was 3 chains to the west of the creek, and I considered that I had got approximately that distance. There was a crossing of the creek at 3 chains south of the corner which I re-established, which corresponded with the government field notes, and the line also corresponded with the government field notes running north. * * * There is a much better monument right there than the statement of a surveyor that he followed the bed of the creek for 1,000 feet practically north and south, and that is the statement of the government surveyor that he commenced at the section corner to 3, 4, 9, and 10 and ran on a line east and at some place he crossed the creek. He says that on the line running east he positively crossed the creek at right angles. There is a discrepancy, but I think the statement that at 3 chains he crossed the creek running there is much more positive than that he got into the creek bed and ran along it. * * * That is the reason I discarded the O'C. corner and re-established the corner in a different way. If the Buckman line which runs north 1,000 feet to the bed of the creek is extended south, it should attach itself to the southeast corner of section 16, but this line running south does not correspond in any respect with the field notes. It is a blank compared with the government field notes for the 2 miles south. If I were of the opinion that it might be the correct line by north, a description of it in accordance with the field notes from the south would show that it was absolutely wrong."

He further points out that the O'C. corner fails to meet the situation as to the east and west courses and distances.

Mr. Eager's testimony seems clear and comprehensive, and it can leave little doubt, if any, that appellant has no legal title to the property in dispute.

We can see no merit whatever in the claim that respondent, by reason of acquiescence or estoppel, is precluded from disputing the correctness of the O'Connor corner.

[2, 3] It seems that in 1887 Mr. Eager was called upon to run a line between the lands of Nelson and Madison in the northerly half of sections 3 and 4. It is true that Mr. Eager at that time assumed the O'C. corner to be the true government corner. It was so represented to him by Mr. Nelson and he proceeded upon that basis. There was no question raised as to its accuracy. But it is manifest that the acquiescence and agreement of Nelson and Madison as to said corner and to the boundary line between their parcels of land, conceding that it would be binding upon them and their successors, would not preclude the city of Vallejo from contesting its accuracy in reference to an entirely different tract of land. Different tracts are in controversy here, and therefore a different line, and moreover, the United States then owned the land now owned by appellant, and the United States was not a party to the proceeding. It will not be disputed that "an agreement cannot be extended by implication or otherwise to boundaries not considered in the agreement" (Grants Pass Land Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 456, 143 Pac. 754), and, furthermore, "A survey for the purpose of establishing a boundary line, made between a sole owner of the land on one side, and one of the several owners of the land on the other side, does not estop the owners who did not join in it" (Spring v. Hewston, 52 Cal. 442).

[4] We are satisfied, not only that the findings of the lower court are supported, but that the equities in the case are with respondent.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

DREW v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MENDOCINO COUNTY.

(S. F. 9086.)

EXECUTION 🔑417—CONTEMPT—FAILURE OF CORPORATION OFFICER TO APPEAR FOR EXAMINATION.

Where an order is made requiring a corporation and its president to appear and answer concerning its property after an execution against the corporation has been returned unsatisfied, and the president fails to appear, an order adjudging him in contempt of court will be upheld as against a contention that under Code Civ. Proc. § 714, the order must be directed to the judgment debtor, which was the corporation, and that if the presence of its officers was required they must be summoned as witnesses under section 718; it being the president's duty as such to appear.

In Bank.

Petition by F. C. Drew against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Mendocino, for a writ of review of an order adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt of court. Order affirmed.

Samuel M. Shortridge, W. H. Metson, and R. G. Hudson, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The petitioner seeks to have an order of the superior court of Mendocino county, adjudging him guilty of contempt of court, annulled. A judgment for $7,150 having been rendered in that court against the L. E. White Lumber Company, a corporation, and execution having been returned unsatisfied, an order was made by said court, requiring the corporation and the petitioner, F. C. Drew, as president thereof, to appear and answer concerning its property. The order was served upon the petitioner, who failed to appear for examination, and no appearance was made for or on behalf of the corporation. The petitioner was thereafter adjudged guilty of contempt for failing to obey said order. Petitioner claims that the court was without authority to issue the order directing him to appear and testify; that section 714, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the order shall be directed to the "judgment debtor." Petitioner contends that the court could only require the corporation, the "judgment debtor," to attend for examination, and that if the presence of officers of the corporation was required they must be summoned as witnesses under the provisions of section 718 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is a sufficient answer to petitioner's contention to say that it was his duty, as president of the corporation, upon being served with an order directing the corporation to appear at a time and place specified for examination, to have personally appeared at that time and place for examination, and his failure to do so, even in the absence of an express direction that he, personally, should so appear, was a contempt of the order of the court. In Wilson v. United States, 221 U. S. 361, 31 Sup. Ct. 538, 55 L. Ed. 771, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 558, the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration a similar question as to whether or not a president of a corporation was guilty of contempt of court in refusing to produce books of the corporation in his possession, in response to a subpœna duces tecum served upon him, directing the corporation to produce said books. In passing upon that question, the court said:

> "It was further urged, * * * that the petitioner should not be held in contempt as the subpœna was not directed to him, but merely to the corporation. * * *"

In answering that contention, the court, after discussing some other matters, said:

> "Concluding, then, that the subpœna was valid and that its service imposed upon the corporation the duty of obedience, there can be no doubt that the appellant was likewise bound by it unless, with respect to the books described, he could claim a personal privilege. A command to the corporation is in effect a command to those who are officially responsible for the conduct of its affairs. If they, apprised of the writ directed to the corporation, prevent compliance or fail to take appropriate action within their power for the performance of the corporate duty, they, no less than the corporation itself, are guilty of disobedience, and may be punished for contempt. The applicable principle was thus stated by Chief Justice Waite in Commissioners v. Sellew, 99 U. S. 624, 627 [25 L. Ed. 333], where a peremptory mandamus was directed against a municipal board: 'As the corporation can only act through its agents, the courts will operate upon the agents through the corporation. When a copy of the writ which has been ordered is served upon the clerk of the board, it will be served on the corporation, and be equivalent to a command that the persons who may be members of the board shall do what is required. If the members fail to obey, those guilty of disobedience may, if necessary, be punished for the contempt. Although the command is in form to the board, it may be enforced against those through whom alone it can be obeyed. * * * While the board is proceeded against in its corporate capacity, the individual members are punished in their natural capacities for failure to do what the law requires of them as the representatives of the corporation.' See, also, Leavenworth v. Kinney, 154 U. S. 642 [14 Sup. Ct. 1198, 25 L. Ed. 336]; People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 277 [59 Am. Dec. 536]."

It follows that the petitioner was in contempt of court for refusing to obey the order directed to the L. E. White Lumber Company, of which he is president; that the court was authorized to include in its order directing the appearance of the corporation before the referee the name of the president of the corporation, and that the court was in the exercise of its jurisdiction in declaring the petitioner guilty of contempt.

The order assailed is affirmed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 1, 1919.)

1. Mortgages 🔑616 — Declaration of Trust—Action for Accounting—Issues.

In action for an accounting of defendant's proceedings under a declaration of trust and for a reconveyance of the property to plaintiffs on payment of the amount found to be due, allegations of answer held to put question of ownership of land in issue.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑907(3)—Review—Presumptions.

On appeal on judgment roll alone, court will presume that the parties treated the pleadings as sufficient to raise an issue upon which court made a finding.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑907(3)—Review—Presumptions.

On appeal on judgment roll alone, the court will assume that the allegations of the answer were treated as controverted and that evidence was given in support thereof.

4. Pleading 🔑139—Necessity for Cross-Complaint—Answer—Ownership of Property.

In action for an accounting of defendant's proceedings under a declaration of trust, and for a reconveyance of the property to plaintiffs on payment of amount due defendant, defendant was not required to present cross-complaint to obtain judgment awarding him ownership of property, since such relief could be had upon an answer.

5. Mortgages 🔑369(2) — Declaration of Trust — Sale of Land — Discretion of Court.

Where holder of overdue note secured by deed of trust caused land to be sold under the power of sale and made agreement with his creditor whereby creditor purchased land to hold as security for holder's note to creditor, with power to sell land upon default in payment thereof, court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to set aside creditor's sale where more than $4,800 was due on note, and value of land above a prior mortgage was only $6,000.

6. Mortgages 🔑378—Sale of Land—Power of Sale—Foreclosure.

In view of Civ. Code, § 2932, a sale under a power contained in a mortgage, if properly conducted in accordance with the power, is as effectual to convey title as would be a sale thereof under a decree of foreclosure in a regular action to foreclose the instrument as a mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by Louise N. Fighiera and husband against William F. Radis. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 32 Cal. App. 245, 162 Pac. 655.

Arthur C. Vaughan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment. The record on appeal consists of the judgment roll alone.

On October 26, 1914, plaintiff owned a certain promissory note executed by one Woodford, to Ray Zug, for $30,000, due January 29, 1917, and secured by a trust deed executed to the Title Guarantee & Trust Company for certain parcels of land. The land was subject to a prior mortgage for $29,000. On October 26, 1914, plaintiffs borrowed money from the defendant, in consideration of which they executed to defendant their promissory note for $7,000, payable four months after date. At that time default had been made in the interest on the $30,000 note, and plaintiff had caused the trustee to advertise the land for sale. It was agreed between the plaintiffs and defendant that the land should be sold by the trustee under the power contained in the trust deed, that defendant should purchase the lands at such sale and receive a deed therefor from the trustee as security for the note and certain other debts, and should thereupon execute a contract stating the terms on which he was to hold the same as security for the $7,000 note and other debts of plaintiff. This is the transaction which gave rise to the controversy involved in this suit. The land was sold under the trust deed, the defendant became the purchaser by a deed dated November 28, 1914, and thereafter on December 1, 1914, executed the contract in question. This instrument recited the conveyance of the property to defendant, and declared that he held it in trust on the terms therein stated, among which were that he should make such advances as he deemed necessary for the protection and care of the property; that such advances should be a lien on the same; that, if the above-mentioned note of plaintiffs to defendant and a certain other note made by the plaintiffs to a third party were not paid, the defendant was thereupon authorized to sell the property after publishing a notice of sale for a specified time; and that out of the proceeds he should pay all his costs and advances and the two notes above mentioned and render the surplus to the plaintiff. The present action is a suit against the defendant for an accounting of his proceedings under the declaration of trust and for a reconveyance of the property to the plaintiffs on payment of the amount found to be due. In substance and effect, it is an action to redeem the property from the liens secured by the declaration of trust.

The defendant admitted the execution of the deed to him and the making of the declaration of trust by him, but denied that it was intended as a mortgage, alleging that the deed of the trust company and the declaration of trust were parts of the same transaction and that the intention was to create a trust on the terms set forth in the declaration and not to make a mortgage. The answer also alleges that by reason of the default by plaintiffs in the payment of the notes mentioned in the declaration of trust, and after the required notice, he had sold and conveyed the property in question, as authorized by the declaration of trust, to one Elmendorf; that Elmendorf thereafter had reconveyed the property to defendant; and that, ever since the execution of said deed to him by Elmendorf, he (the defendant) "had been and still is the owner in fee simple of all of said property." Also, by way of counterclaim, the answer alleged a cause of action against plaintiffs on their said notes to the defendant and an indebtedness by them to him on account of his advances and expenses as trustee of the property, and asked judgment against the plaintiffs for the balance in his favor and for the amount of the note. He also prayed for judgment declaring defendant to be the owner of the property free from the claims of the plaintiffs.

The court found generally in favor of the defendant, found the amount of indebtedness to be $4,826.53; that the defendant had sold and conveyed the property under the authority of the declaration of trust in the manner alleged in the answer, to said Elmendorf; that Elmendorf had conveyed the same to the defendant; and that the defendant was the owner thereof, free and clear of all right, title, and interest of the plaintiffs therein. The court found specifically that the contract above mentioned was a declaration of trust and not a mortgage. Judgment was rendered in accordance with these findings.

[1, 2] The plaintiffs contend that the findings and judgment that the defendant is the owner of the property and that plaintiffs have no rights therein are beyond the issues made by the pleadings. In view of the pleadings as above recited, it is obvious that there is no merit in this point. The answer alleged a sale and deed to Elmendorf made in conformity with the power contained in the contract, the subsequent conveyance to the defendant, and also that the defendant is the owner of the property. These allegations clearly put in issue the question of ownership. Furthermore, in the absence of a record of the proceedings at the trial, we would be required to presume from the general finding of defendant's ownership that the parties treated the answer as sufficient to raise an issue in regard thereto, and hence that it cannot be now attacked. Gervaise v. Brookins, 156 Cal. 112, 103 Pac. 332.

[3, 4] The question whether the pleading of the defendant was an answer in the nature of a counterclaim or one seeking affirmative relief, or a cross-complaint, is unimportant. It was styled an answer and was pleaded as such, and it is obvious, or at all events we must on the record before us assume, that the allegations of the answer were treated as controverted and that evidence was given in support thereof. It is therefore immaterial whether it was essentially a cross-complaint or an answer. The relief asked could be had upon an answer, and there was no necessity for a cross-complaint. The general cause of demurrer is also obviously without merit. If there were no other cause of action set up, the allegations concerning the indebtedness of plaintiffs to the defendant on the promissory notes and on the account were clearly sufficient. We think, however, that the allegations stated as the foundation for the other relief asked were sufficient to justify the same.

[5] Plaintiffs argue that the court abused its discretion in upholding the sale by the defendant under the declaration of trust, claiming that for various reasons it should have been set aside. This claim is based partly on facts alleged in the complaint which the court found to be untrue. The findings do not show fraud, or that any undue advantage was taken of plaintiffs. On the facts found, no abuse of discretion appears in this respect. The value of the land above the prior mortgage for $29,000 was found to be only $6,000.

[6] Plaintiffs also claim that the court erred in deciding that the contract under which the controversy arose was a declaration of trust and not a mortgage. We regard the question as wholly immaterial. "A power of sale may be conferred by a mortgage upon the mortgagee or any other person, to be exercised after a breach of the obligation for which the mortgage is a security." Civ. Code, § 2932. It is a thoroughly established proposition that a sale under a power contained in a mortgage, if properly conducted in accordance with the power, is as effectual to convey title as would be a sale thereof under a decree of foreclosure in a regular action to foreclose the instrument as a mortgage. Fogarty v. Sawyer, 17 Cal. 591, s. c., 23 Cal. 573; Cormerais v. Genella, 22 Cal. 124; Felton v. Le Breton, 92 Cal. 465, 28 Pac. 490; Godfrey v. Monroe, 101 Cal. 227, 35 Pac. 761. The conveyance to Elmendorf would therefore be as effectual in the one case as in the other, and, if we concede that the court erred in its decision as to the character of the instrument, it would not affect the title of the defendant based on such sale. No other points require discussion. We find no cause for reversal.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BELLON. (Cr. 2219.)

1. Criminal Law 🔑273—Plea of Guilty—Determination of Degree—Procedure.

Under Pen. Code, § 1192, requiring the court, on plea of guilty of a crime divided into degrees, first to determine the degree, a judicial determination based on evidence is required, and the proper procedure is to receive evidence as to such issue from the respective parties.

2. Criminal Law 🔑273—Plea of Guilty — Determination of Degree — Unsworn Statement of Defendant.

Where defendant, who had pleaded guilty to homicide, voluntarily made a statement without being sworn in proceedings to determine the degree, he cannot object to the court's determination based on such statement and other evidence.

3. Criminal Law 🔑274—Plea of Guilty—Withdrawal of Plea—Grounds.

Where defendant had pleaded guilty, and the court after hearing his statement and other evidence had determined the degree to be first degree murder without extenuation, defendant cannot withdraw his plea at the time when the court gave opportunity to present further evidence.

4. Criminal Law 🔑1168(6) — Appeal — Harmless Error—Additional Evidence.

Where the court determined that defendant, who had pleaded guilty was guilty of first degree murder without extenuation, and had sentenced him to death, defendant could not be prejudiced by reopening the case for further testimony.

5. Homicide 🔑253(6) — Sufficiency of Evidence—First Degree Murder.

Evidence that defendant, who had pleaded guilty, had killed his mother-in-law by cutting her throat when she interfered to protect her daughter against his admittedly premeditated attempt to kill her, held sufficient to warrant the court in holding defendant guilty of murder in the first degree without extenuation.

6. Homicide 🔑253(3) — Sufficiency of Evidence—First Degree Murder—Circumstantial Evidence.

To sustain a finding of first degree murder, it is not necessary that there should be express evidence of deliberate purpose to kill, if such purpose can be reasonably inferred from the facts and circumstances shown by the evidence.

7. Homicide 🔑22(3)—First Degree Murder—Premeditation.

There need be no appreciable space of time between the formation of the intent to kill and the killing to establish the premeditation necessary to make the offense first degree murder.

8. Criminal Law 🔑273—Plea of Guilty—Facts Admitted.

The plea of guilty of murder admits the venue and the death of the person assaulted, and those facts need not be established by evidence in proceedings to determine the degree of the offense.

9. Criminal Law 🔑1088(19) — Appeal — Record—Transcript of Preliminary Examination.

The transcript of the preliminary examination not offered in evidence in proceeding to determine the degree after plea of guilty, but admitted after judgment was pronounced and appeal taken to make it a part of the transcript on appeal, is not properly in the transcript and cannot be considered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; E. N. Rector, Judge.

Thomas Bellon pleaded guilty to murder and was sentenced to death, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Terry W. Ward, of Merced, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of death pronounced upon a plea of guilty to an information charging him with murder and the trial court's determination that the murder was of the first degree and without extenuating circumstance.

[1] Under our practice it is essential to proper pronouncement of judgment in the event of a plea of guilty of a crime distinguished or divided into degrees, such as murder or burglary, that the court first determine the degree. Section 1192, Pen. Code; People v. Jefferson, 52 Cal. 452. This the court did in the case at bar, but it is claimed that the determination was made in the entire absence of any evidence, and that in any event the evidence was not of such a nature as to support a conclusion of murder in the first degree.

While, as has been held, the proceeding to determine the degree of the crime of murder after a plea of guilty is not a trial, there being no issue joined, the statute does require, at least impliedly, a judicial determination based on evidence. See People v. Chew Lan Ong, 141 Cal. 550, 75 Pac. 186, 99 Am. St. Rep. 88. The appropriate and proper method for a court to pursue in such a case is to receive such competent evidence from the respective parties as is material to the question of degree, and, the evidence having been concluded, to pronounce its determination thereon.

[2-4] Passing for the moment the question of the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a conclusion that there existed the willful, deliberate, and premeditated intent to kill which is essential to first degree murder, we are satisfied there was in this case no such material departure in procedure from the proper method as, under the circumstances appearing, would justify a reversal. The record shows that on October 3, 1918, the defendant, who was at all times accompanied by his attorney, entered his plea of guilty, and the court announced that it was now the duty of the court to ascertain the degree. Thereupon the defendant, without having been sworn as a witness, was examined by the district attorney and the court, both as to the circumstances of the crime and as to the things material to the statement required by section 1192a to be sent to the clerk of the state prison in cases where a prisoner is to be punished by imprisonment therein. The examination of the defendant was intended to, and did, cover both of these matters. No objection whatever was urged by either the defendant or his counsel to the course pursued in this matter. While two other persons were briefly examined, their evidence threw no light on the material question of degree. The court thereupon announced its determination that the admitted murder was murder of the first degree, without extenuating circumstances, and fixed October 7, 1918, for judgment. At that time the district attorney was allowed to introduce additional evidence. Defendant, through his attorney, insisted that, if additional evidence was to be received on the question of degree, he should be allowed to withdraw his plea of guilty and the matter should be submitted to a jury. No good reason for the granting of permission to withdraw the plea was suggested, and the court properly denied the application. Nor can we conceive of any possible prejudice to defendant in allowing further evidence on the question of degree, in view of the determination previously announced. Certainly the effect of the additional evidence could not be to invoke more serious consequences to defendant than the determination previously announced. So far as appears, the court was willing, on October 7, 1918, to hear the testimony of any witness that might be produced by either party. The testimony having been concluded, the court announced that the new testimony had been taken "for further assurance" in the matter, and had confirmed the court in the conclusion previously arrived at, thus practically making a new determination. Judgment was then pronounced. Of course, the defendant could not have been compelled to give any evidence in the matter; but, as we have indicated, he voluntarily gave his statement, no objection whatever in this behalf being suggested prior to the appeal. Of course, also, if he was to testify, he should have been sworn as a witness or required to make his affirmation or declaration as provided by section 2097, Code of Civil Procedure. Here again there was no suggestion of objection by either defendant or his attorney prior to the filing of brief on this appeal. We are satisfied that he cannot now be allowed to urge that his statement may not be regarded as evidence to be considered by the trial court in fixing the degree. Full knowledge that he was not sworn as a witness must, of course, be attributed to the defendant himself, and also to his attorney. Their acquiescence under such circumstances should be held to be a waiver of objection. See generally, on this subject, Langford v. United States, 4 Ind. T. 567, 76 S. W. 111, 4 Ann. Cas. 1021 and note. Under the circumstances, it cannot fairly be held that the statement made by defendant was a mere extrajudicial statement.

[5] As to the question of the sufficiency of the evidence given by the defendant to sustain a conclusion of first degree murder without extenuating circumstances we have no doubt. Because his wife had had him arrested and had threatened to have him "sent to the war," he journeyed from Dinuba to Merced to her brother's home, whither she had gone, a distance of many miles, with the deliberate design of killing her. He found her in bed, and, having opened a razor he was carrying, cut her "throat right there in bed." It seems that the wound thus inflicted on his wife did not produce death. The wife's mother, with whose murder defendant was charged, was occupying a bed in the same room, and apparently attempted to intercept defendant immediately after he had thus assaulted his wife. He said that she was "just grabbing" him; that "she had a shotgun right there, close to her bed there, and she grabbed me"; that he said to her, "Never mind, I don't want to do nothing to you, go back"; and that she "grabbed" him, and "I had that razor." He also testified as follows:

"Q. When you struck at your mother-in-law there with the razor, did you just mean to scare her a little; is that what you meant to do? A. No, sir; I told her not to take the gun. She had the gun there, and I cut her.

"Q. What did you strike at when you struck?

What did you strike at? A. I struck at the neck.

"Q. You struck at her throat? A. Yes."

It further appeared that with the gun he shot at his brother-in-law.

It is also true that he said, "I did not mean to kill the old lady; I told her to stay back;" that in response to a question, "You did not intend to kill your mother-in-law?" he answered, "No, sir, never in the world; if she didn't have that gun, I wouldn't touch her;" and that in response to a question, "You intended to kill her too, didn't you?" he answered, "No, sir, I did not intend to kill her; I told her to go back." But these statements as to his secret intention were not conclusive on the trial court in view of the facts as testified to by him. It may be noted that, in the light afforded by a reading of his entire testimony, these statements do not appear to us to be necessarily inconsistent with a deliberate and premeditated intent to kill at the moment of the killing, but rather to mean that he went to the house without any preconceived design to kill his mother-in-law, and did kill her only upon her attempting to interfere with him after he had made the assault on his wife.

[6] As was said in People v. Machuca, 158 Cal. 64, 109 Pac. 886, in discussing a question of sufficiency of evidence to sustain a conclusion of first degree murder:

> "It is not necessary that there should be express evidence of a deliberate purpose to kill. 'It could be inferred from such facts and circumstances in the case as would reasonably warrant an inference of its existence.' [Citing authorities.] That the deliberation which must precede the killing in order to make the murder one of the first degree need not have existed for any given length of time is thoroughly settled. [Citing authorities.]"

[7] As has often been said:

> "There need be no appreciable space of time between the intention to kill and the act of killing; they may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind. It is only necessary that the act of killing be preceded by a concurrence of will, deliberation, and premeditation on the part of the slayer, and, if such is the case, the killing is murder in the first degree, no matter how rapidly these thoughts of the mind may succeed each other, or how quickly they may be followed by the act of killing."

See People v. Hunt, 59 Cal. 430, 435.

It is difficult to attribute any other design than that of killing to one who knowingly strikes at the throat of another with a sharp razor with such force and strength as to cause death.

[8] It is also urged that no evidence was introduced to show the things essential to defendant's guilt of the crime of murder committed in Merced county, such as that the mother-in-law was in fact dead, or that the crime was committed in Merced county. As to this it is sufficient to say that all of these things were admitted by the plea of guilty. It was only for the purpose of determining the degree of the admitted murder that any evidence at all was essential.

[9] In considering this appeal, we have not considered the transcript of the preliminary examination of defendant, for it constitutes no proper part of the record on appeal in this case. It was not offered in evidence in the court below until after the case had been finally closed, and judgment had been pronounced and the appeal taken. It seems to have been admitted at this stage simply for the purpose of making it a part of the transcript on appeal.

Defendant's attorney, appointed by the court, with a degree of loyalty to his client's cause that is to be commended, has filed herein a very strong brief in support of the various contentions made. In some of his claims as to irregularity in the procedure below he is undoubtedly correct. But as we have indicated, we are convinced that it cannot fairly be held that there was any such departure as, in view of the circumstances detailed, would justify a reversal.

WOODILL & HULSE ELECTRIC CO. v. YOUNG et al. (L. A. 4930.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚿519(6) — STREET IMPROVEMENT—LIENS—PRIORITIES.

As between different street improvement liens the one last imposed is paramount.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by the Woodill & Hulse Electric Company against George Young, the J. D. Kneen Contracting Company, and the Empire Securities Company, together with a consolidated cause. From judgment for the last-named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Richard J. Culver, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Crouch & Crouch, of San Diego, for respondent.

Chas. A. Gray, of San Francisco, and Arthur M. Ellis, of Los Angeles, amici curiæ.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to foreclose certain street assessment liens on two parcels of land. The defendants in the action were the original owners of the property upon which the plaintiff's liens were imposed, and the owner of certain other street assessment liens on the same property. These latter liens had been imposed prior to the imposition of the plaintiff's liens, and were for work done under proceedings initiated prior to the proceedings under which the plaintiff's work was done. Intermediate the imposition of the plaintiff's liens and the commencement of the action, street improvement bonds representing the assessments of the defendant lienholder were issued, default made upon such bonds, and the property sold to the lienholder to satisfy the bonds.

The original owner of the property defaulted in the action, which thereafter proceeded as between the lienholders only. The sole question presented was one of priority between the two sets of liens, and this was determined in the lower court against the plaintiff, who appeals.

The appellant's contention is that street assessment liens are liens which are imposed upon the property without the owner's consent under the taxing power of the state, that they are imposed upon the property as such so that every right or interest in the property is included in the subjection to the lien, with the result that a prior lien, even one itself for a street assessment, is subject to it. The respondent's contention is that the rule generally applicable to contractual liens applies, and that the one prior in time is prior in right.

The question as presented is a novel one in this state, unless Brady v. Burke, 90 Cal. 1, 27 Pac. 52, can be considered as determining it. The action in that case was one to quiet title, and the plaintiff claimed as the purchaser at a foreclosure sale in an action brought to foreclose a street assessment lien. Certain of the defendants claimed as the purchasers at foreclosure sales in actions to foreclose other street assessment liens. The lien foreclosed by the sale to the plaintiff was prior in time to the liens foreclosed by the sales to the defendants, but the latter existed at the time of the commencement of the foreclosure action resulting in the sale to the plaintiff, and the defendants were not made parties to that action, with the result, as claimed by them, that their rights had not been foreclosed by the sale to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances the court inquired into the validity of the proceedings under which the defendants claimed, held them to be invalid, and upon this ground affirmed the judgment quieting the plaintiff's title as against them. The liens under which the defendants claimed being held to be invalid in toto, the decision did not involve a determination of their rank, if valid, with respect to the liens under which the plaintiff claimed. In the course of the opinion, however, it is said:

> "Although the sheriff's deeds made to appellants Wood and Riggins [the defendants] antedated those of plaintiff and are based upon judgments rendered prior to those under which plaintiff claims, yet, as the liens under which plaintiff's title has its origin are older than the liens to which the deeds of appellants relate, plaintiff had the superior legal title"—citing Littlefield v. Nichols, 42 Cal. 374.

It does not appear whether there was any contention over the question of rank as between the liens, if valid, and there is no discussion of the matter in the opinion. All that appears is the statement quoted and the citation of Littlefield v. Nichols in support of it. But the liens involved in Littlefield v. Nichols were not imposed by superior public authority, but were contractual, and, furthermore, no question as to their rank was involved. The point determined was merely that, as between conflicting foreclosure or execution sales, that one was superior which was based upon the superior lien. It must be that it was to this point and to this point alone that it was cited in Brady v. Burke, supra. Our conclusion is that the bald statement in Brady v. Burke cannot be taken as a governing determination of the question now squarely presented, and that we are at liberty to determine it upon its merits.

The question has arisen in other jurisdictions and has been there decided. The decisions, however, are conflicting. Supporting the appellant's position are Morey v. Duluth, 75 Minn. 226, 77 N. W. 829; Burke v. Lukins, 12 Ind. App. 648, 40 N. E. 641, 54 Am. St. Rep. 539; Jaicks v. Oppenheimer, 264 Mo. 693, 175 S. W. 972. Supporting the respondent's position are Philadelphia v. Meager, 67 Pa. 345; Scott-McClure Land Co. v. Portland, 62 Or. 462, 125 Pac. 276; Bell v. New York, 66 App. Div. 578, 73 N. Y. Supp. 298; Des Moines Brick Co. v. Smith, 108 Iowa, 307, 79 N. W. 77.

In spite of this conflict, however, we believe that the underlying principles by whose application the question must be decided are clear and lead with certainty to the conclusion that in liens of this character, imposed on property—that is, on a thing itself regardless of ownership—by public authority for a public purpose, the one last imposed is paramount.

No question is made but that this is the well-established rule as to liens for general taxes. It is so held almost universally and has been so decided in this state. Anderson v. Rider, 46 Cal. 134, 138; Dougherty v. Henarie, 47 Cal. 9, 14; Chandler v. Dunn, 50 Cal. 15; California, etc., Co. v. Weis, 118 Cal. 489, 50 Pac. 697. The reason for it is concisely stated in Dougherty v. Henarie, supra, thus:

> "The necessity of collecting revenue for the support of the government imperatively requires that the lien for taxes shall take precedence over all other liens, and that a tax sale, followed by a proper conveyance, shall transfer the title discharged of prior tax liens. If the rule were otherwise, purchasers at tax sales would be deterred from bidding, and a large portion of the revenue would remain uncollected."

Such being the rule and the reason for it in the case of conflicting general tax liens, the question arises: What reason is there for not applying the same rule to the case of conflicting street assessment liens, or, possibly putting it more accurately, does the reason for the rule as between general tax liens apply as between street assessment liens? Now fundamentally the principle in the case of general tax liens is that the law for the purpose of insuring a payment required for a public purpose creates a lien for such payment, not upon any particular interest or set of interests in the property, but upon the property itself as such, so that all interests in it of every nature are made subject to the lien, with the result that, although there may be no explicit statutory provision, there is implicit the rule that the tax lien shall be paramount to all other prior existing liens, even to prior existing tax liens.

The case of street assessment liens under our statute comes exactly within the foregoing principle. The assessment is one for a public purpose. To insure its payment it is made a charge, not against any person, owner of property or otherwise, but against the res itself. So much has already been decided by this court. German, etc., Society v. Ramish, 138 Cal. 120, 69 Pac. 89, 70 Pac. 1067. In this case it was held that a street assessment lien was paramount to the lien of a mortgage. Now, the lien of a mortgage is not of the same character as a public assessment lien, and so far the decision mentioned cannot be said to be determinative of the present case. But the reasons given for the decision are exactly those for the rule as between conflicting tax liens, viz. that for the purpose of insuring a payment required for a public purpose a lien is placed on property paramount to all existing interests therein. It is said:

> "Whether the power to tax for street improvements is to be referred to the general taxing power and the power of eminent domain, or, as some courts have suggested, to the police power, is not very important. Whatever its source may be, it exists beyond question by reason of its nature and objects, and that it partakes of the nature of the taxing power must be admitted. The power to levy a tax for general purposes, which shall be a lien superior to all other liens, prior or otherwise, is not doubted, and it is not because it is called a tax, but because of its object and the necessity for raising revenue in order to execute the functions of government. In modern times, whatever may have been the demands of society in an earlier period of the development of government, the necessity for improving the streets of cities and towns, while perhaps less important in degree than the general objects of government, is yet important and necessary to the welfare of the whole community, and in our opinion the principles on which the system of general taxation depends, and which govern in the enforcement of tax levies for general purposes, are also applicable to taxation for the improvement of streets, the construction of sewers, and other like public work. It is a mistaken assumption that the improvement of a particular street in a city is solely for the benefit of adjoining property owners; the benefit accrues to the public generally, and the power to compel such improvements is essential to the well-being of communities. The bond act expressly provides that the lien of the bonds shall be 'a first lien upon property' (Stats. 1893, § 4, p. 36); and section 5 also makes the provisions of the law for the collection of delinquent state and county taxes applicable to sales under the bond act (Pol. Code, § 3788). The intention seems to be clearly manifested that the bond lien shall be prior to all liens. The view we take of the statute makes it unnecessary to inquire as to the effect of the lien which attaches upon the recording of the warrant. If we are to protect prior mortgages against the lien, how can we in reason take from the owner his title, which antedates the mortgagee's interest?"

The assessments in question here were not levied under the same act as those in German, etc., Society v. Ramish, supra, and the statutory provisions are not exactly the same. But the essential thing, the intent to make the lien a paramount one upon the property, is present in both statutes. Sections 23, 63, and 66 of the act of April 7, 1911; Stats. 1911, p. 730.

Such being the character and purpose of street assessment liens, and that character and purpose being the same as those of general tax liens, so far as this phase is concerned, it necessarily follows that the rule as to priority between conflicting tax liens should be the rule as to priority between conflicting street assessment liens.

Much might be said by way of amplification. Much is said and exceedingly well said, in Jaicks v. Oppenheimer, 264 Mo. 693, 175 S. W. 972, but we quote only the following:

> "When the two kinds of taxes are considered for the purpose of determining this question it will be found that there is not such an inherent difference between them as to place the liens of special taxes merely in the category of ordinary liens. It is true general taxes are levied for the support of the government and in that sense general taxes are the more important of the two and ought to take precedence over special taxes, so that the lien of a general tax ought to be prior to the lien of a special tax, even though the latter be prior in point of time. But that is not the question here. The question now is as to the rule of priority as between the different liens of different special taxes. And the precise inquiry now at hand is: What essential or inherent difference is there in the nature of special taxes which deprive their lien of a rule accorded to the lien of general taxes? Both are created by acts of the sovereign power exercised for the public good. In both the taxing power operates in rem, that is, on the property itself without regard to different or conflicting interests of ownership; in fact, in total disregard of any liens or interests attached thereto. The proceedings to collect both are proceedings in rem. And 'the general and universal rule is that in proceedings in rem to enforce the payment of taxes the last tax levied and sought to be enforced is superior and paramount to the lien of all other taxes, claims, or title. 2 Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.), 875."

The principal reasons advanced in opposition to the foregoing view are: (1) That it permits the municipality or other public authority to give one party a lien, and then, without his consent and against his will, displace and perhaps destroy it by creating another lien in favor of another party; and (2) that it will defeat the purpose of the statute by preventing contractors from taking work through fear of subsequent liens.

As to the first of the reasons, it will occur immediately that it is equally applicable to liens for general taxes where admittedly the subsequent lien is the superior. No reason is apparent why the holder of a street assessment lien should be more favored than a purchaser at a tax sale. But the real fallacy in the argument lies in its overlooking the fact that all property and every interest in property, no matter how acquired or what its origin, must be held subject to the right of subsequent taxation, both general and special, and that any foregoing of this right by the state must be most exceptional. Yet there is just such an exception if the interest of a street assessment lien—an interest which is purely private property although public in its origin—is not to be subjected to subsequent liens for public improvements. There is, in fact, no more displacement or destruction of the earlier lien by the imposition of the later than there is r displacement or destruction of any other right in the property by the imposition of a street assessment lien.

The second objection, that the doing of public work will be hampered because contractors will be reluctant to undertake work if their liens are to be subject to liens for subsequent work, is, we believe, almost entirely fanciful. The same reason would apply to any acquisition of property which could not be concealed from the taxing authorities, and as yet there has not been observed any great reluctance to purchase real estate, which cannot be so concealed, or to loan money secured by lien upon it, although it is well understood that real estate and any mortgage lien upon it may at any time be subjected to assessment for public work.

On the other hand, to hold that a street assessment lien is superior to any subsequent lien of the same character would most certainly interfere with the making of public improvements and seriously tend to frustrate the purpose of the statute. The lien of the assessment exists for two years, and if suit to foreclose is brought the lien exists until the termination of the suit. If such a lien is superior to any similar subsequent lien, there would be nothing to prevent the owner of property assessed from purchasing the lien, concealing the fact of purchase, having suit brought to foreclose the assessment, and then tolling the suit along indefinitely, thereby prolonging the apparent lien, and quite effectually deterring any bidding for work which could be paid for only by an assessment subordinate to the lien already on the property. If bonds are issued to represent the assessment, as was done in this case, the possibility of obstructing the making of public improvements is still greater, for the life of the bonds is ten years, and during this whole period any contractor doing public work payable by assessment must take a second lien.

Finally, the point is made by amici curiæ, arguing in support of the respondent's position, that the statute provides that the "assessment shall be a first lien * * * until * * * fully paid. * * *" They argue that, if the assessment is to be a first lien until paid, it necessarily follows that any subsequent lien must be subordinate to it. But this result is but one horn of a dilemma which presents itself, if we assume that the language quoted was intended to include the case of conflicting liens under the statute. The language is just as applicable to an assessment for subsequent work as to the one first imposed. In other words, the statute declares equally as well in the case of the second assessment as in the first that the lien shall be a first lien. But such lien can be first only if it is superior to the lien of the first assessment. The only escape from the dilemma thus presented is to conclude that the statute intended that, when once a lien for street work is imposed on property, no further improvement of a similar character can properly be made until such lien has been discharged by payment. Such a result, of course, would be subversive of the very purpose of the act, and it is inconceivable that it was intended.

The true answer to the dilemma is that the language quoted was not intended to apply to the case of conflicting liens, both under the same statute. It cannot so apply, since it would make both liens, though in conflict, first liens, a manifest impossibility. The correct construction of the statute is that by the language quoted nothing more was intended than to declare the general proposition that a street assessment lien should be a first lien on the property. The result is that the statute contains nothing governing the ranking of conflicting liens, each imposed under the statute, and such ranking must be determined by the general principles applicable to liens of that character. As to those general principles we have no doubt. Such liens, so far as any phase of the matter here material is concerned, are essentially tax liens imposed by public authority for a public purpose upon a res, and the same compelling reasons which have led to the practically universal recognition of the rule that a subsequent lien for general taxes is superior to a prior lien of the same sort lead to the same conclusion with regard to street assessment liens. It follows that the conclusion of law of the trial court that the assessments and bonds of the defendant Empire Securities Company are respectively liens prior and superior to the liens of the plaintiff is incorrect.

The judgment is reversed, and the lower court is directed to enter judgment subjecting to foreclosure the interests of the Empire Securities Company in the property as well as the interests foreclosed by the present judgment.

1. Interpleader 🔑40 — Sufficiency of Complaint.

Complaint in interpleader under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, is not required to state facts showing that both adverse claims are well founded, but is sufficient if it shows that the claimants claim same thing, that their claims are adverse to each other, and that plaintiff cannot safely determine for himself which claim is right and lawful.

2. Banks and Banking 🔑119 — General Deposit — Relation of Parties — Debtor and Creditor.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1818, 1878, a general deposit for exchange or credit creates the relation of debtor and creditor, the title to the money passing to the person with whom it is deposited, and he becoming debtor of depositor for amount thereof.

3. Assignments 🔑49—Bills and Notes 🔑4, 66—"Bill of Exchange"—Acceptance —Obligation of Drawee.

Instrument reading: "Received of F. Savings & Loan Association $3,500. * * * Charge to account of S. Pay to Z."—signed and executed by S., who had made general deposit with F. Savings & Loan Association, and delivered to Z., was in legal effect, a bill of exchange under Civ. Code, § 3171, and not an assignment, and under section 3193 did not create legal obligation from F. Savings & Loan Association to Z. until accepted by former in writing.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Assignment, Bill of Exchange.]

4. Assignments 🔑49—Equitable Assignment—Bill of Exchange—Consideration.

If an order for payment of money deposited by drawer as a general deposit with drawee had been delivered to payee for a valuable consideration, it would have operated as an equitable assignment of drawer's demand against drawee for the amount deposited, and could have been enforced as such.

5. Assignments 🔑49—Equitable Assignment—Bill of Exchange.

An order or writing for the payment of money at the delivery of property which does not by its legal effect constitute an assignment, and which is executed as a gift and for no other consideration, will not be upheld or enforced as an equitable assignment.

6. Assignments 🔑49—Equitable Assignments—Bill of Exchange—Gift.

Where drawer gave payee bill of exchange in trust for purpose of supplying him with funds with which to construct building for charitable purposes, and there was no actual present transfer by way of verbal gift, accompanied by a delivery of the means of obtaining possession or a symbolical delivery of possession, so as to make a valid gift under Civ. Code, § 1147, there was no equitable assignment, but, in absence of acceptance by drawee, merely an uncompleted attempt to make gift of money in trust for charitable purposes.

7. Gifts 🔑42—Uncompleted Attempt to Make Gift.

An uncompleted attempt to make a gift does not vest any right to the thing in the donee, and it cannot be enforced by action in the courts.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action in interpleader by the Fidelity Savings & Loan Association against Mary C. Rodgers, executrix of the last will and testament of Sarah Rounds, and Z. L. Parmelee. Judgment for last-named defendant, and first-named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Slosson & Mitchell, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Milton K. Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action was begun by the filing of the complaint of the plaintiff asking that the defendants be required to interplead and litigate among themselves their several adverse and conflicting claims to the sum of $3,500 in possession of the plaintiff, and which it offered to pay into court for the party found to be entitled thereto. Such an action is authorized by section 386 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The objection of the appellant Rodgers that the complaint in interpleader is insufficient, because it does not state facts showing that the claims of Parmelee, the other defendant, is well founded is of no force. If this was required, it would result in an absurdity which would defeat the right in any case to maintain such an action. The claims being adverse, both parties defendant could not have the right to the thing. If the plaintiff who calls them in must state a good case for one, he must, for the like reason, state a good case for the other, and as both could not have the right to the thing, this would be impossible. If his statement showed that one had the right and the other had not, a plaintiff could not support the interpleader, for he would then show his ability to decide the matter and thus put himself out of court. Because of these considerations, the Code requires nothing more of him in this respect than to show that the parties to be called in make claims on him for the same thing, that the respective claims are adverse to each other, and that he cannot safely determine for himself which claim is right and lawful.

The two defendants appeared, and each filed a separate answer setting up the respective claims to the money. The court below made findings, and gave judgment declaring the defendant Parmelee entitled to the money. From this judgment defendant Rodgers, as executrix of the estate of Sarah C. Rounds, deceased, appeals.

The court found the facts to be as follows: Before the demands were made upon it, Sarah C. Rounds deposited with plaintiff a sum of money exceeding $3,500. She made an order in the following words:

> "Los Angeles, Cal., Nov. 8th, 1915.
> "Received of Fidelity Savings & Loan Association $3,500.00 thirty-five hundred and no/100 dollars. Charge to account of Sarah C. Rounds. Pay to Z. L. Parmelee. Sarah C. Rounds."

On November 9, 1915, she executed and delivered said order to defendant Z. L. Parmelee. This was given to him in trust to collect the money from the plaintiff and apply the same in constructing a building at Gardena, Cal., to be used as a school for Spanish and Mexican boys and to be known as the "Sarah C. Rounds Industrial Building." There was no other consideration for the order. Before the execution of this order, the plaintiff furnished the form on which it was written and approved the same as the proper form and instrument for transferring $3,500 from the account of said Sarah C. Rounds to the said Parmelee. On November 9, 1915, and again on November 12, 1915, Parmelee presented said order to the plaintiff and demanded payment thereof, but payment was refused each time by plaintiff for the reason that plaintiff had been warned by some friend of Mrs. Rounds that she was not of sound mind. This was not true. The court found that she was of sound mind. Sarah C. Rounds died on December 8, 1915, one month after the date of said order. Defendant Rodgers is the executrix of her estate, and as such demanded the money from plaintiff.

[2] Neither the pleadings nor findings show the corporate character of plaintiff, nor the business in which it was engaged. It does not appear that it was a bank of any kind; consequently we cannot consider any rules of law applicable exclusively to banking transactions. Nowhere in the record is it expressly stated whether the money deposited by Mrs. Rounds with plaintiff was received by it as a mere bailment of the identical money, or as a credit in her favor. The expressions used, however, show that it was regarded and treated by her as an "account" in her favor against the plaintiff, to be paid out by it on her order, and as both parties have discussed the case solely upon the theory that it was a general deposit for exchange or credit, we will assume that such was its character. The effect of such a deposit is to create the relation of debtor and creditor between the two parties concerned; the title to the money passing to the person with whom it is deposited, and such person becoming the debtor of the depositor for the amount thereof. Civ. Code, secs. 1818, 1878; Shoemaker v. Hinze, 53 Wis. 116, 10 N. W. 86; Talladega Ins. Co. v. Landers, 43 Ala. 115.

[3-5] The instrument executed by Mrs. Rounds to Parmelee was therefore an order by a creditor to a debtor to pay the debt, or a part thereof, to a third person. Although it contains many unnecessary words, it is, in legal effect, a bill of exchange. Wheatley v. Strobe, 12 Cal. 92, 97, 73 Am. Dec. 522; Civ. Code, § 3171. It does not purport to transfer to Parmelee the title to the money mentioned, nor to the debt or obligation of the plaintiff to repay the same to her, but merely directs the plaintiff to pay to Parmelee the said sum of money. Consequently it is not in form, or in legal effect, a present assignment to Parmelee of the right or title to the money or to the obligation therefor. Cashman v. Harrison, 90 Cal. 302, 27 Pac. 283; Lawrence Natl. Bank v. Kowalsky, 105 Cal. 43, 38 Pac. 517. Being in legal effect a bill of exchange, it did not create a legal obligation from plaintiff to Parmelee until it was accepted by the plaintiff and such acceptance could not be made except in writing. Civ. Code, § 3193; Wheatley v. Strobe, supra. It was not accepted in any manner; consequently it does not constitute a direct obligation on the part of plaintiff to pay the money to Parmelee. It is executory in character, a mere order directing that the money be paid by plaintiff to Parmelee, but accomplishing no transfer of title until the intended transaction should be completed by a transfer of the possession, or, it may be, by the written acceptance of the plaintiff. If it had been given for a valuable consideration, it would have operated as an equitable assignment of the demand of Mrs. Rounds against the plaintiff for the sum of money, and could have been enforced as such. Wheatley v. Strobe, supra; Pope v. Huth, 14 Cal. 406; Pierce v. Robinson, 13 Cal. 121; Joyce v. Wing, 87 Cal. 424, 25 Pac. 545; Curtner v. Lyndon, 128 Cal. 36, 60 Pac. 462. But it was intended as a gift in trust, and was without valuable consideration. It is the settled doctrine that an order or writing for the payment of money or the delivery of property, which does not by its legal effect constitute an assignment and which is executed as a gift and for no other consideration, will not be upheld or enforced as an equitable assignment. Pullen v. Placer County Bank, 138 Cal. 175, 66 Pac. 740, 71 Pac. 83, 94 Am. St. Rep. 19; Brokaw v. Brokaw, 41 N. J. Eq. 221, 4 Atl. 66; 5 Cor. Jur. p. 931.

[6, 7] From the foregoing it is clear that the transaction shown by the facts found, and enforced by the judgment, was nothing more than an uncompleted attempt by Mrs. Rounds to make a gift of the money to Parmelee, in trust for charitable purposes. There is nothing to show any actual present transfer by way of verbal gift accompanied by a delivery of the means of obtaining possession, or a symbolical delivery of possession, so as to make a valid gift under section 1147 of the Civil Code. It does not appear that Mrs. Rounds and Parmelee had any conversation about the matter, or that there was any communication between them other than the said written order. An uncompleted attempt to make a gift does not vest any right to the thing in the donee, and it cannot be enforced by action in the courts. The court below was in error in its conclusion that Parmelee was entitled to the money.

TIFFANY v. PACIFIC SEWER PIPE CO.
(L. A. 4902.)

MASTER AND SERVANT ⚿30(3)—EMPLOYMENT—RIGHT TO DISCHARGE—SATISFACTORY TO EMPLOYER.

Contract of employment of expert glazeman, giving employer right to discharge if for any reason it is unable to turn out enameled and glazed brick in quantities equal to the present quality "and satisfactory to" it, implies a complete satisfaction involving its judgment, and authorizes discharge if for any reason quality or quantity is not satisfactory to it; its decision thereon being conclusive.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by James Tiffany against the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Swanwick & Donnelly, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Donald Gallagher, of El Paso, Tex., for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff sued for damages caused by an alleged wrongful discharge of plaintiff from the defendant's service. The court below made findings and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $3,617.17, being the full amount prayed for in the complaint. Defendant appeals.

The defendant was engaged in the business of manufacturing glazed brick. Plaintiff was employed by the defendant as an "expert glazeman" for the term of three years beginning February 10, 1914, under a contract in writing made on February 12, 1914, and modified on May 12, 1914. The first contract provided that Tiffany should be employed by the defendant as expert glazeman for one year at $3,000 a year, with the privilege to defendant of changing the employment to three years at $2,000 per year at any time within six months, "providing a product satisfactory to the defendant" was obtained within 60 days from the date of the contract. Tiffany began work, and continued until May 12, 1914, on which date a modification of the contract was made, whereby the defendant employed Tiffany for three years from February 10, 1914, at $175 per month, upon the following condition:

> "In consideration of the above provisions Mr. Tiffany will not hold the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company liable under said contract, in case for any reason the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company are unable to turn out enameled and glazed brick in quantities equal to the present quality and satisfactory to the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company.
> "In the latter case Mr. Tiffany is to have ninety days notice before making a change."

Tiffany was discharged on May 10, 1915, without notice. The court found that up to that time plaintiff had fully performed his contract with a reasonable degree of skill, and that the defendant, after the making of the contract, was at all times able to turn out enameled and glazed brick in quantities equal to the quality which was being turned out on May 11, 1914, and which was satisfactory to said defendant. It is claimed that this finding is contrary to the evidence.

In the making of brick, the mud or clay is first pressed and molded to the shape desired, the glaze or enamel is then applied, and when a sufficient quantity to fill a kiln is thus prepared the bricks are placed in the kiln and burned to the required degree. The principal duty of the plaintiff was to prepare and mix the glaze or enamel so that it would, when burned, have the hardness and other qualities necessary to make it durable and the brick salable. The glaze or enamel was a liquid into which the bricks were dipped so as to form a coat of the liquid on their surfaces.

It will be observed that the conditions expressed in the modification above quoted embraced three propositions: First, that the defendant should be able to turn out enameled and glazed brick in quantities; second, that the brick turned out should be equal to the present quality. This obviously refers to the provision of the first contract that the three years' employment would be made if "a product was obtained within sixty days from its date which was satisfactory to the defendant." It appears from the evidence that at the time the second contract was made Tiffany was producing a quality of enameled and glazed brick which satisfied the defendant and induced it to enter into the second contract. The third proposition embraced in the added condition was that the enameled and glazed brick produced by the service of plaintiff should not only be equal in quality to that being produced on May 12, 1914, but also that in quantities and quality it should be "satisfactory to the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company." It is contended that there is no evidence to show that the defendant was satisfied with either the quantity or the quality of the enameled and glazed brick produced by the plaintiff for the defendant thereafter. The law governing the rights of the parties under a contract which requires one party to do something which is satisfactory to the other party is thus stated in 13 Corpus Juris, at page 675:

> "Contracts in which one party agrees to perform to the satisfaction of the other are ordinarily divided into two classes: (1) Where fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment are involved; and (2) where the question is merely one of operative fitness or mechanical utility. In contracts involving matters of fancy, taste, or judgment, when one party agrees to perform to the satisfaction of the other, he renders the other party the sole judge of his satisfaction without regard to the justice or reasonableness of his decision, and a court or jury cannot say that such party should have been satisfied where he asserts that he is not." Section 768.

The next section declares:

> "The rule stated in the preceding section is also applied to cases of operative fitness or mechanical utility when the contract clearly provides that performance shall be satisfactory to the promisor."

Similar statements will be found in 9 Cyc., at pages 618, 619, and 620.

A different rule applies where the contract provides for the construction of a building or the like, in accordance with plans and specifications fixed by the contract, to the satisfaction of the owner or of an architect employed by him. In these cases it is usually held that if the contract is performed as required by the plans and specifications, the person whose judgment is invoked must accept the performance, and his mental condition as to satisfaction is immaterial. In such cases the question whether the work is satisfactorily done or not arises after the contract has been executed, either in whole or in part, and the satisfaction refers to that which is already done. Elliott states the rule to be that such a contract does not justify the promisor in arbitrarily, unreasonably, and capriciously claiming that he is not satisfied, in order to evade liability, "and the courts in doubtful cases, especially when the thing furnished is so attached to the real property of the buyer that its value would be lost to the seller, either wholly or in great part, unless paid for, are inclined to construe such a stipulation as one to furnish such a thing as ought reasonably to satisfy the buyer. But where there is nothing to justify the contrary construction, the general rule is that the party to be satisfied is the judge of his own satisfaction, subject only to the limitation in most jurisdictions that he must act in good faith, and if he does so act and is really dissatisfied, he may reject the work or the article on the ground that it is not satisfactory to him. This rule is particularly applicable where the subject-matter of the contract involves personal taste or feeling, as where an artist agrees to paint a portrait of another or some member of his family, to the satisfaction of such other or the like, but, as shown by the authorities cited in the last preceding note, the rule is not confined to such cases." 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 1881. "It has been held that a contract for personal services, so long as they are satisfactory to the employer, may be terminated by him whenever he is dissatisfied in good faith. * * * Similar rulings have been made in cases of contracts to manufacture or furnish articles to the satisfaction of the other party, even though a reasonable man would or ought to have been satisfied." Id. § 1882.

The decisions in this state have not attempted to state the rule with reference to cases like the present. In Coplew v. Durand, 153 Cal. 278, 95 Pac. 38, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 791, which involved a building contract, there were elaborate plans and specifications, as is usual in such cases, and the work was "to be done to the entire satisfaction of the owner and the architect." Before each payment was made a certificate was to be obtained signed by the architect. After the work was done both owner and architect stated that they were satisfied with it, but the architect refused to make a certificate. It appeared that the work was done conformably to the plans and specifications. The court merely held that under the circumstances the refusal of the certificate was unreasonable, and that the contractor was entitled to recover as if it had been issued. In Gladding, etc., Co. v. Montgomery, 20 Cal. App. 279, 128 Pac. 792, the District Court of Appeal remarked that "a stipulation in a contract to perform to the satisfaction of one of the parties only calls for such performance as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person." This remark also referred to a building contract and with reference to portions of the work already done. Furthermore, it was an obiter dictum, the question not being involved in the case. In Bryan Elevator Co. v. Law, 31 Cal. App. 205, 160 Pac. 170, a building contract was also under consideration. The plaintiff agreed to construct an elevator in the defendant's building, that its operation "shall give satisfaction in every particular," and that if the controlling device proved unsatisfactory, plaintiff would replace it with another "satisfactory to the owner." The court followed the rule applying to building contracts in general, and held that the contract only called "for such performance as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person." In other cases, where the question of judgment was involved, the opposite rule has been applied. In Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 166 Cal. 426, 137 Pac. 21, a real estate contract, the seller agreed to make the title satisfactory to the buyer and his attorneys. The court said that the question was "not whether the title was in fact a good and marketable one, but whether it was acceptable to respondent and his attorneys," citing Allen v. Pockwitz, 103 Cal. 88, 36 Pac. 1039, 42 Am. St. Rep. 99, and Church v. Shanklin, 95 Cal. 627, 30 Pac. 789, 17 L. R. A. 207. The two cases cited involved a similar question and were to the same effect.

The contract in the present case was an executory one. The question does not involve the acceptance of any work already done by Tiffany under his employment. He was discharged from further employment because the defendant was not satisfied with the quality of his work. There is no sufficient evidence to support the finding that the defendant was satisfied with his work. During the time of his service many kilns of brick were burned which were glazed by him, and there is evidence as to some of these that the defendant's manager expressed himself satisfied. But there is no evidence, and no declaration or admission by any person authorized to speak for the defendant that it was satisfied with his work as a whole. The contract authorized the defendant to discharge the plaintiff if his work was not satisfactory as a whole, although at times he might be producing brick of the finest quality. The object of the defendant in employing the plaintiff was to obtain glazed and enameled brick for sale to its customers. The quantity of good brick produced out of each kiln, that is, the proportion of good brick to bad brick therein, was an important matter to them. For example, there is evidence that one customer agreed to buy 1,815 glazed brick known as "bull-nosed," that is, with one or more corners rounded, that the glaze was mixed and applied by plaintiff, and 15,000 bricks were so glazed and burned in order to obtain 1,815 good ones. Other evidence fixed the number burned for that job at 5,000 to obtain the required number. Quality was also important, for if the glaze was not rightly mixed it would scale off, or crack, after being burned, and if the color or transparency was not satisfactory to purchasers the brick would not be as easily sold. All these matters would, of necessity, be determinable by the taste or judgment of the defendant's managers. And as their experience in the business was an essential element in the exercise of that judgment, it could not have been intended that some other person's judgment should determine the question of satisfactory performance. An express stipulation or necessary implication would be necessary to give such a contract that meaning. This contract neither declares it directly, nor requires it by implication. The terms of the contract imply that the defendant was not compelled to be satisfied if the quality produced equaled that which was being produced at the time the contract was made. The addition of the phrase, "and satisfactory to the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company," implied a complete satisfaction, and authorized the defendant to reject the brick or discharge Tiffany under the terms of the contract if for any reason of any character the quality or quantity of the product was not satisfactory. We think the contract falls within the rule applicable to cases where the judgment of the promisor is involved, and that his decision that he is not satisfied is conclusive on the other party and upon the court to which the question is presented.

The judgment for the amount awarded cannot be supported without the finding in question. None of the other findings supplies its place. The appeal must therefore be sustained.

The judgment is reversed.

LAWRENCE v. PREMIER INDEMNITY ASSUR. CO. et al. (L. A. 4918.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑1040(13)—Harmless Error—Overruling Demurrer.

In action against corporation and directors for conversion of plaintiff's stock, plaintiff was not prejudiced by overruling of special demurrer to answer alleging that it had been agreed that the stock should be retained by the corporation's treasurer until plaintiff should perform "certain services," where plaintiff in fact knew exactly what services were referred to.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑553(2)—Notice of Presentation of Reporter's Transcript for Certification.

Where the record was prepared under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, the objection that proper notice was not given of presentation to the trial judge for certification of the reporter's transcript, in that notice was given by mail and specified a time for presentation but two days removed, cannot be sustained; for it is sufficient that the clerk give notice by mail, and, as the statute requires only that the time specified be "within" five days of the notice, if the time allowed be too short for sufficient examination of the transcript, a request may be made to the court for further time.

3. Trial 🔑396(3)—Finding Not Responsive to Issues.

In action against corporation and directors for conversion of plaintiff's stock, the issue presented by the pleadings and evidence being whether plaintiff was the unconditional owner of the stock or whether plaintiff was to have his stock only upon his performance of his contract to sell stock, a finding that he had agreed to deposit the stock as security for performance of his stock-selling contract was not responsive to the issue presented by the pleadings and evidence.

4. Evidence 🔑442(1)—Parol Agreement—Minutes of Directors' Meeting.

In action against corporation and directors for conversion of plaintiff's stock, the issue presented by the pleadings and evidence being whether plaintiff was the unconditional owner of the stock or whether plaintiff was to have his stock only upon his performance of his contract to sell stock, testimony that at the directors' meeting at which issue of plaintiff's stock was authorized it was agreed that the stock was to be plaintiff's only upon his performance of services, was not inadmissible under the parol evidence rule, as varying the terms of the minutes of such meeting which were in evidence, as there was no element of estoppel, and only a part of the full transaction appeared in the minutes.

5. Evidence 🔑158(26) — Best Evidence — Minutes of Directors' Meeting.

Testimony as to contents of minutes of directors' meeting is incompetent.

6. Evidence 🔑352(1)—Admissions—Corporation Minute Book.

The books of a corporation, including its minute book, are competent evidence against it as admissions.

7. Evidence 🔑442(1), 444(2)—Parol Evidence—Proposal.

When a proposal, even in writing, is made and accepted, it is permissible to show it was accepted with conditions or qualifications, or that accompanying the acceptance and in reality forming part of it terms in addition to those set forth in the proposal were exacted by acceptor.

8. Evidence 🔑408(1) — Parol Evidence — Receipts.

Unless a receipt either purports to be or the evidence shows it is the written memorial of the full understanding between the parties, the parol evidence rule has no application.

9. Evidence 🔑444(2) — Parol Evidence —Receipts.

Where plaintiff's receipt from a corporation for a sum in payment for stock purported only to require the issuance of the certificate for the shares as soon as a certificate book was had, and plaintiff's evidence showed that the receipt did not cover the entire understanding, evidence by defendants that there were conditions or terms upon which plaintiff was to have the stock was properly admitted.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Action by John D. Lawrence against the Premier Indemnity Assurance Company and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Hamilton & Lindley and George B. Watson, all of San Diego, for appellant.

E. S. Torrance and Charles P. Pritchard, both of San Diego, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. The Premier Indemnity Company and the San Diego Land & Mortgage Company are the same corporation. This action is against it and three of its five directors to recover for the alleged conversion by them of 175 shares of the corporation's stock belonging to the plaintiff. The defendants had judgment in the lower court, and the plaintiff appeals.

[1] Two preliminary matters should be disposed of before considering the merits of the case. The first of these is the contention of the appellant that the lower court erred in overruling a special demurrer to an affirmative defense pleaded by the answers. The complaint alleged in brief that the plaintiff was the owner of the stock in question, that such ownership was evidenced by a stock certificate issued by the corporation in the name of the plaintiff, and that the defendants converted it to their own use on a certain day. The answers, among other things, pleaded that the stock certificate had been made out under an agreement with the plaintiff that it was to be retained in the possession of the treasurer of the corporation until "said plaintiff should have performed certain services that he had theretofore agreed to perform for said corporation," and that he had not performed these services and had wrongfully secured possession of the certificate. The answers contained nothing showing what the "certain services" were which it was alleged the plaintiff was to perform and a special demurrer was directed to this point. Apparently the demurrer was good. Certainly respondent's counsel in his brief before us makes no attempt to show the contrary, but relies upon the proposition that the plaintiff has not been prejudiced by the ruling, if erroneous. His position in this respect is sound. The plaintiff was in no wise misled or prejudiced. He knew in fact exactly what services the defendants claimed he should have performed and had not. He had been president and a director of the corporation, and as such had himself been present at the directors' meeting when the dispute between him and the three defendant directors came to a head and when the alleged act of conversion was committed by the passage of resolutions canceling his stock for the nonperformance by him of services called for by a previous contract in writing. At the trial it was the same services whose performance was relied upon as justifying the action of the defendants. Under these circumstances the plaintiff was not taken by surprise, and no prejudice was worked upon him by not requiring the answers to state with particularity the services in question, although as a matter of correct pleading this should have been done.

[2] The second preliminary matter to be considered is the contention on behalf of respondent that the reporter's transcript—the record having been prepared under section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure—cannot be considered, because proper notice of its presentation to the judge of the trial court for certification was not given. The objections to the notice are not that no notice was received, for it apparently was, and counsel appeared at the time specified, but are that it was given by mail and specified a time for presentation but two days removed. The notice which is required is one by the clerk of the court, and not by the parties. The sections of the Code requiring notice to a party to be given by personal service where the attorneys have their offices in the same city do not apply. There is no provision requiring notice by the clerk to be given by personal service, and such requirement of a public official would be burdensome in a degree out of all proportion to any advantage and should not be exacted. It is enough for the clerk to give notice by mail. As to the objection to the time of notice, it is sufficient to point out that the requirement of the statute is simply that the time specified be within five days of the giving of the notice. If the time allowed be too short for a sufficient examination of the transcript, a request should be made to the court for further time. No complaint is made in this case that the transcript is not correct or that sufficient time for its examination was not in fact allowed before its final certification.

Passing now to the merits, it appears that the defendant corporation was organized in San Diego in the spring of 1911 for the purpose of engaging in the business of accident insurance. The plaintiff was the primary organizer of the company and was its president and a director. On March 21, 1911, he made a contract in writing with the company whereby he assigned to it certain manuscript books on insurance, and policy and other forms, for use in the company's proposed business. He also agreed to devote his entire time to completing the organization of the company, to obtaining the requisite authorization to do business from the state insurance commissioner, and to securing subscriptions for its entire capital stock. In return for the things so assigned and the services to be performed by him, the contract provided that he was to receive 25 per cent. of the company's entire capital stock, or 500 shares. Of these 500 shares a certificate for 200 was to be made out practically at once, but to be held by the treasurer of the company until all of its capital stock had been paid up. The remaining 300 shares were not to be issued until the agreement had been fully performed by the plaintiff.

The company could not write insurance until it had 25 per cent. of its capital stock paid in and could not continue to write insurance unless all its capital stock was paid in within a year from the time of filing its articles (section 584, Pol. Code). About the 1st of October, 1911, the company made application to the state insurance commissioner for a permit to do business on the ground that 25 per cent. of its stock had been paid in. The commissioner in reply wrote the company, saying that the examination of his department showed that 25 per cent. of the capital stock had been paid in, and that he considered it his duty to issue the permit; that, however, the contract with the plaintiff was uncertain as to whether he was to be entitled to his 25 per cent. of the stock when the company should receive its first permit or when all the capital stock was paid in, and suggesting that this uncertainty should be cleared up. To this the plaintiff replied by letter, saying, in effect, that the contract meant that he was to give his services to the company from January 23, 1911 (the date of filing of the company's articles of incorporation), to January 23, 1912 (the date by which all the capital stock of the company had to be paid in), and that he was to receive his stock only when all of his services had been performed. The contract was in fact somewhat uncertain on its face in the particular pointed out by the commissioner, and this letter of the plaintiff must be taken as removing the uncertainty and establishing the fact that he was to receive his stock only upon the company being completely organized and its capital stock fully paid in, and that this was to be done by January 23, 1912.

The letter of the commissioner also pointed out that, when it became necessary for the company to show that its capital had been fully paid in, a question would arise as to whether this could be shown as to the plaintiff's 25 per cent., and the company might at that time be considerably embarrassed. Then followed some other tart correspondence between the plaintiff and the commissioner, the outcome of which was a decision by the plaintiff and the other directors to make a new arrangement between the plaintiff and the company. The essential point in dispute between the parties is as to what this new arrangement was.

The arrangement was made at a meeting of the directors on October 11th, but was not covered into a single and complete written instrument. The defendants were permitted over the objection of the plaintiff to show that a part of the arrangement was purely oral and what such part was. Passing by the objection of the plaintiff to this testimony and assuming its truth, as we must in view of the finding of the trial court, what took place between the plaintiff and the defendants was substantially this:

The plaintiff called an informal meeting of the directors on October 10th to consider the objections by the insurance commissioner to his contract. He stated to the directors that the commissioner had advised that it would be satisfactory to him if the company would get rid of the plaintiff's contract and show that the 200 shares, the certificate for which had been issued in the plaintiff's name and deposited with the treasurer of the company as provided in the plaintiff's contract, had been paid for. The plaintiff then proposed that the contract be rescinded; that the company pay him $20,000 for his services to date; that he immediately purchase the 200 shares for $20,000, and leave the shares with the treasurer of the company until he had completed his original contract in all particulars. After some discussion the directors agreed to this, except that the 200 shares were cut to 175. The understanding as accepted by the plaintiff with regard to payment for the stock and its delivery was testified to on behalf of the defendants as follows:

> "Dr. Kendall [one of the directors] then said: 'The company will issue their check to you for $17,500, and you are to give the company a check for $17,500. The understanding is that Mr. Vogt is to hold the new shares of stock just the same as he is holding the 200 shares of stock, until you have fully completed your contract and sold all of the balance of the stock. If you do not complete the organization of the company, you are not to get anything. We are doing this to help you get the temporary license.'"

The following day a formal meeting of the directors was held to carry out the plan agreed upon. The minutes show merely that the plaintiff made an offer in writing to cancel his contract upon receiving $17,500 for services to date, and that this offer was accepted and the payment to the plaintiff authorized. No mention is made of the fact that the plaintiff was to return the payment to the company by way of payment for 175 shares, or that the certificate for these shares was to be held by the treasurer for delivery to the plaintiff only upon his completing the requirements of his original contract. The minutes of the meeting were prepared the day following by the plaintiff and the attorney for the company, and the latter testifies that he suggested that they should show that the treasurer was to hold the new shares until the completion by the plaintiff of his contract, but the plaintiff stated that, while such was the understanding, it was not necessary for the minutes to show it. Incidentally it may be remarked that the testimony is that the plaintiff was leaving San Diego that evening to see the insurance commissioner and wished a certified copy of the minutes to exhibit to him.

At the same time two checks were drawn, one by the company to the plaintiff for $17,500, and the other by the plaintiff to the company for the same amount, and both were handed to the treasurer of the company, who retained them thereafter. The plaintiff was also given a receipt for $17,500 specifying that it was in full payment for 175 shares; the certificate therefor to be delivered to the plaintiff as soon as the certificate book should be received from the press. This receipt was prepared by the attorney for the company under the direction of the plaintiff, and the attorney testifies that he objected to including the provision for the delivery of the certificate to the plaintiff without any apparent limitation or condition, and that the plaintiff insisted on the receipt reading as it was finally signed, and stated he wished it to show to the insurance commissioner.

Subsequently, under date of October 25th, the certificate was made out and delivered by the secretary to the plaintiff. The treasurer testifies that such delivery was without his knowledge and contrary to instructions given the secretary; that upon learning of it he requested the secretary to get the certificate from the plaintiff and the secretary agreed to do so; that later the secretary refused to ask the plaintiff for it, and then the treasurer did so himself and was refused; and that he thereupon made a written demand upon the plaintiff without result.

In the meantime the plaintiff had failed to sell the capital stock of the company, and the time for so doing had expired. After this, and shortly after the demand in writing on the plaintiff for the return of the certificate, a meeting of the directors was held at which the plaintiff was present, and at which resolutions were adopted by vote of the three directors who are made defendants in this action, demanding the return of the certificate by the plaintiff, and declaring the shares represented by the certificate to be forfeited because of the failure of the plaintiff to fulfill his contract. The date of this meeting was May 4, 1912. Two days later the resignation of the plaintiff as president was accepted. Later the secretary was instructed to and did cancel the shares on the books of the company, and some months thereafter this action was commenced, the plaintiff relying upon the action of the directors in declaring the stock forfeited and having it canceled upon the company's books as a conversion.

The foregoing are, as we have stated, the facts, either admitted or as shown by the evidence, on behalf of the defendants. On the other hand, the position of the plaintiff and the evidence on his behalf are that the arrangement of October 11, 1911, was not as testified to on behalf of the defendants, in this, that his ownership of the 175 shares was not to be conditional upon his performing services called for by his original contract, but the original contract was cancelled in toto, and he was to own the shares unconditionally.

[3] From what we have already said concerning the pleadings in the discussion of the special demurrer to the answers, it is apparent that the issue presented by the pleadings is the same as that presented by the evidence, namely: Was it or was it not a part of the arrangement of October 11th that the plaintiff was to have his stock only upon his performance of the services specified in his original contract? This being the issue, the court found, in brief, that the plaintiff was the owner of the shares on May 4, 1912, the date of the alleged conversion; that, however, he was not entitled to possession of the certificate and had wrongfully obtained such possession; that by the agreement of October 11, 1911, under which he acquired the shares, he had agreed to deposit the certificate with the treasurer of the company as security for the performance by him of an obligation to sell all of the company's stock and complete its organization by January 23, 1912, which he had not done; and that the defendants had not converted the plaintiff's stock by the resolutions declaring it forfeited and by its cancellation on the company's books.

These findings are attacked by the plaintiff as not supported by the evidence, and it is plain from the foregoing statement of the issue presented and the evidence with relation to it that they are not. The court evidently believed the testimony of the defendants as to the arrangement of October 11th, but there is nothing in that testimony to justify the conclusion that the plaintiff was the owner of the stock and that it was to be deposited with the treasurer of the company as security—that is, pledged. The testimony was to the effect that the plaintiff was not to have the stock unless he performed his obligations under the agreement of October 11th; in other words, that his ownership was conditional upon his performance. It makes no difference whether the condition to which his ownership was subject was one precedent or subsequent. In either case, if the defendants' testimony is true and there was a condition, that condition had been broken on May 4, 1912, the date of the alleged conversion, and the plaintiff was not the owner of the stock and had lost all right to it. This is a very different thing from the plaintiff being the owner, but having pledged his stock as security, and the rights of the parties in the one case are substantially different from what they would be in the other.

On the other hand, according to the evidence for the plaintiff, he was the absolute owner of the stock free of any condition or pledge. On the evidence there are but two alternatives in the case, depending on whether the story of the plaintiff or that of the defendants is believed. One is that the plaintiff was at the time of the alleged conversion the absolute owner of the stock; the other is that at that time he had no right to it whatever. Neither alternative is found, but something quite different, and the result is that the finding is not responsive to the issue presented by the pleadings and the evidence, and is not supported by the latter, and the judgment must be reversed for a new trial.

[4] On the trial a question of evidence arose which was the subject of contention throughout and has been discussed at some length before us. It is certain to arise again on a second trial, and we deem it expedient to determine it now. For the purpose presumably of showing the plaintiff's ownership of the stock, there was introduced on his behalf the minutes of the meeting of October 11, 1911, the stock certificate in favor of the plaintiff, and the receipt of the company for $17,500 in payment for the stock. To the defendants' counter testimony to the effect that the minutes did not show the whole transaction and understanding and that the stock was to be the plaintiff's only upon certain conditions, the plaintiff interposed an objection on the ground that such testimony was incompetent under the "parol evidence" rule as varying the terms of a written instrument.

The rule forbidding the varying of the terms of a written instrument is based fundamentally upon the hypothesis that the writing or set of writings is one which the parties have agreed upon as being the final and complete expression of their understanding, that, as Prof. Wigmore and others put it, there has been an integration. Wigmore on Evidence, §§ 2401, 2425, 2429. With respect to the agreement of October 11, 1911, no writings of this character appear in the present case. The first writing is the minutes of the directors' meeting of October 11, 1911, which set forth the purported sale of the shares to the plaintiff, but contain no mention of there being any condition attached to the plaintiff's right to them. Plaintiff's counsel contend that testimony showing that something took place at the meeting other than as shown by the minutes is not admissible under the "parol evidence" rule. But minutes of a meeting are not a written instrument. Their function is merely to act as a written record of what took place at the meeting. That record may be true or it may not be, and in the absence of the element of estoppel, as where a party has acted in justifiable reliance upon the minutes, it is permitted to the corporation or to any one else to show what actually did take place at the meeting. Gilson, etc., Co. v. Gilson, 51 Cal. 341; Boggs v. Lakeport, etc., Ass'n, 111 Cal. 354, 43 Pac. 1106; 7 R. C. L. § 126. In the present case there is no element of estoppel, and it was permissible for the defendants to show the full transaction, although but a part of it appeared in the minutes.

[5] It may possibly be worth while to point out that testimony showing that the minutes are not a full or true record of what took place at the meeting is not the same as testimony as to the contents of the minutes. Testimony of the latter sort is not competent, not, however, because it comes within the "parol evidence" rule, but because it is an endeavor to prove the contents of a writing by evidence other than the writing itself; in other words, because the testimony comes within the "best evidence" rule, a rule applicable to proving the contents of any writing, no matter what its character. Of this sort was the testimony held incompetent in Barrell v. Lakeview Land Co., 122 Cal. 129, 54 Pac. 594, and Spangenburg v. Nesbitt, 22 Cal. App. 274, 134 Pac. 343, cited by plaintiff's counsel.

[6] Plaintiff's counsel also cite in support of their position decisions such as San Pedro Lumber Co. v. Reynolds, 121 Cal. 74, 53 Pac. 410, holding that the books of a corporation, including its minute book, are competent evidence against it as admissions. Such evidence is, of course, admissible and is entitled to weight, but that is very different from making it conclusive so as to preclude any showing supplementing or countering it.

[7] The second writing is the written proposal of the plaintiff submitted to and accepted by the meeting of October 11, 1911. But when a proposal, even one in writing, is made and accepted, it is permissible to show that it was accepted with conditions or qualifications, or that accompanying the acceptance and in reality forming part of it terms in addition to those set forth in the proposal were exacted by the acceptor. Because of the fact that the writing is a proposal merely, something more must be shown before it can be considered that there is a contract. That something is an acceptance, and the acceptance is just as much a part of the contract as the proposal, and anything which is a part of the acceptance may be shown, even though the proposal be in writing and the acceptance be not. So far as the "parol evidence" rule goes, the essential distinction between a writing which purports to be a proposal merely and one which purports to be the contract of the parties is that the first does not purport to be the written memorial of both parties as to their understanding, and the second does, with the necessary result that in the latter case, but not in the former, the writing and nothing else is to be taken as expressing the contract. It follows that in the present case it was permitted to the defendants to show that their acceptance of the plaintiff's written proposal was conditional upon the plaintiff agreeing, or contained as a part of it that he should agree, that the 175 shares, a certificate for which was to be issued in his name, should be his only conditionally.

[8, 9] The third writing is the receipt of the company for $17,500 in payment for the shares, which specifies that the certificate is to be delivered immediately upon the certificate book coming from the press. Writings which are receipts, but which also contain contractual terms, have been held to be written contracts, not to be altered or added to, where either they purport to be, or the evidence shows that they are, the written memorial of the full understanding between the parties. Of this character is usually a bill of lading issued by a carrier acknowledging the receipt of the goods to be transported and specifying the terms of the transportation. But, unless the receipt appears to be of this character, the "parol evidence" rule has no application to it. So far as contractual terms are concerned, the receipt in the present case purports only to require the issuance of the certificate for the shares as soon as a certificate book was had. No presumption can arise from this that the receipt was intended to cover the entire understanding or in particular that there was no understanding as to what should be done with the certificate when issued. In fact, the evidence for the plaintiff himself shows that the receipt did not cover the entire understanding; for according to that evidence, the understanding included as well the cancellation of the plaintiff's original contract and of the certificate for 200 shares theretofore made out and deposited with the treasurer of the company. It follows that the evidence introduced by the defendants to show that there were conditions or terms upon which the plaintiff was to have the stock was properly admitted.

The only other point presented to which reference need be made is as to whether the acts of the defendants in declaring the plaintiff's stock forfeited and having it canceled on the books of the company amounted to a conversion, when according to the findings the stock was pledged to the company as security and the plaintiff had not performed the obligations for which it was so pledged. Inasmuch as there was in fact no pledge under any view of the evidence it is not necessary to determine this point. The question whether the acts of the defendants would amount to a conversion if the plaintiff were the owner of the stock free of any pledge or hypothecation is not presented or discussed on this appeal, and as to it we express no opinion.

Judgment reversed.

COLE v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (WADE, Intervener). (L. A. 5761.)

1. Municipal Corporations ⚿926—Bonds—Validity—Rate of Interest.

Where ordinance calling special bond election, pursuant to St. 1915, p. 99, stated amount of principal of indebtedness proposed to be incurred and specified maximum rate of interest at 6 per cent., and voters authorized bonds at the maximum rate, that the council fixed the rate of interest at less than the maximum specified, would not invalidate the bonds, in view of section 14 of said chapter as to provisions of the act being liberally construed.

2. Municipal Corporations ⚿935—Bonds—Validity—Ratification.

Since the legislative body of the city of Los Angeles adopted as the mode and manner of issuing the bonds in question, Act April 20, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 99), and regularly pursued the statute, with reference to the fixing of interest in election notices, and the bonds were ratified by both the state Legislature and the city council, the judgment of the trial court, refusing to enjoin issuance of the bonds, was correct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Seward Cole against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff and C. H. Wade, intervener, appeal. Affirmed.

John Dennison, of Los Angeles, for appellant Cole.

Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for appellant Wade.

Albert Lee Stephens, W. B. Mathews, Ray C. Eberhard, Lewis E. Whitehead, and Wm. B. Himrod, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff, a taxpayer, owning property within municipal improvement district No. 1 of the city of Los Angeles, brings this action against the city of Los Angeles, its mayor, the members of the city council, the city clerk, and city treasurer, to enjoin a bond issue of $1,020,000, in pursuance of an election held by the citizens of said district authorized by an ordinance of said city. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendants, from which plaintiff appeals, relying upon two points:

"First, that the ordinance calling the election failed to comply with the statute authorizing the creation of municipal improvement districts;" and, second, that "the statute of 1915 under which the bonds were issued is not applicable to the city of Los Angeles."

The statute under which the bond election was held was enacted in 1915. Stats. 1915, c. 79, pp. 99–102. Section 5 of that act provides, among other things, that—

"The ordinance or resolution calling such election, shall also recite * * * the nature of the improvement work or public utility, contemplated thereby, the estimated cost thereof, the amount of the principal of the indebtedness to be incurred therefor and the rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness. * * * The maximum rate of interest to be paid on such indebtedness shall be six per centum per annum, payable semiannually."

The ordinance of the city (No. 34860, New Series) calling the special election under said statute recites in section 3 thereof:

"That the estimated cost of such proposed improvement is $1,020,000; that the amount of the principal of the indebtedness proposed to be incurred is the sum of $1,020,000, and the maximum rate of interest to be paid on said indebtedness shall be six per centum (6%) payable semiannually."

[1] The point raised is that this provision of the ordinance fails to comply with the requirement of the statute that the ordinance calling the election shall recite "the rate of interest to be paid on such indebtedness." A similar situation was presented to the Supreme Court of Florida in Hillsborough Co. v. Henderson, 45 Fla. 356, 33 South. 997. By the law there referred to it was required that the resolution "shall determine the rate of interest to be paid on the bonds. The resolution submitted provides for bonds 'bearing interest at a rate of not more than four per centum per annum, with interest payable semiannually.'" That court, in passing on the question involved, said:

> "Is the provision that the interest shall not exceed a certain rate a compliance with the requirement that the rate shall be determined? To determine is defined as meaning 'to ascertain definitely' or 'to settle,' and it is in this sense that the word is used in the statute. A provision which leaves for future determination the precise rate of the interest to be paid, merely limiting the range of the discretion to be exercised by those who shall ultimately fix it, cannot be said to determine the rate."

That statute required the legislative body by its resolution "to determine" the rate of interest, and the decision of the court is based upon the use of the word "determine," while in the law here under consideration the ordinance was required "to recite" the rate of interest to be paid on the indebtedness; the purpose of the recital evidently being to inform the voters with reference to that matter. In a number of recent cases ordinances similar to that here involved were held to be a sufficient compliance with a statute similar to that under consideration. In the case of City of Cheyenne v. State, 17 Wyo. 90, 96 Pac. 244, the statute authorizing the bonded indebtedness required that the proposition submitted to the electors "shall specify the amount of bonds proposed to be issued, the rate of interest and the purpose for which it is proposed to issue the bonds." The proposition as submitted to the electors stated that the bonds, if voted, should "bear interest at a rate not exceeding 5 per cent. per annum." Upon a suit to compel the issuance and delivery of the bonds upon a bid therefor, which had been accepted by the city, it was held that the form of the proposition submitted was authorized by the statute. The court there said, among other things:

> "* * * We are unable to understand how any voter could be misled by reason of the rate of interest being specified as not to exceed 5 per cent. per annum. It is impossible to conceive that a voter who voted for the bonds under the proposition as submitted, at least from the view of a taxpayer or citizen, would have voted against them had the proposition been more precise and definite as to the rate by stating it at 5 per cent. per annum, leaving no discretion in the city authorities with reference to the rate. * * * At least the voters approved the proposition, indicating that the bonds might bear interest at 5 per cent. per annum, and this rate is within the statutory limit. It was subsequently provided that the bonds shall bear that rate of interest, and we think the statute should not be given such a literal or technical construction as would render the approval of the bonds otherwise regular inoperative upon the ground suggested."

To the same effect is the decision in Town of Lumberton v. John Nuveen Co., 144 N. C. 303, 56 S. E. 940. In a number of late cases, upon an analogous point, it has also been held that the specification of a maximum amount of bond issue is a sufficient compliance with the statute requiring that the amount of bonds proposed to be issued shall be stated. City of Oswego v. Davis, 97 Kan. 371, 154 Pac. 1124; Arbuckle v. McKinney (Ky.) 97 S. W. 408; Fishblatt v. Atlantic City, 78 N. J. Law, 134, 73 Atl. 125.

Appellant relies upon the case of Skinner v. City of Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 40 Pac. 742, 29 L. R. A. 512. That case, so far as it affects the question involved herein, merely held that the city council, having fixed the rate of 4 per cent. interest payable annually, and stated that rate in the election notice, could not thereafter make said interest payable semiannually, thereby in effect increasing the rate of interest. In other words, the effect of that decision was that the city council, having presented to the voters the proposition of issuing bonds at 4 per cent. annual interest, could not thereafter, in disregard of the proposition authorized by the electors, change the rate of interest; while in the case at bar there is no such question involved, for the reason that the statement contained in the election notice fixed 6 per cent. as the maximum rate of interest, thus giving notice that the city council would thereafter fix that or a less rate of interest. In the case of Skinner v. Santa Rosa, the council attempted to issue bonds at a higher rate of interest than was authorized by the people, and in the case at bar the council have fixed a less rate of interest than the maximum authorized by the people.

The case of Hollywood Union High School District v. Keyes, 12 Cal. App. 172, 107 Pac. 129, is also relied upon by appellant. In that case the statute under consideration was construed by the court of appeals to require that the notice of election should state whether the interest was payable annually or semiannually. The notice involved in that case did not specify whether the interest should be annual or semiannual, and hence it was held that it did not comply with the statute authorizing the holding of the election.

The statute authorizing the issuance of the bonds in question in this case contained the following section:

> "Sec. 14. The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed to effect the purpose thereof."

The voters of the improvement district have authorized the bonds to the amount of $1,020,000 and have specified as the maximum rate of interest 6 per cent. In pursuance thereof the council have duly fixed the rate of interest at less than the amount authorized, so that the burden imposed upon the taxpayers is less than that which they expressed themselves as willing to incur. It would be a narrow rather than a liberal construction to hold that such a proceeding, altogether to the advantage of the taxpayer who voted the maximum rate, would invalidate the bonds.

The charter of the city of Los Angeles (article 1, § 2, subd. 51) contained the following provision:

> "Sec. 2. The City of Los Angeles, in addition to any other powers now held by, or that may hereafter be granted to it under the Constitution or laws of the state, shall have the right and power: * * *
> "(50) The City of Los Angeles shall have and it is hereby given and it hereby reserves unto itself and the people of the city hereby reserve unto it, and the people of the state of California hereby grant unto it, and said city may hereafter exercise each and every of the powers which a municipal corporation might or could exercise under the Constitution of the state of California." (Italics ours.)

This section was amended in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1691) by the addition of the following grant of powers in a new subdivision (51) as follows, to wit:

> "(51) To make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in this charter."

This charter amendment was made in pursuance of the new provision of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution of California, as amended November 3, 1914, authorizing cities theretofore organized to amend their charters, so as to become empowered thereunder—

> "to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters."

It is contended by appellant that after such amendment the general laws of the Legislature concerning "municipal affairs" did not apply to Los Angeles city. In discussing the effect of this amendment appellant quotes the following statement from Civic Center Ass'n v. Railroad Comm., 175 Cal. 441, 166 Pac. 351:

> "The result is that the city has become independent of general laws upon municipal affairs. Upon such affairs a general law is of no force with respect to Los Angeles. If its charter gives it powers concerning them, it has those powers; if its charter is silent as to any such power, no general law can confer it."

Appellant claims, and respondent concedes, that the creation of the improvement district in question and the issuance of improvement bonds thereof is a "municipal affair," within the meaning of the Constitution. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Pasadena, 161 Cal. 265, 118 Pac. 796.

Appellant therefore contends that the statute in question—

> "no longer has any force or effect with respect to Los Angeles, and that all proceedings subsequent to the ratification of the charter with respect to the issuance of said bonds was void."

This would only include ordinances numbered 37960 and 37961, New Series, adopted February 27, 1918. By the former all unissued bonds for this improvement were canceled, and by the latter a new issue bearing 5½ per cent, was ordered sold.

For the same reason it is claimed by appellant that the general law of May 4, 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 229) is ineffective, although its terms are sufficiently broad to ratify the bonds in question.

If the effect of the amendment to the charter (section 2, subd. 51) is to make the municipality thereafter independent of the state Legislature in its municipal affairs and vests in the legislative body of the city the supreme and plenary legislative power on the subject of municipal affairs within the limits of the municipality (a question we do not need to determine), and if the issuance of the bonds in question is a municipal affair, as is conceded, it follows that the council had authority to fix the terms of the bonds and the conditions of their sale, including the interest they should bear, subject only to constitutional restrictions, and no claim is made that any constitutional provision is violated by the mode and manner in which it is proposed to issue and sell said bonds. However, we do not think that it can be said that the law of 1915 does not apply for the reason that the legislative body of the city in the ordinance establishing the district expressly predicated its right to proceed upon the statute in question. It is recited in said Ordinance No. 34752, New Series:

> "Whereas, a petition was filed in the office of the city clerk of the city of Los Angeles on the 1st day of September, 1916, requesting that proceedings be taken in pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, entitled 'An act to provide for the formation of districts within municipalities for the acquisition or construction of public improvements, works and public utilities, for the issuance, sale and payment of bonds of such districts to meet the cost of such improvements, and for the acquisition or construction of such improvements,' approved April 20, 1915."

And it is provided in section 1:

> "That it is the intention of the council of the city of Los Angeles to call an election * * * for the purpose of submitting to the qualified electors of said district the proposition of authorizing the issuance and sale of bonds of such district in the manner prescribed in said act approved April 20, 1915."

And in Ordinance 34860, calling an election for the issuance of said bonds, it is again recited that a petition has been filed requesting that proceedings be taken under the act in question, and reciting that in pursuance of said petition the council passed its Ordinance 34752—

> "containing the matters prescribed by said act, and declaring the intention of the city council to call an election," etc., "authorizing the issuance and sale of bonds of such district in the manner provided for in said act." (Italics ours.)

In Ordinance 35007, New Series, it is recited:

> "Whereas, in pursuance of an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled [then follows the entire title of the act of 1915 in question] and of Ordinance 34860, New Series, a special election was held in that certain territory; * * * whereas, according to the returns of such election, * * * more than two-thirds of all the voters voting at said election did vote in favor of incurring the bonded indebtedness: * * *" It was ordained as follows: "Sec. 1. That bonds of said municipal improvement district No. 1 of the city of Los Angeles be issued in accordance with an act of the Legislature of the state of California entitled: [Then follows the complete title of the act of April 20, 1915.]"

The ordinance also provides for the form of the bond, in which it is stated:

> "Under and by virtue of an act of the Legislature of the state of California, entitled [then follows the complete title of the act], municipal improvement district No. 1," etc., "promises out of the funds hereinafter described to pay to the bearer," etc.

In Ordinance 37961, adopted after the charter amendment in question (article 1, § 2, subd. 51), the act in question is again referred to by title as the act controlling the matter of the issuance of the bonds in question. The form of the bond therein provided for also refers to the act in question. If the legislative body of the city of Los Angeles is supreme in municipal affairs by virtue of the constitutional and charter provisions above referred to, and if, without affirmative action on the part of the legislative authority of the city, no general law with relation to municipal affairs has any binding effect therein, it is nevertheless true that the legislative body of the city has power to adopt any state law applicable to its municipal affairs, and that in the matter of the issuance of these bonds that was effectually done by the ordinances and proceedings above referred to. Having thus elected in the first instance to proceed under and by virtue of the statute in question, the city was bound to pursue that authority, unless by subsequent legislative act they made proper changes therein.

There is no doubt that failure to correctly state the amount of interest in the notice of election complained of, if it be a defect, could be cured by legislative ratification. City of Redlands v. Brook, 151 Cal. 474, 91 Pac. 150; City of Venice v. Lawrence, 24 Cal. App. 350, 141 Pac. 406; City of Sacramento v. Adams, 171 Cal. 458, 153 Pac. 908; Givens v. County of Hillsborough, 46 Fla. 502, 35 South. 88, 110 Am. St. Rep. 104. But it is contended that the curative act of the Legislature has no application to the city of Los Angeles and to the particular bond issue in question for the reason that it, too, is a general law. The purpose of the law ratifying the bond issue in question was to confirm the proceedings, so as to enable the city to present to the buyers of the bonds in question a duly authorized contract on behalf of the improvement district. It would seem, then, that the act of ratification was not strictly a municipal affair, because it relates to a contract with third persons. If, however, the act of ratifying a bond issue of this sort is a municipal affair, Ordinance No. 37961 of the city of Los Angeles, passed after the charter amendment, authorizing the issuance of bonds in pursuance of the election in question, would constitute such ratification, and if, on the other hand, the ratification is not a municipal affair, a point we need not determine, we have a proper ratification by the state Legislature.

[2] It follows then, that the legislative body of the city of Los Angeles, adopted as the mode and manner of issuing the bonds in question, the act of the Legislature of the state of California, approved April 20, 1915; that such statute was regularly pursued with reference to the fixing of interest in the election notice; that the bonds were ratified both by the state Legislature and the city council, and the judgment of the superior court refusing to enjoin the issuance of the bonds was correct.

In view of the conclusion we have reached, it is unnecessary to pass upon the claim of respondent that a previous judgment between a taxpayer and the officials of the respondent city, refusing to enjoin the issuance of these bonds, is res adjudicata.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LENNON, J.; MELVIN, J.

SHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, and generally in the opinion of Justice WILBUR. But with regard to his discussion of the effect of the charter amendment of 1917, adding subdivision 51 to section 2 (Stats. 1917, p. 1691), making the city independent of general laws relating to municipal affairs, I think that all that need be said is that it did not purport to be and is not retroactive upon things already accomplished under a general law; that it took conditions as they were at the time, and did not invalidate improvement districts already formed, nor elections already held for the issuance of bonds by such districts, under such a law, nor revoke the authority given at such election, nor ordinances already adopted in pursuance thereof. With regard to the subsequent ordinance increasing the rate of interest on the bonds unissued, and directing a cancellation and reissue in order to effect the alteration, it appears to be fully authorized by the extraordinarily comprehensive and complete grant of municipal powers to the city, embraced in the amendment of 1913, quoted in the opinion of Justice WILBUR adding subdivision 50 to section 2 of the charter (Stats. 1913, p. 1636), if any further authority was needed than would be implied from the fact that the prior proceedings stood unaffected and were valid.

COLEMAN v. LOS ANGELES COUNTY.

1. Equity 🔑415 — Judgment 🔑231 — "Decree."

A "decree" is the judicial decision of a litigated case by a court of equity, the word "judgment" applying to courts of law, and "decree" to courts of equity, though the former term is used in a larger sense to include both.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Decree; Judgment.]

2. Action 🔑22 — Definition — Legal and Equitable Scope of Term.

The term "action" is alone sufficient to include both forms, legal and equitable, of civil remedies, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 22.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Action.]

3. Words and Phrases—"Law."

The term "law" in its broad sense includes equity.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Law.]

4. Taxation 🔑821(2) — Invalid Title — Refund to Purchaser—County's Liability.

In view of prior rights and remedies of purchaser of land sold for taxes, and general scheme of legislation concerning such sales, as provided by Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1913, p. 560, whenever a purchaser's title is adjudged to be void, the purchaser being entitled to be reimbursed by the property owner in the full amount of taxes, penalties, and costs paid out and expended by him, the amount to be paid by the county is the difference between the taxes, etc., paid by and to the purchaser and the amount bid by the purchaser at the sale.

5. Taxation 🔑319(2) — Presumption of Official Duty—Validity of Assessments.

In the absence of evidence or allegation, the presumption is that assessments and tax levies included in the amount required to be paid by the purchaser at a tax sale at the time of purchase were valid.

6. Taxation 🔑821(2) — Invalid Title — Reimbursement of Purchaser—Rights of County.

Under Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1913, p. 560, the amount to be paid by the county to a purchaser of land for taxes who has been unable to maintain his title in litigation is fixed by the law, not by the decree in the litigation between the owner and the purchaser at the tax sale, a litigation to which the county is not a party, so that the decision of the court as to the amount payable from the property owner to the purchaser is not conclusive on the county.

7. Taxation 🔑821(4) — Invalid Sale — Refund by County.

The purchaser of land for taxes, who is unable to maintain his title against the owner in litigation, must either waive his right to appeal, or the time for appeal must expire, or an appeal, if taken, must be determined, before the purchaser can claim any refund from the county, under Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1913, p. 560.

8. Counties 🔑213—Invalid Tax Sale—Refund—Claim Against County—Necessity of Presentation Before Action.

Under Pol. Code, § 3898, subd. 5, as amended by St. 1913, p. 560, and section 3804, claim against a county by a purchaser of land for taxes, whose title has been held invalid for refund pursuant to subdivision 5 of section 3898, was a necessary prerequisite to filing of a complaint.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Sarah M. Coleman against the County of Los Angeles. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. J. Hill, County Counsel, of Los Angeles, Hugh Gordon, Deputy County Counsel, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. In this action the plaintiff, a purchaser at a sale by the tax collector of Los Angeles county, having been defeated in an action against the owner of the property, seeks to recover from the county the money paid by her to the tax collector as the purchase price thereof. Judgment was rendered against the plaintiff after a general demurrer was sustained to the complaint, and she appeals.

The tax sale was conducted under the provisions of section 3897 of the Political Code. This action is based upon subdivision 5 of section 3898 of the Political Code as amended in 1913 (St. 1913, p. 560), which is as follows:

> "Whenever, in any action at law, it shall be determined by a court that the sale and conveyance provided for in this and the preceding section are void for any reason and that the purchaser from the state may not be finally awarded the property so purchased, no decree of the court shall be given declaring a forfeiture of the property until the former owner, or other party in interest, shall have repaid to the purchaser the full amount of taxes, penalties and costs paid out and expended by him, to be determined by the court, in pursuit of the state's title to the property so sold. The said purchaser may also present a claim against the county, in the manner provided by law, for a refund of the amount paid into the county treasury as the purchase price of such property in excess of the amount for which he may have been reimbursed for taxes, penalties, and costs as herein provided, and such excess shall be refunded in accordance with section 3804 of this Code."

Plaintiff brought an action to quiet title against the owner of the premises, and in that action it was adjudged that the assessment upon which the sale to the state in 1907 was based was void, and that for that reason the purchaser was not entitled to any reimbursements for taxes, penalties, and costs paid out or expended by her. She, therefore, brought this action against the county for the full amount paid by her at the tax sale, to wit, $516.

[1-4] The question involved depends upon the proper construction of subdivision 5, section 3898, and particularly the meaning of the last sentence thereof concerning the amount to be paid by the county.

Appellant contends that as she "did not recover anything from the record owners, the whole amount that she had paid to the state was 'in excess' of any amount that she received, and that the Code should be liberally construed so as to cover, not only a case where the record owner would be compelled to pay taxes lawfully assessed, though otherwise invalid, leaving a balance to be recovered of the state, but also to cover a case where it was impossible for the court to order any amount paid." On the other hand, it is claimed by respondent that the appellant has not brought herself within the meaning of the express provisions of the statute. "It seems conclusive," says the respondent, "that the provision for refund made in this amendment is limited to those cases where particular circumstances existed. First, there must be a decree 'declaring a forfeiture of the property' as against the purchaser at tax sale. Secondly, there shall be a reimbursement by the owner of the amount paid by the said purchaser as taxes, penalties and costs at such sale. * * *" In considering the effect of the Code amendment giving new remedies to the purchaser at a tax sale it is essential to consider the rights and remedies of such purchaser before the enactment of the statute as well as the general scheme of legislation concerning such sales as provided by the amendment of 1913. Previous to this amendment the purchaser at a tax sale had no remedy against the county or state to recover money paid to the county or state at a tax sale. Loomis v. County of Los Angeles, 59 Cal. 456; Brooks v. Tulare County, 117 Cal. 467, 49 Pac. 469; Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492; Moyer v. Wilson, 166 Cal. 261, 135 Pac. 1125. In an equitable action or in a statutory action under section 738, Code of Civil Procedure, brought against the purchaser at the tax sale, if the sale was found to be illegal and void the court required the owner of the property to pay the taxes legally assessed against the property as a condition precedent to declaring the sale void and clearing the owner's title. Holland v. Hotchkiss, 162 Cal. 366, 123 Pac. 258, L. R. A. 1915C, 492. This right, however, did not exist where the purchaser was seeking affirmative relief in the action. As was said in Moyer v. Wilson, supra:

> "Where the purchaser under a sale which is not effective to pass title proceeds against the owner, the latter may stand upon his strict legal rights, and defend his title without tendering payment of any tax."

It was also held that where the assessment itself was void, as well as the sale, that no payment would be required from the owner as a condition precedent to the quieting of his title. In order to determine the proper amount payable by the property owner and by the county to a purchaser, it is also necessary to consider the general scheme for tax sales.

Since 1895 tax sales to individual purchasers for state and county taxes have ceased, all sales being made to the state. For five years the owner is entitled to redeem his property from said sale by paying the original amount of the tax, with penalties and costs, and also all taxes subsequently assessed against the property with penalties. Sales were not made to the state for taxes levied after the first sale. Pol. Code, §§ 3813, 3814. After the deed to the state, upon application and authorization, the property would be sold by the tax collector to the highest bidder for cash. "No bid," however, "shall be received or accepted at such sale for less than the amount of all the taxes levied upon such property and all costs and penalties for every year delinquent as shown upon the delinquent rolls for said years to the date of the execution of the deed to the state, and all expenses accrued to the date of the sale * * * together with interest at seven per cent. per annum from the first day of July following the delinquency in each of said years to the date of the sale hereunder, computed upon the aggregate amount of such delinquent taxes, penalties and costs." Pol. Code, § 3897. It will be observed, then, that the purchaser not only is required to bid an amount sufficient to pay the particular tax for which the original sale was made five years before the deed, but also every subsequent tax. This requirement that the purchaser pay the taxes assessed for each of five years is particularly significant in view of the rule that where the assessment upon which the sale is based is void the owner will not be required to reimburse the purchaser at the tax sale, for that rule is based upon the principle that the owner should not be compelled to pay a void tax in order to secure his property. Where, however, the tax purchaser has paid off valid tax liens upon the property, the purchaser is equitably entitled to reimbursement for such portion of the taxes paid as were justly chargeable upon the property regardless of the fact that the particular tax for which the sale was made was void.

In considering the language of subdivision 5 of section 3898, Political Code, it should also be observed that in the same statute amending that section, section 3771 of the Political Code was also amended (St. 1913, p. 587), so that thereafter, at the end of the five-year period, the property sold to the state five years previously was included in the annual tax collector's sale for delinquent taxes, and this property, instead of being sold or deeded to the state, was sold to private purchasers. This property "which has not been redeemed from the sale made to the state five years previously, shall be sold by the tax collector at public auction to the highest bidder for cash in lawful money of the United States; but no bid shall be accepted at such sale for less than the amount of * * * taxes, penalties and costs due as shown in said advertised list. After such bid has been made and accepted the right of redemption shall cease, except as to the purchaser, who shall have thirty days within which to make redemption as provided in section 3785b of this Code, and if not so redeemed or if no sale is had under the provisions of this paragraph, then said property shall be deeded to the state." Section 3771. It appears, then, that there are two schemes for the sale of property sold to the state five years previously: One, the sale under section 3771 in the ordinary course, by which the purchaser was required to bid sufficient to pay the original tax with penalties, etc., plus whatever amount was necessary in order to make him the highest bidder, and thereby secured a right to redeem the property upon the payment of all taxes subsequently assessed; the other, the scheme under section 3897, by which the purchaser was required to pay, in the first instance, an amount at least sufficient to cover all taxes, etc. Under both of these schemes of sale to individual purchasers the purchaser was required to pay taxes covering the five-year period, with interest, penalties, and costs. In each instance, in order to become the highest bidder, it might be essential that he should pay some amount in excess of such taxes, penalties, and costs. Aside from the possibility, or, we may say, probability, of some defects in the proceedings, as to many of which the deed is made conclusive evidence of regularity, the purchaser secured the absolute fee to the land. The amount of the taxes, penalties, and costs would probably not exceed 7 to 10 per cent. of the value of the property, leaving a margin of 90 per cent. of the value to be bid, depending upon the belief of the purchaser in the validity of the title acquired by him. It is obvious that the amount thus bid would be increased if the purchaser could be assured that if this deed was void he would at least recover the money paid by him. No doubt the amendment in question was adopted to assure the purchaser such reimbursement. The amendment first provides for reimbursement from the property owner, and then provides for a refund from the county treasury of that part of the purchase price "in excess of the amount for which he may have been reimbursed for taxes, penalties and costs" as therein provided. In determining what the "excess" may be, it is important to consider the provisions of the statute with relation to the amount of reimbursement required to be paid by the property owner to the purchaser.

The introductory phrase of the statute "whenever in any action at law" is an apt reference to an action at law as distinguished from an equitable proceeding, but other provisions of the statute are inconsistent with that construction. For instance, the term "decree" is used in referring to decision of the court in the "action at law." "A decree is the judicial decision of a litigated case by a court of equity. * * * It is accurate to use the word 'judgment' as applied to courts of law and 'decree' to courts of equity, although the former term is now used in a larger sense to include both." Bouvier's Law Dic. "The word 'decree' is peculiarly appropriate to those proceedings in which a plaintiff or a defendant is required to do equity as a condition of securing relief." Id., Bishop Eq., § 7. Hence the use of the word "decree" would indicate that in using the phrase "actions at law" the Legislature intended to include equitable suits, as well as the common-law forms of action. The term "action" is alone sufficient to include both forms of civil remedies (section 22, Code Civ. Proc.; Smith v. Richmond, 19 Cal. 476, 481; Lux v. Haggin, 69 Cal. 255, 267, 4 Pac. 919, 10 Pac. 674), and the term "law," of course, in its broad sense includes equity. While the language of the amendment under consideration does not use legal terms with technical accuracy, we are satisfied that the statute was intended to cover every decision of a court in a civil action wherein it is adjudged that the purchaser's title is void, whether at law or in equity, and regardless of whether the purchaser is a plaintiff "in pursuit of the state's title to the property sold" or a defendant in an action brought by the owner. No doubt the phrase "in pursuit of the state's title to the property sold," as contradistinguished from "the amount paid at the tax sale," was used in view of the fact that under the provisions of section 3771 of the Political Code the purchaser at the tax sale was required to pay an added amount to the purchase price to redeem the property from all subsequent taxes before securing a deed. It will be observed, then, that in every instance the purchaser, in whatever form of proceeding the relative rights of the purchaser and the property owner may be litigated, is entitled to be reimbursed by the property owner "the full amount of taxes, penalties and costs paid out and expended by him, to be determined by the court, in pursuit of the state's title to the property so sold." If he thus receives the full amount so expended by him, the amount to be paid by the county would be the difference between the taxes, penalties, and costs paid by and to the purchaser and the amount bid by the purchaser at the time of sale. Under the new scheme for the protection of the purchaser at the tax sale it is evident that the primary purpose of this legislation, so far as the payment by the county is concerned, was to reimburse the purchaser the amount of such excess paid to the county, over and above the taxes justly due it. The Legislature could not have intended that the county should refund taxes justly due it. On the contrary, such taxes were to be paid by the owner to the purchaser.

[5] There remains to be considered the question whether in the event that the purchaser fails to recover judgment against the owner for the taxes, penalties, and costs expended by him, he can recover from the county such portion of the taxes, penalties, and costs as he thus fails to secure from the property owner. The question is of importance in this action as to the repayment of void tax levies, for it is alleged in the complaint that in the action between the purchaser and the property owner it was adjudged that the initial assessment and levy were void, and for that reason the purchaser was refused any relief. This decision was erroneous. Unless all subsequent tax levies paid by her were also void, the purchaser should have been reimbursed by the property owner for all valid tax levies paid by her. In the absence of evidence or allegation the presumption is that the other four assessments and tax levies included in the amount required to be paid by the purchaser at the time of purchase were valid. It cannot be ascertained from the complaint whether these four valid tax levies were less than or in excess of the $516 paid by the purchaser at the tax sale which is now sought to be recovered, for, by a proviso in section 3897, Political Code, not heretofore mentioned in this opinion, upon proper authorization by the board of supervisors, the tax collector could receive a bid for less than the full amount of all taxes, penalties, and costs levied upon the property. So far as appears from anything alleged in the complaint, the property in question may have been offered in accordance with these provisions at a price less than the total amount of taxes, penalties, and costs levied upon the property, and in that event the sum of $516, for all that appears in the complaint, may have been less than the taxes justly due and legally levied upon said property for the four years subsequent to the levy found by the court to be void. In view of that fact, it is unnecessary to determine in this case whether the amount of a void tax paid by a purchaser and not collected from the owner must be repaid to him by the county under the provisions of section 3898, Political Code.

[6] In the foregoing discussion we have assumed, and now hold, that the amount to be paid by the county is fixed by the law, not by the decree in the litigation between the owner and the purchaser at the tax sale. The county is not a party to that litigation. It was no doubt intended that the county should act upon the adjudication of the court so far as the invalidity of the tax sale was concerned, for this is a matter of indifference to the county. But the question as to whether or not the court has therein correctly determined the amount payable from the property owner to the purchaser is one, we think, that is not conclusive upon the county. In other words, we hold that the language of the statute requiring a refund from the county of the portion of the purchase price "in excess of the amount for which he may have been reimbursed for taxes, penalties and costs herein provided" should be read in effect as though the language were "for which it is herein provided that he shall be reimbursed by the property owner," or "for which he should be reimbursed for taxes, penalties and costs as herein provided." That is to say, we think that the statute itself, rather than the decree of court, fixes the amount to be paid by the county and by the property owner.

[7] Respondent also contends that the demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained for the reason that the claim against the county upon which the suit is based was filed before the decree in the action between the purchaser and property owner was entered. It is clear that the right of the purchaser to be reimbursed by the county is predicated upon a formal and final adjudication that the title acquired by him at the tax sale was invalid and void. It follows that the purchaser must either waive his right to appeal, or the time for appeal must expire, or an appeal, if taken, must be determined before the purchaser can claim any refund from the county. It is obvious that under the statute the county should not refund any portion of the money paid by the purchaser until final determination of the right of the purchaser in and to the property in question. For this reason the claim was prematurely filed with the county.

[8] The judgment of the trial court was correct for the reason that the complaint failed to show any "excess" to be refunded by the county within the meaning of the law, and for the further reason that the claim against the county was prematurely filed, and such claim was a necessary prerequisite to the filing of a complaint. Sections 3898, 3804, Pol. Code.

1. Mechanics' Liens ⚷128—Materialmen's Action on Contractor's Bond—Necessity of Plaintiff's Filing Lien Claim.

A contractor's bond as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, creates a direct obligation on the surety's part to pay for materials used in constructing a building, and such section, as well as section 1197, preserves to materialmen a right of action thereon without having first filed a lien claim, notwithstanding section 1187, requiring filing of lien claims for asserting liens.

2. Statutes ⚷225¾—Construction by Court—Subsequent Amendments Using Same Language.

The phrase, "claiming the benefits of this chapter," in Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, having been given a meaning by court construction confining its operation to the benefits of asserting a mechanics' lien and not to other remedies afforded by the chapter, its subsequent continuation in amendments should not be held to have changed its meaning.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the General Electric Company against the American Bonding Company of Baltimore. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Crider, Jr., A. L. Abrahams, and Chas. W. Fricke, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action on a bond given by a contractor to secure payment of claims for labor and material to be furnished in the construction of a building. Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, a corporation that supplied certain materials for use in the building.

The bond in question had at its beginning the following words:

> "This bond is required by section 1183, C. C. P., as amended in 1911, and must be equal to 50 per cent. of the contract price. Bond to laborers, materialmen, etc."

By the terms set forth in the body of the instrument, it is "expressly made to inure to the benefit of any and all persons who perform labor upon or furnish materials to be used in the work described" in the building contract. There is a further provision as follows:

> "Any and all such persons shall have and are given a right of action to recover upon this bond against the said principal and surety, or either of them, in any suit brought to foreclose mechanics' liens, which may be filed by such persons, or any of them, upon the property mentioned in said contract, or in a separate suit brought upon this bond, and may recover in such action or actions, the value of such labor done or materials furnished, or both." (The italics are ours.)

[1] Defendant sets forth in its answer a special defense based upon the failure of respondent to file any claim of lien under the provisions of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure. It was alleged that during the time within which a claim of lien might have been filed a large sum of money was due from the owner to the contractor which could and would have been applied to respondent's claim if the lien had been thus formally asserted. The court sustained a demurrer to this special defense and also on motion ordered it stricken out. These rulings are specified as erroneous. The question for this court to decide, therefore, is whether or not a materialman may sue on a bond, conditioned as is the one which is the basis of this action, without first duly filing a claim of lien.

Appellant insists that this is strictly a statutory bond, and that no liability arises upon it as a common-law obligation. The learned District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District agreed with appellant's view and reversed the judgment upon the authority of Miles v. Baley, 170 Cal. 151, 149 Pac. 45; Hubbard v. Jurian, 35 Cal. App. 757, 170 Pac. 1093; and Crane Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. (App.) 173 Pac. 494.

The first of these cases arose, not under section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, but under an act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, etc., employed upon public work. By the terms of the act it was made the duty of the contractor before entering upon the performance of the work to file the prescribed bond binding the sureties to pay for materials or labor, up to the amount specified therein, in case of the contractor's default "provided such claims shall be filed" as thereafter required.

It appears in Miles v. Baley that the verified statement prescribed by section 2 of the act (St. 1897, p. 201) as a condition precedent to the maintenance of a suit upon the bond had not been filed by the claimant. Therefore the sureties on the bond were held not to be liable. Said section 2, after requiring that the materialman or laborer must file a verified statement of claims within 30 days from the time when the work is completed, provides that "at any time within ninety days after the filing of such claim," the materialman or laborer "may commence an action against the sureties." This is the fundamental and essential difference between Miles v. Baley and the case at bar. In that case the materialman under the plain terms of the statute governing the performance of the public work and the remuneration therefor was required to file his claim before and as a precedent condition to the maintenance of a suit on the bond. The section governing the materialmen in the case at bar (section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure) contains no such restriction. Miles v. Baley therefore is not authority sustaining defendant's theory in the case at bar. Hubbard v. Jurian distinctly holds, however, that only those claimants who have duly perfected their liens within the statutory time are entitled to recover upon the bond given by section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure. Crane Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. (App.) 173 Pac. 494, follows Hubbard v. Jurian without discussion of the principles involved. In Richardson & Fisher Co. v. Chicago Bonding & Surety Co., 35 Cal. App. 650, 170 Pac. 856, decided a few days before Hubbard v. Jurian, the court held that filing of a lien as prescribed by section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, was a prerequisite to a suit on the bond given in accordance with section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure. In Hubbard v. Jurian there were petitions for transfer of the cause to this court and said petitions were denied. Unless, therefore, we are prepared to overrule the three decisions last cited, we must reach the same conclusion at which the learned District Court of Appeal arrived in this case. We are of the opinion that the cited cases were improperly decided so far as they held that a bond like the one before us is incapable of enforcement unless the claimants seeking to bind the sureties have filed their liens within the prescribed time. The rationale of these decisions appears clearly from the following language in the opinion in Hubbard v. Jurian, supra (at page 770 of 35 Cal. App., at page 1098 of 170 Pac.):

> "The bond in suit was executed in response to the requirements of the statute. It is therefore a statutory bond in the strictest sense, and under the familiar and well-settled rule parties claiming the benefit of the obligation of the bond must show a substantial compliance with the conditions of the statute under which the bond was given. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under which the bond was given, is part and parcel of title 4, c. 2, of that Code, which relates exclusively to 'liens of mechanics and others upon real property,' and section 1187 of the same Code and chapter requires that every person claiming the benefits of the provisions of the designated chapter must file a verified lien within the time specified by that section. Obviously, the several Code sections of the chapter in question must be considered and construed together, and when so considered * * * it must be held that the provision of section 1183 that the required bond shall 'in addition to any conditions for the performance of the contract, be also conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials, etc.,' has reference to the 'claims' of lien specified in section 1187 and required to be filed for record within a designated time, and to the 'claims' which the statute further says must be verified by the oath of the claimant or some other person."

We are of the opinion that this construction gives an importance to section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, and limits the rights of materialmen in a manner not contemplated by the Legislature. Section 1197 of the same chapter clearly contemplates suits which may be maintained without the previous filing of liens, for it provides that—

> "Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to impair or affect the right of any person to whom any debt may be due for work done or materials furnished to maintain a personal action to recover said debt against the person liable therefor. * * * But the judgment, if any, obtained by the plaintiff in such personal action shall not be construed to impair or merge any lien held by said plaintiff under this chapter; provided, only, that any money collected on said judgment shall be credited on the amount of such lien in any action brought to enforce the same, in accordance with the provisions of this chapter."

The bond by its terms creates a direct obligation on the part of the surety to pay for materials used in the construction of the building, and the right of action on such bond is preserved by said section 1197 as well as by section 1183.

It can no doubt be persuasively argued that the bond which must "be also conditioned for the payment in full of the claims of all persons performing labor upon or furnishing materials to be used in the work" relates to claims of lien filed within time. But it seems to us that this is a strained interpretation. The mere use of the word "claim," which is as apt a description of the demand of the individual who has filed no claim of lien as it is of one who has filed such claim, is not persuasive.

It is to be noted also that the portion of the section (and of the bond which follows its terms), by which the rights of materialmen are safeguarded, does not use the word "claims," but the bond is made to "inure to the benefit of any and all persons who * * * furnish materials to be used in the work described" in the contract.

But there is another and a very strong reason for rejecting the theory that section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, restricts the terms of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, and makes them applicable only to those persons who have filed liens, and that reason is found in the history of the two sections and in the decisions of this court relating thereto.

Section 1187 was first enacted in 1872. At that time its introductory part was as follows:

> "Every original contractor, within sixty days after completion of his contract, and every person, save the original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, must within thirty days after the completion of any building, improvement, or structure, etc.," file his claim with the county recorder.

Section 1183 provided that persons furnishing labor or materials for the construction of buildings, etc., should have liens upon the buildings for the same, "but the aggregate amount of such liens must not exceed the amount which the owner would be otherwise liable to pay." In 1874 this section was amended by striking out the passage just quoted, the result of which was that the owner was liable for the entire value of labor and materials furnished for his building, regardless of the contract price. Code Amendments 1873–74, p. 409. At the same session section 1187 was amended; but the opening sentence containing the clause "claiming the benefit of this chapter" was not changed, nor was any other material amendment inserted. Section 1183 was again amended in 1880 so as to provide that the lien should not be affected by the fact that no money is due or to become due, on any contract made by the owner with a contractor. Code Amendments 1880, p. 63. In 1885 this court decided that this section was unconstitutional so far as it made the owner liable for more than the contract price.

Thereupon in 1887 (Code Amendments 1887, p. 152), to obviate this difficulty as far as possible, the chapter was revised. Section 1183 was amended so as to provide for written contracts in all cases where the price exceeded $1,000, and such contracts were required to be filed before the beginning of the work. Section 1184 fixed the provisions of the contract so that one-fourth of the price should be payable 35 days after completion and three-fourths in installments at specified times after the beginning of the work. Up to this time the entire chapter had contained no remedy for a laborer or materialman, except by filing a claim of lien and foreclosing the same. It follows that the words "claiming the benefit of this chapter," in section 1187, had no other scope or effect than to require the person who claimed a lien, to file the same within a specified time as there provided. The benefits of the chapter consisted solely in the right to foreclose a lien. In the amendment of 1887, for the first time, an additional remedy was given. Section 1184 provided that a laborer or materialman could at any time give the "stop notice" which has now become familiar and thereby intercept a payment and make the same applicable to his claim.

Notwithstanding this additional remedy, section 1187 was again re-enacted with some amendments; but the opening part thereof remained as before, that every person "claiming the benefit of this chapter" must within the specified time file his claim of lien. Had this provision been given its literal meaning, it would follow that no person could avail himself of the stop notice provided in section 1184 unless he also filed his claim of lien within the time specified in section 1187.

[2] Thereafter, in 1891, the decision in Bates v. Santa Barbara, 90 Cal. 543, 27 Pac. 438, was rendered. It held, first, that no claim of lien could be filed or enforced against a public corporation such as a county or city. The claimants in that case had, however, given the stop notice as provided in section 1184, but, so far as appears in the opinion, had not filed any claims of lien against the county. If section 1187 had been given the effect now claimed for it, such claimants would have been entirely cut off from any rights under the notice by reason of the fact that they had not filed any claims of lien for record. The court, however, declared that their stop notices were good, and that "the right of plaintiffs to recover does not depend upon their right to a lien." This decision was followed in a number of cases soon afterwards—First National Bank v. Perris, etc., Dist., 107 Cal. 55, 40 Pac. 45, Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 24, 56 Pac. 610, and Newport v. Drew, 125 Cal. 589, 58 Pac. 187, in none of which was a claim of lien filed, all sustained the doctrine that the remedy under a stop notice does not depend upon the filing of a claim of lien and that the benefits of the chapter, so far as a stop notice is concerned, could be obtained without such filing. To the same effect, see Long Beach School Dist. v. Lutge, 129 Cal. 413, 62 Pac. 36; Diamond Match Co. v. Silberstein, 165 Cal. 289, 131 Pac. 874; Miles v. Ryan, 172 Cal. 208, 157 Pac. 5; and Stettin v. Wilson, 175 Cal. 426, 166 Pac. 6. The phrase "claiming the benefits of this chapter" was thus given a meaning which confined its operation to the benefits of asserting a lien upon the property and did not extend it to include the benefits of any other remedy afforded by the chapter against the owner. According to familiar principles of statutory construction, this became the settled meaning of the phrase, and its subsequent continuation in future amendments of the same section should not be held to have changed its meaning in any particular.

It follows that the superior court properly sustained the demurrer to the special defense averred in the answer.

TEMESCAL ROCK CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION et al.

MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑388—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—"DEPENDENT"—COMMON-LAW WIFE.

A woman who in good faith lived with an employé as his lawful wife, believing that their marriage license in itself constituted marriage, held entitled to recover for his death, as a "dependent" member of his household within Workmen's Compensation Act 1917, § 14, notwithstanding the 1895 amendment to Civ. Code, § 55, requiring solemnization of marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Dependent.]

In Bank.

Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Dolores Rodriguez, otherwise known as Dolores Lopez, against the Temescal Rock Company, employer, and Ocean Accident & Guaranty Corporation, insurance carrier, to recover compensation for death of Silviano Lopez, employé. Award in favor of claimant, and the employer and insurance carrier apply for writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission and claimant. Award affirmed.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent Commission.

Walter S. Claysor, of Corona, for respondent Dolores Rodriguez.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding to review a judgment of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to Dolores Rodriguez otherwise known as Dolores Lopez, on account of the death of one Silviano Lopez. The death was caused by accidental injuries to Silviano Lopez occurring on July 23, 1918, while he was in the employment of the Temescal Rock Company, which injuries arose out of said employment. The award was made against Ocean Accident & Guaranty Corporation, the insurance carrier of the rock company. It was made to Dolores Rodriguez on the ground that at the time of the accident she was wholly dependent for support upon said Lopez. The sole objection thereto is the claim that upon the evidence and the findings of the commission she was not dependent upon Lopez for support, within the meaning of section 14 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 844).

It is conceded that she was, as a matter of fact, dependent upon him for support and was being supported by him at the time of the injury. The commission found these facts to be true. The claim is that she cannot be classed as a dependent and is not entitled to compensation for the death of Lopez, because she sustained no legal relation to him, either of blood or marriage, at the time, but that she and the decedent were then living and cohabiting together as husband and wife, notwithstanding the fact that they were never married. Upon this question the commission found, upon sufficient evidence, that she and Lopez were ignorant persons, unacquainted with our laws or with the legal requirements of marriage; that on June 5, 1918, they had agreed to intermarry, and in pursuance of such agreement procured from the county clerk of Riverside county a marriage license authorizing their marriage; that they in good faith then believed that said license was sufficient to constitute in itself a lawful marriage; that thereupon they assumed the relation of husband and wife and cohabited together in the same dwelling, holding themselves out as husband and wife, the husband providing for their support until the time of said accident; and that during all that time Dolores Rodriguez believed herself to be the lawful wife of Lopez and continued to be in good faith a member of his household and wholly dependent upon him for her support.

The provisions of section 14, aforesaid, relating to this subject are as follows:

> "(a) The following shall be conclusively presumed to be wholly dependent for support upon a deceased employé:
> "(1) A wife upon a husband with whom she was living at the time of his death, or for whose support such husband was legally liable at the time of his death.
> "(2) [This clause specifies the children who are deemed to be dependent and is not important to the present case.]
> "(b) In all other cases, questions of entire or partial dependency and questions as to who constitute dependents and the extent of their dependency shall be determined in accordance with the fact, as the fact may be at the time of the injury of the employé.
> "(c) No person shall be considered a dependent of any deceased employé unless in good faith a member of the family or household of such employé, or unless such person bears to such employé the relation of husband or wife, child, posthumous child, adopted child or stepchild, father or mother, father-in-law or mother-in-law, grandfather or grandmother, brother or sister, uncle or aunt, brother-in-law or sister-in-law, nephew or niece."

Dolores Rodriguez does not come within the provisions of subdivision 1 of subsection (a). That part of the subsection includes only those who stand in the relation of husband and wife. Its language necessarily implies that the relation must be lawful, and therefore it excludes persons who, though not lawfully married, live together believing themselves to be husband and wife.

Subsection (b), however, clearly empowers the commission to inquire into the actual conditions of dependency and to ascertain whether or not the applicant was in fact dependent upon the decedent for support at the time of the injury, and finding such dependency complete or partial, thereupon to award compensation accordingly. Standing alone, this clause would authorize compensation to any person, regardless of relationship or place of abode. But it is expressly qualified and limited in these particulars by the provisions of subsection (c). The latter attaches two conditions to the powers given by subsection (b). The first one is that the person claiming to be a dependent must be "in good faith a member of the family or household of such employé." The facts found bring Dolores Rodriguez within these conditions. Lopez had a dwelling house and a household, consisting of himself and said Dolores. She was a member of that household. Both the findings and evidence show that she was living there and was such member in the utmost good faith, believing that she was the lawful wife of Lopez. The conditions are fully met by the facts.

The second limitation of subsection (c) applies to dependents of the employé who may not be members of his family, or household, but who are related to him by blood or marriage or by adoption in some one of the degrees there specified. The two classes of limitations are stated in the alternative, being connected by the disjunctive particle "or." The result is that the law does not require that the person found to be actually dependent under subsection (b) shall come within both classes of the limitations specified in subsection (c), but that such person may be awarded compensation if he or she comes within either class. If the applicant is a member of the family or household of such employé in good faith, compensation may be awarded although he or she may not bear any relation by adoption, blood, or marriage to the employé. But if it appears that the applicant bears either of the relations specified in the second part of subsection (c) although not a member of the family or of the household, compensation may be awarded according to the degree of dependency. It is not infrequently the case that a person bearing some one of such relations to another is living apart as a member of a different family or household. The second qualification in subsection (c) was intended to cover persons of this class.

The petitioners argue that to allow compensation to one whose only claim to dependency arises from an illegal cohabitation with the employé, ostensibly as his wife, would be a gross violation of morals and of the express policy of our law, and, furthermore, that one living in such forbidden and criminal relations with another cannot in law be deemed to be acting in good faith as a member of his household. We think there are satisfactory answers to this argument. At common law Dolores Rodriguez, under the facts found, would have been the lawful wife of Lopez. There was a contract of marriage and assumption of the rights, duties, and obligations of the relation, and an actual consummation thereof. Graham v. Bennet, 2 Cal. 506; Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 1, 16 Pac. 345. It was not until after the amendment of 1895 to section 55 of the Civil Code that a solemnization became essential to the validity of a marriage. Norman v. Norman, 121 Cal. 620, 54 Pac. 143, 42 L. R. A. 343, 66 Am. St. Rep. 74. There was nothing essentially or inherently immoral or vicious in the conduct of the parties, if we judge them according to their own understanding and belief. The criminal character of their cohabitation does not come from the fact that they were cohabiting together believing themselves to be husband and wife, although not so, but from the fact that the Legislature, by the statute of 1895, had required an additional ceremony to constitute a legal marriage. Of this statute they were ignorant, and the immorality of their conduct cannot be judged with reference to it except in a case where the validity of the marriage is the essential thing to be determined. It was competent for the Legislature, by a subsequent statute, to make that particular requirement to a valid marriage inapplicable in other cases, such, for instance, as the determination of the question of dependency necessary to authorize compensation to a person injured by the death of an employé. This it has done by the provisions of section 14, with respect to one who at the time of the injury was in good faith a member of the household of the employé. This statute completely takes away, for that purpose, the immorality of parties who in good faith were living together as Lopez and Dolores Rodriguez were living. It also declares a different public policy with reference to such cases and completely removes the objection that it is not sound policy to allow compensation in such a case.

It is true that if the provision is loosely administered it may give rise to great abuses. Persons consciously living in illicit relations may endeavor to take advantage of the situation for their own gain. But for the proper administration of the law in this respect the state depends upon the Industrial Accident Commission. It will, of course, exercise the greatest care to require strict proof of entire good faith in such cases. There is nothing in the evidence in the present case to indicate that there was any ground for a charge of bad faith in the conduct of the parties at and prior to the time of the accident.

The award is affirmed.

SANDERS v. AUSTIN et al. (L. A. 4904.)

1. Explosives 🔑9—Filling Station—Operating Gasoline Pump — Care Required.

In view of the danger of gasoline catching fire if poured out over an automobile, there was negligence of the employé in charge of a filling station to begin pumping gasoline until he was certain that plaintiff was ready to receive it.

2. Damages 🔑188(2) — Evidence of Amount—Sufficiency.

Where no question was raised at the trial as to the value of the automobile in question and plaintiff testified that he had purchased it some months before for $345 and it was stipulated at the trial that it was worth $75 after it was burned, contention that amount of $225 allowed is without support in the evidence cannot be sustained.

3. Evidence 🔑143—Collateral Issues — Importance.

Testimony involving collateral issues will not be permitted, where such inquiry in its probative bearing on the main issue will not be worth the time and necessary complication of issues involved.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by John W. Sanders against A. E. Austin and others, doing business under firm name of Austin, Bryant & Carter, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Salisbury & North, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Oscar E. Winburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action against the owners of an automobile supply station and their employé in charge of such station, one Lawrence, to recover damages for injuries to person and property claimed to have been suffered by the plaintiff through the negligence of Lawrence. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendants appeal. The facts of the matter are:

[1] The plaintiff was the owner of a Ford automobile which he was operating as a jitney bus and ran the car alongside the gasoline pump of the supply station to obtain some gasoline. The gasoline tank on a Ford machine is beneath the front seat, and the plaintiff, standing in the car, was handed the free end of the hose from the pump in order to insert it into the tank. Before the hose was so inserted, and while the plaintiff was holding it with one hand and unscrewing the cap of the tank with the other, the defendant Lawrence started the pump, with the result that the gasoline poured out over the machine, caught fire either from the engine or the lights of the machine, and burned the plaintiff and the machine. There is no dispute as to the foregoing facts. There is a direct conflict in the testimony as to whether or not the plaintiff gave any signal to Lawrence to go ahead with the pumping, plaintiff testifying positively that he did not. It is evident, that, if this testimony is true (and in view of the conflict and the decision of the trial court it must be taken on appeal as true), there was undoubted negligence on the part of Lawrence. The danger of gasoline catching fire is so great that it was very clearly a lack of reasonable care on the part of Lawrence to begin pumping until he was certain that the plaintiff was ready to receive the gasoline.

[2, 3] The only other point in the case is the amount of damages. The court awarded plaintiff $450, $225 of which was allowed on account of injury to the machine. It was stipulated at the trial that the value of the machine, after it was burned, was $75; but defendants object that there is no evidence of its value before it was burned, and that therefore the amount of $225 allowed is without any support in the evidence. There was no direct testimony, as there should have been, as to the condition of the machine or what it was worth at the time it was burned. All that appears is that the plaintiff had some months before paid $345 for it secondhand, and that he was actually using it in his business, from which it must be inferred that it was at least in running condition. It may be that testimony as to what the plaintiff paid for the machine was not competent and that if it had been objected to the objection would have been good. Such objection would have been good, however, not because such testimony was of no probative value, but because, standing alone, it was of slight probative value only, and to make it more than this would involve an inquiry into a collateral question, namely, whether or not the plaintiff had paid too much for the car. The rule is that testimony involving a collateral issue will not be permitted where such inquiry, in its probative bearing on the main issues will not be worth the time and necessary complication of issues involved.

But the testimony being in, it has sufficient probative value in the absence of any counter testimony whatever to sustain the finding of the court (Joost v. Sullivan, 111 Cal. 296, 43 Pac. 896; Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 41, 23 Pac. 200, 25 Pac. 1101), particularly in view of the further circumstances that no question was raised at the trial as to the value of the automobile and it was apparently assumed that the price paid by the plaintiff was not out of the way. In this connection it should be noted that, in effect, the court found the machine, at the time it was burned, to be worth $300, or $45 less than the plaintiff had paid for it.

It is also worthy of note that, in view of the fact that the machine could actually run at the time it was burned, an appraisement of $300 cannot possibly exceed its real value by an amount at all equal to the reasonable expense to the defendants of a new trial. For this reason alone we would be disinclined to grant a new trial merely because of error in fixing the amount of damages.

Judgment affirmed.

RUNDELL v. McDONALD et al. (Civ. 2905.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 12, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 10, 1919.)

1. WILLS 🔑58(1)—CONTRACT TO DEVISE—VALIDITY OF ENFORCEMENT.

A contract to devise, when properly evidenced, is valid, and enforceable in equity, unless superior equities have intervened.

2. FRAUDS, STATUTE OF 🔑148(2)—PLEADING CONTRACT—PRESUMPTION.

The law presumes, under the allegation of due execution of contract, that it was made in compliance with the statute of frauds.

3. WILLS 🔑67—CONTRACT TO DEVISE — ACTION TO DECREE TRUST—COMPLAINT.

Complaint showing conveyance by plaintiff to deceased, his aunt and stepmother, of land, without other consideration than her agreement to return it to him by devise at her death, the making of will so devising it, her only property of value, and disposing of her other property, her subsequent marriage, revoking the will by operation of law, and praying that defendants, her husband and heirs, be declared to hold in trust for plaintiff, and that a conveyance thereof to him be decreed, held to state a cause of action.

4. EVIDENCE 🔑432, 444(4)—PAROL EVIDENCE—CONSIDERATION AND CONDITIONS OF DEED.

Complainant could show that there was no valuable consideration for his deed to testator, and parol evidence was admissible to establish the conditions governing the title under a collateral agreement between the parties.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by Albert M. Rundell against Albert W. McDonald, personally and as administrator of Mary Ann McDonald, deceased. From adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Benjamin F. Thomas, of Santa Barbara, for appellant.

Fred H. Schauer and Francis Price, both of Santa Barbara, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered against plaintiff after general demurrer was sustained to his complaint, without leave to amend.

The only question to consider is the sufficiency of the complaint to state a cause of action. The parties to the appeal are the plaintiff and the defendant McDonald as administrator and in person.

The complaint alleges the following: On the 20th of February, 1912, plaintiff was the owner of a house and lot in Santa Barbara, Cal., of the value of $3,000; on or about that date he entered into an agreement with Mary Ann Rundell, his aunt—who was also his stepmother, the widow of his father—whereby he agreed to convey this house and lot to her in consideration of an agreement on her part that she "would devise by her last will and testament said parcel of land to plaintiff free of any and all conditions and incumbrances on her death." Pursuant to said agreement, and without other consideration, the plaintiff did thereupon grant and transfer the premises to the said Mary Ann Rundell by a deed, a copy of which is attached to the complaint. On the 7th day of May, 1914, said Mary Ann Rundell, in pursuance of said agreement on her part, executed her holographic will whereby she did devise said parcel of land to the plaintiff, a copy of the will being attached as an exhibit to the complaint. On the 6th day of June, 1914, Mary Ann Rundell intermarried with Albert W. McDonald. She died some time prior to October 13, 1915, without having made any further will, or other disposition of her estate, which consisted of nothing of value outside of her interest in this real property, leaving as her heirs her surviving husband, Albert W. McDonald, and the plaintiff Albert M. Rundell, Fred Rundell, and Alice Cotton, children of her deceased sister, and a half-brother, James A. McGee. Letters of administration were issued on her estate to the surviving husband, Albert W. McDonald; it being alleged in the petition therefor that she died intestate. The action was brought against Albert W. McDonald, as administrator, and against Albert W. McDonald, Alice Cotton, Fred Rundell, and James A. McGee in person; plaintiff subsequently dismissing as to the latter three.

Under this state of facts, as more fully pleaded, the plaintiff asks judgment that the defendants hold this real property in trust for plaintiff; that a conveyance thereof to plaintiff be decreed; and that he have such other relief as he may be entitled to under the pleadings.

[1] That a contract of this character, when properly evidenced, is valid and binding and may be enforced by a court of equity unless superior equities have intervened, is not disputed by respondent, and, if it were disputed, is sustained by too great a weight of authorities to be open to discussion. Owens v. McNally, 113 Cal. 444, 45 Pac. 710, 33 L. R. A. 369; Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432; Keefe v. Keefe, 19 Cal. App. 310, 125 Pac. 929; McCabe v. Healy, 138 Cal. 81, 70 Pac. 1008; Rogers v. Schlotterback, 167 Cal. 35, 138 Pac. 728; Monsen v. Monsen, 174 Cal. 97, 162 Pac. 90. The rule as settled in this state is set forth by Mr. Justice Angellotti in Rogers v. Schlotterback, supra, as follows:

> "Suffice it to say if such a contract may fairly be said to be clearly and satisfactorily shown, if it is clear, certain, and definite in its terms, and if specific performance would not be harsh and oppressive and unjust to innocent third parties, * * * the contract even when resting in parol, will be enforced, 'not by ordering a will made, but by regarding the property in the hands of the heirs, devisees, assignees, or representatives of the deceased promisor, as impressed with a trust in favor of the plaintiff, and by compelling the defendant, who must of course belong to some one of these classes of persons, to make such disposition of the property as will carry out the intent of the agreement.'"

[2] On this appeal the question of the statute of frauds is not involved, as it does not appear from the complaint that the contract was not wholly in writing, and no question on this point, or as to the application of subdivision 7 of section 1973, Code of Civil Procedure, was or could be raised by demurrer. The law presumes, under the allegation of due execution, that the contract was made in compliance with the statute of frauds. McMenomy v. Talbot, 84 Cal. 279, 23 Pac. 1099; Alaska Salmon Co. v. Standard Box Co., 158 Cal. 567, 112 Pac. 454.

[3] We have therefore in the pleadings here a statement of facts setting forth a valid and binding agreement to devise this property to the plaintiff, and under conditions which appeal most strongly to every natural sentiment of equity and fair dealing for its enforcement, and which the promisor proceeded to carry out by the execution of a sufficient will for that purpose. It is contended, however, that the will which was executed by Mary Ann Rundell in compliance with her agreement was revoked by operation of law, under the provisions of section 1300 of the Civil Code, upon her marriage to the defendant McDonald, and that at her death the situation of the parties was the same as though she had made no attempt to devise this property. Assuming this to be the fact, does any condition arise from this subsequent marriage, and the presumptive right of her husband to succeed to one-half of her estate, to defeat the equities of the plaintiff in his attempt to enforce this agreement against the heirs? The respondent McDonald contends that these subsequent conditions are a bar to plaintiff's right to enforce his contract, and relies upon the doctrine laid down in Owens v. McNally, supra, and later cases affirming the position of the Supreme Court in that decision, to support this contention.

We believe there are material points of distinction between the respective equities as shown in Owens v. McNally and all the other cases cited to the same point, and those apparent in the case at bar. First, it may be questioned if the existence of a defense of conflicting equities arises on a general demurrer to this complaint. Does the mere fact of the marriage of the promisor since the making of this contract, and that her husband is living and presumptively an heir, establish inequity and unfairness in plaintiff's claim, or should the point be met on issues raised by an answer? Does any presumption exist that McDonald had not, previous to his marriage, notice of the status of this real property, or, in the absence of special demurrer, is the burden upon the plaintiff to allege such notice in his complaint? But passing this question, which is not raised by either of the parties, it may confidently be said that many points of distinction, going to the respective equities, exist between the circumstances involved in Owens v. McNally, supra—which is the strongest case cited in behalf of respondent here—and the facts as pleaded in this complaint.

In the case cited it seems clear that the court refused specific performance of the agreement to make a will in plaintiff's favor because the enforcement of the agreement "would be harsh, oppressive and unjust to innocent third parties." In that case the promisor had, at the time of his death, accumulated an estate of some $20,000 in value, no part of which had been contributed by the plaintiff. As the court, in its opinion, says, there was much "vagueness and uncertainty" as to the services to be rendered by the plaintiff in consideration of the promise to make a will in her favor. Neither the length of time which plaintiff was to spend in living with and caring for the intestate is made certain, nor the kind or character of the services which she was to render. Moreover, "the defendant widow married McNally in ignorance of the contract, and, it appears, continued in ignorance of the contract until after his death. She acquired distinct rights of heirship and succession," and an enforcement of the contract would have deprived her of any share of the estate, entirely irrespective of the value of the services that had been rendered by plaintiff in pursuance of the agreement for a will in her favor. And, finally, the plaintiff had her recourse for just compensation by resort to an action in quantum meruit.

In the case at bar, the plaintiff had, without consideration—or, at best, for a nominal consideration—bestowed upon the promisor the entire property he was to receive back under the will. There is no question as to the precise consideration for the promise, and the entire fulfillment of consideration by plaintiff. He gave to the promisor this specific real estate on the condition that she should return it to him at her death by devise. She promised that he would receive his property back in kind, "free from conditions or incumbrances," thus negativing the presumption that the agreement was made in contemplation of its defeat by her subsequent marriage, if such marriage should occur. It does not appear that the defendant McDonald did not have knowledge of the agreement regarding this property at the time of his marriage with Mary Ann Rundell, and, whatever legal rights to succeed to a part of her estate may have been conferred upon him by marriage, it would never occur to a normal mind that there was anything "harsh, oppressive and unjust" in returning this property to the one who was, by virtue of contract and good conscience, entitled to it, rather than to pass it on, by succession, to a man who is only related to it by marriage. And, finally, it appears that this parcel of land is the only property of value in the estate, and if the plaintiff cannot recover it in this action he is without recourse, even if any other right of action exists.

The distinctions referred to, we believe, are, in themselves, sufficient to remove this case from the limitations upon relief by specific performance recognized in the authorities cited and relied upon by respondent.

But there is another aspect of this appeal which is deserving of attention. A valid agreement to devise this property to plaintiff, as shown by the complaint, was not only entered into but it was executed, so far as it could be, in the lifetime of the promisor by the making of her will devising this property to plaintiff. It is argued by appellant that this will, having been made under a contract for a good and sufficient consideration, was irrevocable by any act of the testator, or even under the provisions of section 1300 of the Civil Code, by operation of law. There is ample authority for the proposition that a devise of real estate, made in pursuance of such a contract as shown here, may be held irrevocable by any direct act of the testator. Page on Contracts, vol. 1, § 19; 40 Cyc. 2117; 1 Jarman on Wills, 18; Hudnall v. Ham, 183 Ill. 486, 56 N. E. 172, 48 L. R. A. 557, 75 Am. St. Rep. 124; Bird v. Pope, 73 Mich. 483, 41 N. W. 514; Baker v. Syfritt, 147 Iowa, 49, 125 N. W. 998; Bolman v. Overall, 80 Ala. 451, 2 South. 624, 60 Am. Rep. 107; Chase v. Stevens, 34 Cal. App. 98, 166 Pac. 1035. In the California case, last cited, it was held that the contract will could not be revoked by testator, and was entitled to probate as against a subsequent will purporting to revoke the former. It seems generally to have been held, however, that a revocation by subsequent marriage operates even against a will made in pursuance of a valid contract supported by valuable consideration paid. None of the decisions in this state relating to revocation by marriage involve the question of contractual obligations (Corker v. Corker, 87 Cal. 643, 25 Pac. 922; Sanders v. Simcich, 65 Cal. 50, 2 Pac. 741; In re Comassi, 107 Cal. 1, 40 Pac. 15, 28 L. R. A. 414); but the reason for the operation of the statute seems to be based upon public policy, which disapproves the determination before marriage of the rights of future husband, wife, or children to participate in the benfits of the testator's estate. It is presumed that a will so made is in contemplation of its annulment in the event of subsequent marriage. We have no doubt of the operation of the statute in the revocation of the will in the case before us, for the reason that it purports to dispose of all of the estate of the testator, and, after devising the land in question here, contains other bequests and a residuary clause which are not affected by the contract with plaintiff, and against which the rights of the surviving husband would doubtless prevail. It is true that there does not appear to be any known property of value affected by the will other than this land, but in its terms the will disposes of other estate. However, it does not follow that the annulment of the writing as a will entirely destroys its operation as a contract. It may be effective as to the statute of frauds, if that question should arise. It may operate as establishing a resulting trust in the property; it may have the effect of an equitable assignment of the title to the real property devised to plaintiff. It was held in Hudnall v. Ham, supra, by the Supreme Court of Illinois, that a will thus executed under contract was revoked by subsequent marriage of the testator, but that it could still be considered, in connection with certain releases by the wife of claim on her husband's estate, as conveying to the beneficiaries an equitable title to the property.

In Lant's Appeal, 95 Pa. 279, 40 Am. Rep. 646, where there had been a parol antenuptial agreement between the affianced couple that the woman could dispose of her estate as she saw fit, it was held that the will so made by the woman was revoked by the subsequent marriage, but that its provisions could be enforced in equity as an antenuptial contract. It is true that the doctrine stated in these cases is coupled with a relinquishment of the equities of the other spouse in the testator's estate; but they go to the extent of holding that, in the absence of such equities, the will, though inoperative as such by reason of marriage subsequent to its execution, has not become ineffective to sustain rights of those claiming under it.

None of the cases that have come to our attention deals with a devise of property the title to which, at the time of the contract, was wholly in the party claiming under the will, and which was transferred to the testator solely on condition that the specific property should be given back under the will.

We can see no reason why such an agreement as this, and the execution of the will in pursuance thereof, does not create a resulting trust under sections 2221 and 2222 of the Civil Code, or why the defendant is not bound in this matter under Civil Code sections 1573 and 2224. The circumstances as pleaded strongly suggest the existence of a confidential relation between the plaintiff and his aunt and stepmother creative of obligations under sections 2216 and 2219 of the Civil Code, but they probably rest more on inference than upon any sufficient allegations of the complaint.

We doubt if the policy of the law which declares the revocation of the will of an unmarried woman by her subsequent marriage was ever intended to apply to a devise of property which was conveyed to her without consideration and upon the express condition that she should return it in kind to the donor at her death. There is no authority before us which holds that the revocation of such a will by operation of law revokes the contract or obligation under which it was made. If this will was extinguished by the marriage of the testator, the law permitted her immediately thereafter to make another just like it, and the obligations of contract and conscience demanded it of her. It is an entirely different condition from that arising on a promise to leave one's own and indefinite estate at death in compensation for an unliquidated obligation for services rendered or to be rendered to the testator. It is a contract fixing a present obligation upon specific property.

[4] There can be no question here of the showing by the complainant that the consideration for this deed was merely nominal, and we are of the opinion that he is entitled to show, under his averment to that effect, that his conveyance to the testator was purely voluntary and without any valuable consideration. The authorities cited by respondent go to the rule that the consideration recited in a deed cannot be disputed so as to destroy the operation of the deed. There is no attempt here to defeat the deed, but merely to establish the conditions governing the title under a collateral contract between the parties, and parol evidence is admissible for such purposes. Coles v. Saulsby, 21 Cal. 47; Brison v. Brison, 75 Cal. 525, 17 Pac. 689, 7 Am. St. Rep. 189; Wiard v. Brown, 59 Cal. 194; Carty v. Connolly, 91 Cal. 18, 27 Pac. 599; Arnold v. Arnold, 137 Cal. 297, 70 Pac. 23; Higgins v. Higgins, 46 Cal. 259.

From either one of the several theories of this case discussed, we are of the opinion that the complaint states a cause of action.

Judgment reversed.

CITY OF FT. BRAGG v. BRANDON.
(Civ. 2765.)

1. Municipal Corporations ⟹225(4)—Property—Sale by Board of Trustees.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 2229, 2234, 2306, and the Municipal Corporation Act, §§ 750, 764, subd. 2, transaction whereby board of trustees of a city, on pretense of selling part of the city's land for valuable consideration, conveyed title in fee to the buyer, and, in lieu of payment of the consideration took back as part of the same transaction a limited conditional title, leaving the buyer the fee in reversion, held void; no title passing to the buyer by the trustees' deed to him, and his deed back conveying none to the city.

2. Quieting Title ⟹44(1) — Burden to Plead and Prove Title—Admission.

In a city's action to quiet title, the city's void deed to defendant, a purported purchaser from the board of trustees, having conveyed nothing to him, his admission of the city's possession, though qualified, put on him the burden to plead and prove title in himself.

3. Quieting Title ⟹44(4)—Proof of Title in Predecessor.

Where both parties to an action to quiet title claimed under the common source of a single deed from a lumber company, plaintiff city directly, and defendant by a void deed to him from plaintiff city, the city was not bound to prove title in its predecessor lumber company, regardless of whether it proved possession or not.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by the City of Ft. Bragg against David Brandon. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Leonard Stone, City Atty., of Fort Bragg (Henry G. Tardy, of Oakland, of counsel), for appellant.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff, city of Ft. Bragg, appeals from a judgment against it in a suit to quiet title.

The respondent contends the city's title was equitable only, and therefore not sufficient to support a suit to quiet title. The appellant contends the deed from the city under which respondent claims was void, and therefore the legal title is still in the municipality.

[1] The board of trustees of the city of Ft. Bragg, incorporated under the Municipal Corporation Act of 1883 (St. 1883, p. 93), and amendments thereto, on April 14, 1908, adopted a resolution to sell the land in controversy for $10,000 gold coin, and to apply the proceeds of the sale to the purchase of a city park. On April 27, 1908, the trustees adopted another resolution reciting the former one and the making of a conveyance under it to the respondent. The second resolution also recited that the president of the board of trustees had received from Brandon the sum of $10,000, and it purported to authorize the president to purchase for use solely as a city park, at a cost not to exceed $10,000, the same land. A deed referring to the incorporation of the city under the Municipal Corporation Act and to the first of the two resolutions, bearing date April 20, 1908, was made to David Brandon, the respondent. The deed also recited the receipt of $10,000 in gold coin paid by Brandon. It was acknowledged on the same day, but not recorded until May 4, 1908. Under date of April 25, 1908, Brandon, by a deed, reciting the payment of $10,000 gold coin to him by the city, purported to convey the property to the municipality upon three conditions: First, that it was to be held without partition or division, to be used permanently as a city park and for no other purpose; second, that the municipality should never give away, sell, or otherwise dispose of the property or any part thereof; and, third, upon breach of either of the other conditions that Brandon, his heirs or assigns, might re-enter and possess his former estate. This deed was acknowledged on April 27, 1908. It was also recorded on May 4, 1908, two minutes after the first deed. Both were recorded at the request of W. G. Jones, who was then the city clerk. It was his duty to keep a record of the treasurer's account. The account failed to show the payment of any money by or to Brandon. Brandon testified he paid no money to the city of Ft. Bragg, but made his promissory note, which was returned to him when the second deed was made. The city clerk testified he never received the note, and the treasurer's account made no mention of it. Brandon further testified the note was given and "they could have got the money on it the next day if they wanted it, but, of course, I want to say here, too, that we had an understanding about this thing that they sold me that." In other words, the trustees had an understanding with Brandon that upon a pretense of selling a part of the trust estate for a valuable consideration, $10,000, they would convey title in fee to him, and in lieu of payment of the consideration, they would immediately take back as a part of the same transaction a limited conditional title, leaving him to the fee in reversion. Counsel for the appellant disclaims any intention of charging bad faith to any of the parties to the transaction. Regardless of their actual intentions, it is elementary that trustees may not give away the subject-matter of their trust, nor can a person who acquires trust property without consideration successfully maintain he has a legal right to the property so acquired. Under the circumstances the making of the note was a mere disguise of the real understanding between Brandon and the board of trustees. Under the Municipal Corporation Act, the board of trustees had no power to dispose of the municipal property except for the benefit of the city. It had power to construct and maintain parks and might have done so without the interposition of Mr. Brandon and without giving him a vested reversionary interest in the city's real property. The exchange of conveyances was entirely to the detriment of the municipality and for the benefit of Mr. Brandon. The members of the board of trustees were trustees in fact and in law as well as in name. They had no power to deal with the property intrusted to them for any purpose unconnected with the trust. Civ. Code, § 2229. Their sole power to convey was limited to the making of a conveyance which should be for the benefit of the city. Municipal Corporation Act, No. 2348, Deering's General Laws 1915, §§ 750 and 764, subd. 2. A violation of section 2229 of the Civil Code, regardless of any ulterior purpose, constituted a legal fraud upon the municipality. Civ. Code, § 2234. As the agent of the municipality the board of trustees had no authority to dispose of its property without consideration. Civ. Code, § 2306. The pretended consideration for the deed to Brandon was never paid to the city, and no warrant or authorization was ever made for the municipality to pay him. The Municipal Corporation Act provides that the treasurer shall pay out money only on properly signed warrants, and that the president shall sign such warrants. The transaction was void. No title passed to Brandon by the first deed, and he conveyed none to the municipality by the second. McCoy v. Briant, 53 Cal. 250; Foxen v. Santa Barbara, 166 Cal. 77, 134 Pac. 1142; Central Transp. Co. v. Pullman's Car Co., 139 U. S. 24, 59, 11 Sup. Ct. 478, 35 L. Ed. 55.

On behalf of the respondent it is argued the plaintiff failed to show title in itself, and therefore it cannot complain of findings under which the defendant's title was quieted. On the trial there was introduced in evidence the record of a deed from the Union Lumber Company to the city of Ft. Bragg, dated in 1894. Counsel for the defendant objected to the admission of this deed in evidence upon the single ground that its acceptance by the city had not been shown. On a statement being made of evidence to be produced to show acceptance, all objection to the deed was withdrawn and counsel for the defendant expressed his satisfaction with the deed. A reading of the entire record leaves no doubt concerning the theory upon which the case was tried and determined. In no way was it suggested in the lower court that Brandon had any rights in the property except those he claimed to have acquired under the deed from the city, and a part of which he undertook to reserve to himself in his reconveyance to the city.

[2, 3] The plaintiff alleged it was, and for 20 years had been, in adverse possession of the land. The suit was commenced in 1917. The defendant denied that the plaintiff's possession had been adverse for 20 years, and alleged "that the plaintiff now is, and ever since the 25th day of April, 1908, has been, the owner and in possession of said real property upon the condition (and not otherwise)" that it should be used for a park, and setting out in terms the conditions contained in the deed from Brandon, dated April 25, 1908. The findings follow substantially the allegations of the answer. The deed from the city to Brandon and the conditional deed from him to the city were introduced on behalf of the municipality. No evidence of any other title in Brandon was introduced on his behalf. As a witness for the city he testified concerning his transaction with the city, and did not suggest that his claims were based upon any other conveyance than that from the city. The admission in the answer of the plaintiff's ownership and possession left open only the legal question of the character of the possession, whether adverse or upon condition, and the determination of this legal question depended upon other facts. The only other facts proved were the deed to Brandon and the deed from Brandon. So far as the record shows, Brandon was a stranger to the title, unless the city's deed to him conveyed title. The deed, being void, conveyed nothing. In such a case the admission of the plaintiff's possession, even though qualified, put the burden on the defendant to plead and prove title in himself. Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 518, 123 Pac. 294. In that case the learned Chief Justice reviewed at length the cases holding that proof of possession is sufficient as against the motion for nonsuit of a defendant who never had any title, but who claimed to have title, to the premises. In this case if a motion for nonsuit had been made at the close of the plaintiff's case upon the sole ground that the city had failed to prove titile in itself, the motion would have been denied, assuming, of course, the invalidity of the transaction between the board of trustees and Brandon. Zilmer v. Gerichten, 111 Cal. 73, 43 Pac. 408; McGovern v. Mowry, 91 Cal. 383, 27 Pac. 746; Scorpion S. M. Co. v. Marsano, 10 Nev. 378. As summarized in the opinion in Davis v. Crump, supra:

> "In Sepulveda v. Sepulveda, 39 Cal. 13, an action to quiet title, it was said that if the plaintiff showed possession she should not have been nonsuited, even if she had attempted to show paper title in herself and had failed, for the deeds read in evidence did not show any title in the respondent, 'and until their title was in some way made to appear, the appellant might rest safely upon the mere fact of her possession * * * and the presumptions arising therefrom in her favor.'"

If a motion for nonsuit in the trial court would have been denied under this rule, the same evidence supports the appeal here, which presents only the question of the illegality of the only deed under which the respondent claimed on the trial of the case. If it be suggested that the attempted legal qualification of the character of the admitted ownership and possession of the plaintiff removes the case from the operation of the rule of Davis v. Crump, still the respondent must fail in his contention regarding plaintiff's proof of title. The only evidence before the court concerning the defendant's title was that contained in the purported deed from the city. From the record, therefore, in legal effect, both parties claimed under the common source of the single deed from the Union Lumber Company, the city directly, and Brandon by the void deed from the city. In such a case the plaintiff was not bound to prove title in the Union Lumber Company, regardless of whether it proved possession or not. Phillips v. Menotti, 167 Cal. 328, 139 Pac. 796. The right of the appellant to be heard in this court may be supported, therefore, upon both and upon either of the grounds, that the attempted qualification of the respondent's admission of ownership and possession presented a question of law, and left the case subject to the rule of Davis v. Crump, supra, and that upon this record the parties claimed under a common grantor, within the rule of Phillips v. Menotti, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

MONTGOMERY et al. v. NEILON, County Clerk, etc. (Civ. 2016.)

1. MANDAMUS 🔑3(2)—ADEQUACY OF OTHER REMEDY—BY APPEAL.

Mandamus will not lie where plaintiff has a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

2. MANDAMUS 🔑43—COMPELLING ENTRY OF DISMISSAL OF ACTION—POWER OF CLERK.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that an action may be dismissed by plaintiff by written request to the clerk before trial, if no counterclaim or affirmative relief is set up by defendant's cross-complaint or answer, the clerk cannot be compelled by mandamus to enter a dismissal of an action on request of plaintiffs, where defendants by their answer and cross-complaints seek affirmative relief and the court has determined that good causes of action were stated in such cross-complaints; the clerk having no authority to pass upon such questions.

3. MANDAMUS 🔑172—COMPELLING DISMISSAL OF ACTION—QUESTIONS DETERMINABLE—SUFFICIENCY OF CROSS-COMPLAINTS.

In mandamus to compel the clerk of the superior court, at the request of plaintiff, to enter a dismissal of an action in which defendants have filed answers and cross-complaints, it is not for the appellate court to pass upon the question of the sufficiency of the cross-complaints to state causes of action; that being a matter for the trial court.

4. PUBLIC LANDS 🔑61(6)—SUPERIOR COURTS—JURISDICTION — CONFLICTING STATE LAND CLAIMS.

Actions begun in superior court involving contests of conflicting claims to the right to buy state lands by the state surveyor general are different than ordinary actions at law; jurisdiction of the superior court therein being special and conferred by Pol. Code, §§ 3414, 3415, and its duty being to proceed and to determine the whole controversy referred to it for decision.

5. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT 🔑19(3)—VOLUNTARY DISMISSAL—GROUND OF OBJECTION—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

In action involving conflicting claims of plaintiffs and defendants to patents for state lands, plaintiffs are not entitled to dismissal of such actions after filing of cross-complaints, where they take the position that neither they nor defendants are entitled to patents to the lands involved, but nevertheless question the right of defendants in such actions thereto, and stand ready to oppose them in their attempt to establish their right.

Petition for writ of mandamus by Don Montgomery and others, against William J. Neilon, County Clerk and ex officio Clerk of the Superior Court for the County of Siskiyou. Order to show cause discharged, and a peremptory writ denied.

Jacob P. Wetzel, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Tapscott & Tapscott, of Yreka, and Arthur W. Bolton and A. E. Bolton, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioners pray for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as ex officio clerk of the superior court in and for the county of Siskiyou, to "file and enter in the clerk's register" the dismissal of each of 12 separate and distinct actions which had been commenced in said court by the petitioners, each in his own right, against Churchill Company, a corporation, and others.

Section 581 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that an action may be dismissed—

"(1) By the plaintiff himself, by written request to the clerk, filed with the papers in the case, at any time before the trial, upon payment of his costs; provided, a counterclaim has not been set up, or affirmative relief sought by the cross-complaint or answer of the defendant."

It appears from the petition that Jacob P. Wetzel was and is the attorney for each of the petitioners in the actions referred to, and acting as such for them, and upon the provisions of the above-named Code section, presented to the clerk the several written requests for dismissal of said actions, but that that official refused and still refuses to file and enter the same in his register.

The petition alleges that the actions referred to were commenced by the petitioners, in the said superior court, on the 12th day of June, 1917, and were based on contests arising in the office of the surveyor general of the state of California involving conflicting claims of the plaintiffs and defendants in said actions to patents for lands embraced and described in the application of one P. A. Dorris to purchase the same, and described in certificate of purchase No. 4185, issued to said Dorris, and which contests were by the surveyor general referred to the superior court of Siskiyou county for adjudication; that the said certificate of purchase issued to said Dorris was by him assigned to Churchill Company. It is alleged that—

> All the complaints filed in said actions "are alike and similar to each other in subject-matter and asking for the same relief"; that the Churchill Company appeared in each and all of said actions and on the 10th day of September, 1918, filed in each action "a document designated as the answer and cross-complaint of defendant Churchill Company," which document is set out and attached to the petition "and hereby referred to and made a part of this petition the same as if set forth in full herein."

It is further stated in the petition that—

> "Over and against the objection of your petitioners herein, through their attorney, Jacob P. Wetzel, made thereto, said action, No. 4581, of Daniel C. Cheney, plaintiff, v. Churchill Company, a corporation, et al., defendants (said Cheney being a plaintiff in one of said actions and one of the petitioners herein), and the other actions which are now pending in said superior court were on the 21st day of February, 1919, set down for trial, to be tried in said superior court on the 12th day of May, 1919."

The petition here shows that the defendants filed in each of said actions an answer and a document termed a cross-complaint. It is not necessary to the decision herein that we should repeat herein in detail the facts alleged in those pleadings of the defendants. It is enough to state that the defendants therein alleged that said P. A. Dorris made and filed in the office of the county surveyor of Siskiyou county an affidavit and application to purchase the lands involved in this controversy; that said Dorris took all the steps required by law for the purchase of said lands; that the county surveyor of Siskiyou county, upon the filing of said affidavit and application, in his office, made and completed a survey, plat, and field notes of said lands described in said application, and thereafter forwarded duplicate copies of the same, together with a certified copy of said application, to the surveyor general; that the surveyor general subsequently approved the said application; that thereafter said Dorris paid the fees required by law by him to be paid for a certificate of purchase therefor, also paid to the treasurer of Siskiyou county 20 per cent. of the principal and the legal interest thereon in advance from the date of approval, as provided by law, and that the surveyor general, as ex officio register of the state land office, on the 4th day of June, 1874, issued to said Dorris a certificate of purchase for the land described "in said plaintiff's complaint and the following described lands," describing same; that said defendant Churchill Company, under and by mesne conveyances and assignments from said Dorris, "is now the owner and holder, and ever since the 14th day of March, 1902, has been the owner and holder of said certificate of purchase," etc.

The prayer of the cross-complaint in each of said actions is for a judgment that plaintiff take nothing by the action; that it be adjudged and decreed by the court that the defendant Churchill Company is the owner and holder of the certificate of purchase issued to said Dorris, as alleged in the cross-complaint; that said certificate is in all respects and for all purposes valid; that said Churchill Company has paid the full purchase price of said lands and interest upon deferred payments, "and has in all respects complied with the law"; that said defendant is entitled to have a patent issued to it by the state of California for the said lands upon surrender by it of said certificate of purchase to the register, etc., and paying the fees required by law for a patent therefor, etc.

The petition here further states that the plaintiffs demurred on general grounds to the cross-complaint in each of the actions and that the court below overruled the demurrer in each instance.

It further appears from the petition here that on the 17th day of June, 1918, and while the actions above referred to were pending in the superior court of Siskiyou county, the Churchill Company petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate directed against Hon. W. S. Kingsbury, as surveyor general and ex officio register of the state land office of the state of California, to compel that officer to issue to said Churchill Company a patent for the land described in certificate No. 4185 and in the application of said Dorris (this certificate being the subject of the contest instituted by said Cheney against the Churchill Company, and one of the actions referred to above); that an alternative writ of mandate was issued by and out of the Supreme Court, commanding the surveyor general to issue a patent in the name of the original applicant, or to show cause, etc.; that the surveyor general answered said petition; that the Churchill Company in said petition to the Supreme Court stated fully all the facts stated in its pleadings in the actions involved herein and upon which they rely in said actions for the relief prayed for by it in said actions; that the Supreme Court, after a hearing of said petition, and on the 24th day of July, 1918, rendered its decision thereon, holding and deciding, upon reasons given in the opinion, that the said certificate of purchase issued to said Dorris by the register of the state land office was and is invalid, and that the Churchill Company did not in said proceeding, upon the facts as stated in the petition therein, establish its right to the relief therein and thereby sought, and therefore discharged the alternative writ or order to show cause.

We have now given enough of the contents of the petition here for the purposes of the decision herein.

The respondent herein answered the petition and in his answer merely sets forth, as we have seen the petition does, that the defendants in each of the actions referred to filed a general demurrer to the cross-complaint and that the court overruled the demurrer.

Although the Supreme Court, in the opinion in the above-mentioned mandate proceeding before it of Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury, 174 Pac. 329, 332, declared that "it should perhaps be said that the rights of the contestants [referring to the actions below] are not foreclosed by our decision herein, which is, of course, based upon the facts stipulated by the parties to this proceeding," the position taken by the petitioners herein is that neither they nor the defendants in the actions pending in the court below are entitled to patents to the lands in question, and that therefore the trial of the contests upon the facts pleaded, either in their complaints or in the answers and cross-complaints of the defendants, could not result legally in the awarding of relief either to the contestants or contestees. This proposition is based upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the case above mentioned (Churchill Co. v. Kingsbury, supra); the petitioners contending that the facts stated in the answers and cross-complaints of the defendants in the actions pending below are identically similar in all vital particulars to the stipulated or agreed statement of facts upon which said decision is founded.

[1] The writ of mandamus will issue only where there is not a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, and unless the facts disclosed by the petition are such as to show that the petitioners for the relief demanded herein have no plain, speedy or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law, we must, of course, discharge the order to show cause.

[2, 3] That the defendants are, by their answers and cross-complaints in the actions referred to, seeking affirmative relief, we do not entertain the slightest doubt. Nor have we any doubt that we are without legal justification for inquiring into the question of the sufficiency of the cross-complaints of the defendants to state causes of action for the relief thereby demanded. The court below passed upon that question on its consideration of the general demurrers interposed by the petitioners to the cross-complaints, and held, by overruling said demurrers, that the defendants have stated good causes of action in their cross-complaints and that therein they ask for affirmative relief. To hold that, under such circumstances, it was the duty of the clerk of the superior court to enter a dismissal of the actions on the request of the plaintiffs therein would, of course, be to hold that the clerk himself is authorized to pass upon the question whether the cross-complaints state causes of action and whether the defendants therein ask for affirmative relief. Indeed, the request by the plaintiffs that the clerk enter dismissals in said actions was in effect asking that ministerial officer to review and overrule the order of the court overruling the demurrers in said actions. The clerk, of course, has no such power or discretion. nor, as above stated, is this court in a proceeding of this character, which involves an extraordinary and summary legal remedy, authorized to pass upon the question of the sufficiency of the cross-complaints to state causes of action. Said pleadings may be wholly deficient in the statement of such facts as would warrant the awarding of the relief therein prayed for, but the remedy in such cases is by appeal. The proposition here, in point of practice, is an important one. If a precedent for the review of such questions in mandamus proceedings, or through the agency of any of the jurisdictional writs, were established, the remedy by appeal would soon become practically obsolete in many cases and the appellate courts flooded with applications for such "short-cut" methods of reviewing questions which ordinarily are reviewable only on appeal. In the present case, the defendants may not be entitled to any relief on the facts they have pleaded. It may be that the court below committed obvious error in overruling the demurrers. It was not for the clerk to say whether such is or is not the case, nor is it for this court to determine that question in this proceeding.

Counsel for the petitioners, however, not only contend, as above stated, that the pleadings of the defendants, for reasons also above stated, utterly fail to state facts entitling them to the relief thereby sought, but further contend that, conceding that said pleadings do state sufficient facts and that thereby the defendants are asking for affirmative relief, such relief is not sought as against the petitioners as plaintiffs in said actions. From this it appears to be the argument that the petitioners are entitled to have their request for dismissal entered by the clerk.

[4] Actions instituted in the superior court on reference of contests of conflicting claims to the right to purchase state lands by the state surveyor general are essentially different in important particulars from ordinary actions at law. "The jurisdiction of the superior court in this class of cases is special, and is conferred by sections 3414 and 3415 of the Political Code, and when invoked it is the duty of the court to proceed and determine the entire controversy referred to it for decision." Perri v. Beaumont, 91 Cal. 30, 27 Pac. 534. And "though the plaintiff had no right to purchase the land, and even if he had not sought to purchase it, he could still contest the right of the defendants to purchase it." Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 175, 15 Pac. 620. "In such a contest each party is an actor, and must allege and prove all the facts essential to entitle him to purchase." Goldberg v. Thompson, 96 Cal. 117, 30 Pac. 1019. As the situation now stands, the defendants in said actions, in asserting their right to purchase the lands involved in the contests, are necessarily opposing or denying the right of the plaintiffs to purchase said lands. Besides, we do not understand it to be the law as to such actions that, because the plaintiff therein desires to abandon the contest, he may dismiss the entire action and thus deprive the defendant, who is, equally with the plaintiff, an actor therein, the right judicially to establish the validity of his claim to a patent. Of course, where there is no question upon the facts that either the contestant or contestee is entitled to a patent, we suppose an abandonment by the one or the other of the contest or the failure of the one or the other to establish his right to a patent would mean that the other party would be entitled to a judgment awarding him the right to purchase and so receive a patent to the land.

[5] In the present case, though, the position of the petitioners is, as seen, that neither they nor the defendants are entitled to patents to the lands in question upon the facts pleaded in the several pleadings of the parties. From this position and the fact that they have asked and insist upon a dismissal of the actions, it is obvious that, while they concede that they are not themselves entitled to patents to the lands involved, they nevertheless question the right of the defendants in said actions thereto, and stand ready to oppose the latter in their attempt to establish such right.

Our conclusion is that the writ herein prayed for should not issue, and, accordingly, the order to show cause heretofore made herein is discharged, and a peremptory writ denied.

1. Street Railroads 🔑24(9)—Action on Bond—Construction of Street Railroad—Failure of Consideration.

Where a surety company gave a bond to a municipality to cover the construction of a street railroad by a corporation, but the franchise never became operative because the Railroad Commission refused its approval, which was a condition precedent to the granting of the franchise, the surety was not liable; the franchise never having vested in the railroad.

2. Principal and Surety 🔑7—Validity of Contract—Failure of Consideration.

Where a bond is given for the performance of a contract, and the latter is not binding upon the parties for any reason, there is no consideration for the bond, and no action, therefore, can be maintained on it.

3. Street Railroads 🔑61(5)—Forfeiture of Franchise — Self-Executing Provisions in Ordinance.

Where a municipal ordinance granting a street railroad franchise provided that the franchise "shall be forfeited" if a certificate of approval were not obtained from the Railroad Commission within four months, the provision was self-executing, and on failure to obtain the certificate of approval no judgment of the state was required to forfeit the franchise.

4. Street Railroads 🔑24(9) — Liability on Bonds—Conditions.

Where a municipality granted a street railroad franchise on condition that a certificate of approval be given by the Railroad Commission within four months, and the railroad commenced work before such permit had been obtained, a surety on a bond given to the municipality for the construction of the road was not thereby answerable as for a breach of the bond when the franchise was forfeited by failure to obtain the certificate of approval; the surety's obligation being conditional on the issuance thereof.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by the Town of Mill Valley against the National Surety Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. C. Symonds, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to recover upon a bond given by respondent, as surety, to secure the performance by the Marin County Electric Railways of the terms and conditions of a certain franchise granted to it by the town of Mill Valley. In the lower court judgment went in favor of defendant, and this is an appeal from such judgment.

The main point relied on for a reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings.

The facts of the case are brief, and may be stated as follows: The Marin County Electric Railways, a corporation, was granted by ordinance a franchise to construct a street railroad in Mill Valley upon certain conditions, and the defendant became surety for such company for the faithful performance of this obligation. By the terms of the ordinance granting the franchise it was to be operative only in the event that the Railroad Commission within four months thereafter issued its certificate of approval. To meet this condition the railroad presented its application to the Railroad Commission, praying for a certificate of public convenience and necessity, but at no time either within the four months limited in the ordinance or thereafter was such a certificate granted by that board for all or any portion of the road provided for in the franchise; the board simply signifying, over a year thereafter, its willingness to grant its certificate on terms and conditions more onerous and different from those contained in the ordinance granting the franchise. The franchise therefore never became effective, and the road was never constructed. It was defendant's position below, and is here, that the obtaining of the certificate from the Railroad Commission was a condition precedent to the granting of the franchise, and that, as this was not performed, such franchise never vested in the railroad, and there could, therefore, be no breach or failure to perform that would render the defendant liable, for the reason that the consideration had failed.

[1-3] We see no escape from this contention. Where a bond is given for the performance of a contract, and the latter is not binding upon the parties for any reason, there is no consideration for the bond, and no action, therefore, can be maintained on it. 9 Corpus Juris, p. 20. Aside from this rule, by the express language of the ordinance it was provided that, if a certificate of approval from the Railroad Commission was not obtained within four months from the granting of the franchise, it should be forfeited, and that the bond provided for should be null and void. Counsel for appellant seeks to avoid the effect of this provision by claiming that the words "shall be forfeited," as used in the ordinance granting the franchise, did not ipso facto work a forfeiture, but that it required a judgment of the state to accomplish that purpose. There is no merit in the contention. The provision is self-executing. Kaiser Land Co. v. Curry, 155 Cal. 638, 103 Pac. 341.

[4] Nor is there any merit in the claim that the franchise was breached by reason of the fact that the railroad commenced work before the necessary permit had been obtained from the Railroad Commission, and for that reason defendant is answerable on its bond. It is true that the railroad, in anticipation of being granted its certificate, did some minor construction work, but we fail to see how that circumstance can in any manner affect the question here presented. Defendant's obligation was conditional upon the issuance of the necessary certificate to make the franchise effectual. The rights and privileges sought by the railroad which formed the consideration of the obligations undertaken by it were never granted, and there could, therefore, be no violation on its part of the claimed obligation to complete the road, and, this being so, no liability could accrue on a bond given by the railroad for the faithful performance of its contract. Under such circumstances, as the trial court found, the consideration for the bond had failed.

Considering the conclusion we have reached, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the question raised by respondent that it was released from its contract by reason of the fact that plaintiff and the railroad altered the terms of the franchise by granting to each other certain mutual concessions.

BENNETT v. BENNETT et al. (Civ. 2646.)

JURY ⚷14(6, 9)—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY—ACTION TO CANCEL DEED OR TO QUIET TITLE.

An executor's action to declare testator's deeds null and void and require them delivered up and canceled, and to adjudge executor as such to be the owner of such land and bar defendants' interest, right, and title therein, the complaint not stating a cause of action in ejectment, must be regarded as one to set aside a deed or one to quiet title, and is entirely equitable, and plaintiff is not entitled to jury trial, and the court may disregard a verdict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by B. S. K. Bennett, executor of the estate of Mary Kingsford Bennett, deceased, against Nelson D. Bennett and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Holley, of Long Beach, and Levi D. Barr, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. D. Fredericks, Byron C. Hanna, Joseph Musgrove, and Charles W. Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendants. The complaint refers to three deeds made by plaintiff's testator—one made on March 18, 1913, purporting to convey a described lot to defendant Nelson D. Bennett; one made on June 21, 1913, purporting to convey another described lot to defendant Edward D. Bennett; and one made on August 12, 1913, purporting to convey a third described lot to defendant Nelson D. Bennett. It is alleged that each of said deeds was executed while plaintiff's testator, Mary K. Bennett, was insane, feeble, and mentally incompetent to attend to her business affairs, and that at the stated times and while the said Mary K. Bennett was so insane, etc., the defendants unduly influenced her to make said deeds; that the deeds were executed without any consideration therefor. It is further alleged that the deeds were never delivered, but were handed to the defendant Edward D. Bennett by the said Mary K. Bennett, with instructions to take said papers and take care of them for her, for fear something might happen to her; that thereafter, without said deeds ever having been delivered, they were placed on record by the defendants for the purpose of cheating the said Mary K. Bennett and her estate out of said property. It is further alleged that said Mary K. Bennett never intended to part with the title or any part thereof during her lifetime, but intended said deeds to operate as wills or transfers of the property after her death; that "she was insane, feeble in mind, and mentally incompetent, and did not know the difference between a deed and a will, and supposed when she signed said deeds that she was making a disposition of her property in the same way that she would by a will properly executed."

Based upon these allegations, and the alleged facts that on the 18th day of March, 1913, the said Mary K. Bennett was the owner and in possession of said lots, and that she died on the 16th day of October, 1913, and that the plaintiff is the duly qualified executor of her last will and testament, the plaintiff—

> "therefore alleges that the said real estate hereinbefore belonged to the said Mary K. Bennett at the time of her death, and she was the owner and holder thereof in fee simple, and the same is now a part of the estate of the said Mary K. Bennett and now belongs to this plaintiff as executor of the estate."

The prayer is that said deeds each be declared to be null and void and be delivered up and canceled; that it be adjudged that plaintiff, as executor, is the owner of said land, and that the defendants have not any right, title, or interest therein; and that defendants be forever debarred from asserting any right, title, or interest therein.

We have thus carefully set forth the issues, and the only issues, proffered by the complaint, because the appeal rests solely upon the ground that appellant has been deprived of the right to a trial by jury, a right which he cannot maintain unless the action is, in respect to some issue therein, an action at law. The case was tried before a jury, which rendered a general verdict for the plaintiff. The court also submitted to the jury six special interrogatories, of which the jury answered only three. Thereafter the judge who presided at the trial set aside the verdict and made findings of fact and conclusions of law, pursuant to which he caused judgment to be entered in favor of the defendants.

Appellant concedes that in a case in equity a jury acts only in an advisory capacity and its verdict may be disregarded by the court. He contends, however, that the case is one "of mixed law and equity, the proposition of delivery of deeds being purely a law proposition, and one in which the jury has the power to render a verdict"; that therefore, if the court was not satisfied with the verdict, its utmost power was the power to grant a new trial, wherein the plaintiff might again claim the right of trial by jury.

If this had been an action in ejectment, an action wherein the right to possession of real property was the real issue involved, and the delivery or nondelivery of the deeds had been in dispute, we would have an action at law and issues at law upon which the parties would be entitled as of right to a jury trial. But the cause of action stated in the complaint here is entirely of an equitable nature. This is so, whether the action be regarded as one brought to set aside deeds obtained by fraudulent means, or be considered as an ordinary action to quiet title. The allegations concerning delivery of the deeds are no part of any cause of action pleaded by the plaintiff, except as those allegations are incidental to the application made for equitable relief. The complaint does not show that the decedent at the time of her death was in possession, or that plaintiff ever was in possession, or that defendants are in possession of the property or any part thereof, and does not demand possession. It does not state a cause of action in ejectment. The answer raises issues upon the allegations of the complaint concerning the deeds made to defendants, and denies the plaintiff's claim of ownership. It is silent on the subject of possession. The defendants were content to rest on their denials and to demand that the plaintiff take nothing. If the judge had approved the verdict of the jury, the court's judgment would have been and could have been nothing other than a decree in equity. The cause of action relied upon being solely of equitable cognizance, the plaintiff was not entitled to a trial by jury. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 Pac. 147. In such a case the verdict of the jury, when allowed, was subject to the rule that in equity cases such verdict is not binding unless approved by the court. Sweetser v. Dobbins, 65 Cal. 529, 4 Pac. 540; Rockhill v. Parker, 22 Cal. App. 371, 134 Pac. 720.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LOZA. (Cr. 651.)

RAPE ⚿51(7)—ASSAULT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—IDENTITY OF DEFENDANT.

In prosecution for assault with intent to commit rape, involving the issue of the identity of defendant as the person who committed the offense, evidence held to sustain conviction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Porfirio Loza was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and from judgment of imprisonment and from order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Albert D. Trujillo, of San Bernardino, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of assault with intent to commit rape. The appeal is from a judgment of imprisonment and from an order made by the trial court denying to defendant a new trial.

In support of the claim for reversal of the judgment it is contended that the evidence was insufficient to warrant the verdict of the jury, particularly in that the identity of the defendant as being the person who committed the alleged assault was not established. We have carefully examined the transcript of the evidence, and think that sufficient evidence is shown to fully support the verdict. A young girl, about the age of 13 years, was on her way home from school in a country district in the county of Riverside on a day in November, 1918. It was approaching dark, and her way led along an uninhabited road, by the side of which was brush or shrubbery. While passing along this road she was accosted and seized by a Mexican, thrown to the ground, and the rape was attempted. In order to still her cries the assailant beat her in the face so that blood ran, and the child became partially unconscious. However, before the act designed had been accomplished, the assailant, evidently becoming frightened at some noise, left his victim and ran away. Before doing so, however, he had not only beaten the girl, as we have narrated, but, as evidence of his ultimate purpose, had torn her underclothing almost from her body. On the morning following the assault several Mexicans were brought before the little girl, and she identified the appellant as being the man who had assaulted her. His description tallied with the picture of her assailant as it appeared to her mind. However, at the trial she would not swear positively that appellant was the assailant, and it is because of her qualified answers in this regard that counsel now contends that no sufficient identification was shown. Among the statements made in her testimony, the child, when asked if she was positive that the appellant was the man who assaulted her, said:

> "Yes; I am positive of it, but I won't swear to it; I am as positive as possible to be, but I won't swear because I may be mistaken."

When asked as to what had been her state of mind when the man was first brought before her the day after the assault had been committed, regarding his identity, she said:

> "Well, I was certain he was the man when I saw him. Q. Are you still of that opinion? A. I am."

There was the testimony of another school girl who had passed along that road earlier in the afternoon, to the effect that she had been pursued by a Mexican, and that in her opinion the appellant was the man whom she had seen at that time. But this was not all. After the appellant had been arrested and taken to the jail he made statements which, in effect, admitted that he had committed an assault upon the young girl at the time charged. It is argued that these statements were disconnected, indefinite, and not properly interpreted, but an examination of them will show that at least one of the witnesses who heard the statements testified positively that he did hear from the lips of the defendant the direct admission that he had had improper relations with a child. These statements were brought out by inquiry being made of the appellant as to the cause of his arrest. The evidence as to the identity of the defendant was fully as strong as that shown in the case of People v. Delgado, 175 Pac. 24, where the judgment was sustained.

We find no error here sufficient to warrant an order of reversal.

TITLE LAND CO. v. SCHAEFER et al.
(Civ. 2657.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑933(1)—Review—Presumptions—New Trial.

On appeal from order denying new trial, where no affidavits had been filed in support of motion, and where record on appeal fails to show on what ground motion for new trial was made, court will presume that order denying motion was properly made; there being no affirmative showing of error in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subds. 1–4.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑553(1) — Record — Typewritten Form — Compliance with Statute.

On appeal from order denying new trial, where appellants did not avail themselves of Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, providing that appellant, in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions pursuant to section 650, may file notice with clerk requesting transcript to be considered when certified by court in lieu of bill of exceptions, statement in support of motion for new trial, as settled and allowed by court, brought up in typewritten form, was unauthorized in such form and could not be considered.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑553(1)—Record—Typewritten Form—Bill of Exceptions.

Code Civ. Proc. §§ 953a, 953c, authorizing typewritten form of record on appellant's application for transcript to be certified by court and considered in lieu of bill of exceptions, has no application to bill of exceptions or statements settled and allowed by trial judge as provided in section 653.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Action by the Title Land Company against B. G. Schaefer and another. From judgment for plaintiff and from order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles Lantz and W. J. Davis, both of Los Angeles (Howard F. Shepherd, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellants.

John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered by the court in favor of plaintiff, quieting its title to a certain lot of land described in the complaint, and also from an order of court made denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] No argument is made by appellants urging a reversal of the judgment for any error disclosed by the judgment roll. In their brief, however, they insist not only that the evidence is insufficient to support certain findings, but complain of rulings of the court both in admitting and rejecting evidence offered, by reason of which they insist that the court erred in denying their motion for a new trial. No record is presented upon which the court may review the rulings complained of. The motion for new trial was made upon a statement the correctness of which is certified by the judge who tried the case; and while the record shows that defendants' motion for a new trial was by order of the court denied, it fails to show upon what ground the motion for a new trial was made. For aught that appears to the contrary, it may have been made for any one or all of the causes specified in subdivisions 1, 2, 3, and 4 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, in which event such grounds must be made to appear by affidavits, none of which were filed. We must, in the absence of an affirmative showing of error, presume the order denying the motion was properly made.

[2] The statement in support of defendants' motion for a new trial, as settled and allowed by the court, is brought up in typewritten form. No authority or warrant for such procedure exists. Section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that one desiring to appeal may, "in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions pursuant to the provisions of section 650 of this Code," adopt the procedure therein prescribed for obtaining and presenting to the court a phonographic report of the proceedings had and taken at the trial, to the truth of which the judge should certify, and when so settled it shall be deemed a part of the judgment roll and on appeal considered a part of the judgment roll. Section 953c, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that where an appellant, in adopting a procedure for presenting a record for review, avails himself of the provisions of section 953a, such transcript need not be printed, but "in filing briefs on said appeal the parties must, however, print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court."

[3] The provisions of these sections have no application to bills of exception or statements settled and allowed by the trial judge as provided in section 653, Code of Civil Procedure. When such method of bringing up the record is adopted, it must be presented by a printed transcript thereof. It is only in those cases where the appellant avails himself of the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, that he may adopt a typewritten form in bringing up the record. Appellants did not avail themselves of the provisions of this section, but, for the purpose of illustrating the alleged errors committed by the court, procured the settlement of a statement used on their motion for a new trial. The record so presented in typewritten form is unauthorized by the sections of the Code to which we have referred, and hence cannot be considered in support of their appeal from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

There appears to be no error disclosed by the judgment roll, and for the reasons given no authenticated record is presented upon which we can say the trial court erred in denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

1. Appeal and Error ⟹1170(12)—Reversal—Statute Decree—Way of Necessity.

In suit to quiet title, decree quieting plaintiff's title subject to a right of way "of necessity" across it in favor of defendants held not erroneous, in view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, Code Civ. Proc. § 475, Civ. Code, §§ 3533, 3534, 3537, as to disregard of technical error, as giving a right of way of necessity in the absence of claim therefor in the pleadings, where contract right to way was established, and only effect of remand would be to strike out superfluous words "of necessity."

2. Easements ⟹12(3) — Right of Way — Temporary and Uncertain Character.

Temporary easement in the nature of a right of way granted defendants in suit to quiet title over plaintiff's land held not open to attack on account of its temporary character and the claimed uncertain character of the right of way, where contract on which right was based provided that temporary way was to be superseded by a permanent way.

3. Easements ⟹22—Innocent Purchaser—Freedom from Easement.

If a purchaser bought without knowledge of an unrecorded contract granting to prior purchasers of other land a temporary right of way, and also without knowledge, actual or imputed, of facts sufficient to put a prudent buyer on inquiry, she took title free from the use of the right of way in the prior purchasers, and could convey good title to a purchaser from her, though he was fully informed of the prior purchasers' claims.

4. Easements ⟹22—Notice of Right of Way.

The purchaser of land was charged with notice of an easement in the nature of a right of way across it in favor of prior purchasers from her vendor, though she was elsewhere when her purchase was consummated; the way across the land purchased being obvious and noticeable.

5. Easements ⟹22—Subjection to Right of Way.

Where the purchaser of land was charged, on account of the open and visible character of the road, with notice of an easement in the nature of a right of way across the land purchased, on account of the purchaser's failure to obtain information regarding the right of way, the title of the purchaser from her was subject to such right of way.

6. Easements ⟹36(3) — Existence — Sufficiency of Evidence.

In suit to quiet title against defendants setting up an easement in the nature of a right of way, if the burden was on defendants to prove notice to or knowledge of the right of way in plaintiff's grantor when she purchased the land, they met such burden by proof of the patent existence and constant use of the road.

his title to 24½ acres of land in the Claremont district of Berkeley, subject to a right of way across it, adjudged to belong to the respondents E. D. Walden and Virginia E. Walden.

The parties claim from a common source of title. E. E. Hewlett and Ione Fore Hewlett, his wife, the common grantors, acquired title to 27 acres of land, bounded on the north and east sides by a deep canyon with precipitous sides. Between the land and the nearest public roads on those sides intervened the lands of other owners. The land abutted on the south upon the Alvarado road. In 1912 the Hewletts sold to the Waldens 2½ acres in the northeast corner of the 27-acre tract, where the respondents established their home. The only means of access to it was from the Alvarado road over the remaining 24½ acres. Coincident with the conveyance to the Waldens, the grantors and the grantees named in the deed executed an instrument in which they were respectively designated as "first party" and "second party." Its effective words were that—

> "The first party hereby agrees to allow second party, his heirs and assigns, to use a temporary right of way over and across the lands of the first party," that is, the lands in suit, "said temporary right of way being described as follows: [here follows a description by courses and distances from a point on the southern boundary of the tract, to the intersection of the right of way line] with the western side line of that parcel of land conveyed by party of the first ——— to party of the second part by deed of even date herewith. The second party hereby agrees to surrender and relinquish all claim to said temporary right of way immediately upon receipt of written note from first party that said first party has selected and established a permanent right of way over and across his said lands."

It was the right of way so established that was decreed to belong to the respondents.

The broad ground of appellant's attack on the decree rests on the fact that before this right of way agreement was recorded the Hewletts conveyed the 24½ acres to Mrs. Mary A. Huntington without her having actual notice of the contract or knowledge of the existence of the road, and, it is argued, she, therefore, took title free from the easement, and conveyed equally good title to her grantee, Taylor, the appellant, even though he knew of the existence of the agreement at the time he received conveyance from Mrs. Huntington.

At the close of an able and exhaustive brief counsel for the appellant has well summarized his grounds of attack in five propositions, upon which reversal is asked. From a careful examination of the record, and a consideration of the printed and oral arguments of counsel and the authorities relied upon by them, the conclusion has been reached that the judgment must be affirmed. For convenience in stating the grounds of the decision, the appellant's five propositions are discussed in an order differing from that of their presentation.

[1] The appellant's fifth proposition is that the court erred in giving judgment for a right of way of necessity when no such claim was set up in the pleadings. The attack is made upon the fourth paragraph of the decree, in which it is stated the respondents are the owners and in possession of a right of way of necessity, which is described as it was described in the agreement, and that until the selection and establishment by the plaintiff or his successors, as the grantee by mesne conveyances from the Hewletts, of a permanent right of way, the respondents and their successors are entitled to the use of the right of way described. The decree established the respondent's right to use the easement. The facts on which this right depended are to be found either expressly stated or necessarily implied in the findings. If the right to the use exists, the words "of necessity" are superfluous. They neither add to nor detract from the force of the judgment, and are not to be construed in any narrow or technical sense to defeat it. The findings show that the only means of access to the Walden land is a road over the appellant's land, and that as a part of the consideration of the purchase by the respondents the Hewletts, after causing the particular road to be surveyed, executed the agreement by which the right of way was established. Broadly speaking, it is necessary to the use of the Walden land, and in that sense, no doubt, the phrase was used. It was descriptive merely, and the only possible result of a reversal of the judgment on this ground would be to permit a pen to be drawn through the superfluous words. A judgment will not be reversed for a matter of form nor upon a rigid interpretation of an immaterial statement of fact, even though technical error appears. Const. Cal. art. 6, § 4½; Code Civ. Proc. 475; Civ. Code, §§ 3533, 3534, and 3537; Webster v. King, 33 Cal. 348; Stoddart v. Burge, 53 Cal. 395; San Francisco, etc., Ry. Co. v. Leviston, 134 Cal. 415, 66 Pac. 473.

[2] In the appellant's fourth proposition he attacks what is claimed to be the temporary and uncertain character of the right of way, but the argument is based upon the assumption that the right of way was one resting upon implication upon the severance of the Walden land from the main body. If such were the case, the facts on which appellant relies might have controlling force, but as against the definite agreement for a particular right of way, it is immaterial that the respondents in good weather at times made use of an equally well-defined road, described as a little cut-off, a straight up and down road, which branched from the contractual right of way near one end, rejoining it near the other end, and was wholly on the 24½ acres. Neither is it material that there were cattle trails upon the appellant's land. The respondents' right rested on the express contract and not upon either an implication of a technical way of necessity or adverse user. It is argued that an easement must be permanent and not a mere temporary license. The cases cited to support this argument had to do with different conditions. They do not, nor could they, change the ordinary rules of law relating to contract. There is no magic in the use of the word "easement," and a right of way expressly granted for a limited period or upon a contingency or condition is just as firmly vested for the time being as would be a leasehold. It is suggested that, as the Hewletts have parted with title to the 24½ acres, the contingency provided in the contract can never arise. If this were so, under the very terms of the contract the right of way would be permanent and the appellant's contention in that regard would fail. The judgment, however, expressly determines that the appellant and his successors are vested with the same power reserved by the Hewletts to designate another and permanent right of way.

[3, 4] Counsel for the appellant designates his second proposition as a corollary of the first, and because of their close relationship they are considered together. The rule of law asserted on behalf of the appellant is well established. If Mrs. Huntington bought from Hewlett without knowledge of the unrecorded contract, and also without knowledge, actual or imputed to her, of facts sufficient to put a prudent buyer upon inquiry, she took title free from the use, and had the right to convey equally good title to her purchaser, even though he was fully informed of the respondents' claims. Pomeroy's Eq. Jur. (3d Ed.) 754. Under the facts of this case it does not appear that Mrs. Huntington was in a position to rely upon the nonrecordation of the contract because the condition of the land was such as to require her as a prudent purchaser to inform herself regarding the possessory use of the well-defined road. The rule applicable to the facts disclosed by the evidence and incorporated in the findings was that announced and clearly illustrated in a recent opinion written by Mr. Justice Olney, and which met the unanimous concurrence of the members of the Supreme Court:

> "Actual occupancy of the land, possessio pedis, has always been held, in the absence of qualifying circumstances, to be possession of a character sufficient to constitute or establish notice." Randall v. Allen, 180 Pac. 941, May 2, 1919.

Upon this branch of the case the facts are that about a year after the contract for the right of way was executed, Hewlett, then being indebted to Mrs. Huntington to the amount of $250,000 or thereabouts, joined by his wife, conveyed to his creditor the 24½ acres, on an agreed valuation of $21,500 to be set off against his debt. This transaction took place in Los Angeles. Neither Mrs. Huntington nor her son who was representing her caused any examination to be made, either of the title or of the land. At that time the road along the contractual right of way had been graded with plow and scraper to a width of 10 feet, after the brush had been cut out. As found by the court, it follows the meanders of the hills and cuts deeply into the hillsides and into the surface of the land, and at places runs over substantial fills. It was in daily use by the Waldens and persons visiting their premises, as a road for vehicles, pedestrians, and livestock. This road, with the similarly constructed and visible cut-off entirely on the 24½ acres, by reason of the configuration of the land, furnished the only means of access to the Walden house. The road and the house are clearly apparent from a photograph introduced in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff. The appearance of the road showed its purpose was to permit access to Waldens' home; its condition and constant use were facts which no buyer could safely refuse or neglect to observe. A purchaser may not, by failing to acquaint herself with the open and clearly discernible possession and use of the land by another than her prospective vendor, avoid making inquiry on the subject, and thereby evade the rule in regard to notice as well as its consequences. Scheerer v. Cuddy, 85 Cal. 273, 24 Pac. 713. The buyer, in this instance, Mrs. Huntington, was bound to know who was in possession of the property, and is chargeable with notice of the occupants' title. Beattie v. Crewdson, 124 Cal. 579, 57 Pac. 463.

It is argued that this rule does not apply to the present case, because both Mrs. Huntington and her son, Mr. H. E. Huntington, were in Los Angeles, and therefore it was impracticable for them to visit and examine the land. The buyer might readily have had another make the examination for her.

After submission the case was reopened to enable counsel for the appellant to make a tender of additional evidence to the effect that neither Mrs. Huntington nor her son had ever seen the property, that it was impracticable for them to have seen it by reason of their residence in Southern California, and that they had no actual notice of the existence of the road or the physical conformation of the land. Under the rule applicable to such cases, this amounted to an excuse for not observing the rule requiring a prudent buyer to inform herself concerning the rights of third persons openly using the land. Such evidence was immaterial. There was no error in rejecting it.

It was stipulated Mrs. Huntington received the deed from the Hewletts "and the title of the property in good faith and for value." There was no imputation of bad faith on the part of Mrs. Huntington. The whole record shows the only substantial question was whether or not the physical conditions were such as to bring her within the rule of Randall v. Allen and Beattie v. Crewdson. The findings leave no doubt upon that subject, and they are supported by the evidence.

[5] Upon conflicting evidence the court found that before the appellant contracted to purchase from Mrs. Huntington, he had actual knowledge of the existence of the road, the Waldens' use of it, and the fact that the only means of ingress to and egress from the Walden lands was over the lands the appellant subsequently purchased. His contract to purchase was recorded prior to the recordation of the Walden contract, and the deed to the appellant was executed 2½ months after the recordation of the Walden contract. The rights acquired by him under his contract of purchase were in no respect superior to those acquired by Mrs. Huntington. He was charged, as she was, with notice by the physical conditions and the Waldens' use of the right of way. His title is subject to the right of way, not by reason of his own actual knowledge, but by reason of Mrs. Huntington's failure to obtain information regarding facts of which he knew, and of which she ought to have known.

[6] The appellant's third proposition is in regard to the burden of proving notice to or knowledge of Mrs. Huntington. Even if it be assumed the burden was upon Walden, he undertook and carried the burden by proof of the physical conditions, the existence and constant use of the road. It is unnecessary to enter upon a lengthy discussion upon minor points presented by counsel in the argument in support of his five essential propositions. None of them warrants interference with the action of the trial court.

KOHLBERG v. HAVENS. (Civ. 2742.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT 🔑22(1)—AGREEMENT FOR LEASE—COMPLETENESS—ABSENCE OF PROVISION AGAINST SUBLETTING.

An agreement procured by plaintiff as agent for defendant held a complete and valid agreement for a lease, although not containing a provision against subletting.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑931(5)—EVIDENCE—FINDINGS—CONFLICTS IN PLAINTIFF'S TESTIMONY AT DIFFERENT TRIALS — PRESUMPTION.

Where dealings occupied more than one week, plaintiff's failure to recall certain details, four years later to which he had testified shortly after such dealings, should not nullify his entire testimony, and it will be presumed that the trial court weighed such inconsistencies and conflicts against plaintiff, and its finding will be sustained.

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑149(2)—BREACH OF WARRANTY OF AUTHORITY—ACTS CONSTITUTING WARRANTY.

Defendant's assuming to act as agent of a company in securing plaintiff's services constituted a warranty of agency under Civ. Code, § 2342, and the action, being for breach thereof and not one to hold the defendant as a principal under the contract, is not within section 2343.

4. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT 🔑149(2)—BREACH OF WARRANTY OF AGENT'S AUTHORITY—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Plaintiff should recover from defendant for breach of warranty of authority as agent the compensation he would have received from the principal under the contract had defendant been its authorized agent, in view of Civ. Code, § 3318.

5. INTEREST 🔑44—BREACH OF WARRANTY OF AGENCY—DAMAGES.

In view of Civ. Code, § 3287, providing that every person entitled to recover damages certain or capable of being made certain is entitled to interest thereon from the time of vesting of right of recovery, plaintiff is entitled to interest upon damages for breach of warranty of agency from the date of completion of his contracted services in procuring a lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by M. S. Kohlberg against H. Roscoe Havens. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wise & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in a suit to recover damages from the defendant on account of breach of warranty of authority to act as agent. The facts pertinent to a discussion of appellant's contentions are that the plaintiff and H. Roscoe Havens, president of the M. H. Blake Estate Company, entered into a contract some time in April, 1910, whereby the plaintiff was to perform certain services, for which the estate company was to pay $2,500. Later, when plaintiff sued the estate company for payment of this amount, the estate company denied the authority of the defendant to act as its agent in making said contract, and the plaintiff was nonsuited. He then brought the present action against the defendant for breach of warranty of authority. The exact nature of the services to be rendered by the plaintiff is the subject of dispute. The plaintiff claims that he was to secure the signature of Hale Bros. to a certain agreement in writing, which is set out in the findings, and which is an offer to lease to Hale Bros. certain real property belonging to the estate company, and particularly described therein, at a specified monthly rental, with an agreement on the part of the estate company to place improvements of the value of $20,000 upon the property, and also embodying other details relating to the respective obligations and rights of the parties.

[1] The defendant contends that the contract was that the plaintiff should not only secure the signature of Hale Bros. to this agreement, but should also secure their acceptance of another condition, which was not embodied in the written agreement to the effect that Hale Bros. should occupy the leased premises, or a substantial part thereof, with their own business, and that this latter portion of his contract plaintiff failed to perform. The finding on this point is in favor of the plaintiff, and supports the judgment, and it is this finding which is a special subject of attack by the appellant. Appellant contends that the agreement which Hale Bros. signed was an incomplete agreement, and that their acceptance was never secured to a complete agreement for a lease. We think the agreement to which the plaintiff procured the assent of Hale Bros. is in all respects a complete agreement for a lease. It embodies all necessary terms of a lease, and was apparently satisfactory to the estate company, except that it contained no provision against subletting. It is not sufficient to say it might have contained a covenant against subletting or other conditions; the other conditions it might have contained are limitless, but this does not affect its validity or sufficiency to create the relation of landlord and tenant as between the estate company and Hale Bros.

[2] Appellant points out certain contradictions in the testimony of the plaintiff, and wishes this court to decide that, because of these contradictions, his testimony in support of the facts found is without weight and insufficient to justify the finding. This court is not concerned with what it may believe is a preponderance of the evidence. We may go no further in our examination of the evidence than is necessary to determine that a substantial conflict exists. In the present case there appears to be some contradiction between the testimony of the plaintiff given in his action against the estate company (which was considered in evidence in the present action by stipulation of the parties) and his testimony given in the present action. It appears that the testimony in the second action was given about four years after the transactions in question occurred; that the dealings between plaintiff and defendant upon which the action is based included negotiations covering a period of about a week or more; that there were several conversations between the parties at which numerous details were discussed, and it would seem quite natural if some of the details of these conversations had escaped the memory of the plaintiff after a period of several years. Under the circumstances, if some contradictions and inconsistencies appear in his testimony, we think these should not have the effect of nullifying his entire testimony. The trial court had before it all the inconsistencies and conflicts in the testimony, and we will presume that they were weighed against the plaintiff in considering the evidence as a whole and arriving at the finding concerning the terms of the contract between plaintiff and the defendant as president of the estate company. We cannot disturb this finding.

[3] The action in the present case is founded upon section 2342, Civil Code, and the objections made by the appellant as to the existence of the liability on the part of defendant under the findings made seem to us to be without merit. This section defines a warranty of authority by saying that one who assumes to act as an agent thereby warrants to all who deal with him in that capacity that he has the authority which he assumes. In the present case the defendant assumed to act for the estate company in securing the services of the plaintiff, and that in itself constitutes a warranty of his authority to act as such agent. The action is not to hold the defendant as a principal under the contract, and the case does not come within the provisions of section 2343, Civil Code, and therefore much of appellant's argument is misdirected.

[4] The only other point which remains to be considered is the question of damages. These are defined by section 3318, Civil Code, to be the amount which could have been recovered and collected from his principal if the warranty had been complied with and the reasonable expenses of legal proceedings taken in good faith to enforce the act of the agent against his principal. The court having found that the plaintiff fully performed his part of the contract which was entered into between him and the defendant as president of the estate company, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover his compensation under the contract from the estate company had the president of that company been authorized to act for the company in making the contract. This, then, would seem to be the amount which he is entitled to recover from the defendant.

[5] Appellant contends that the action of the trial court in allowing interest upon the amount recovered from the time that the agreement was signed by Hale Bros., was improper because, as he contends, the damages were unliquidated. The trial court having found that the service to be performed by plaintiff was to secure the signature of Hale Bros. to the contract set out in the findings, and having found that the plaintiff performed this service, the plaintiff would have been entitled to a definite and fixed compensation at that time from the estate company had its president been authorized by it to act in this matter. The agent not having been authorized, he became responsible at the same time for said fixed and certain amount by reason of the breach of warranty of authority. Under section 3287, Civil Code, which provides that every person entitled to recover damages certain or capable of being made certain by calculation is entitled to interest thereon from the time the right of recovery is vested in him, we think the judgment of the trial court allowing interest upon the amount due from the time it became due and payable is a proper judgment.

Judgment affirmed.

WRIGHT et al. v. ROHR et al. (Civ. 2650.)

1. Husband and Wife ⚷274(1)—Community Property.

Civ. Code, § 1386, subsec. 8, relating to the disposition of community property, merely provides a rule of succession, when the owner shall die intestate leaving no issue, and recognizes the full right of the owner to dispose of such property; hence children of husband by a former marriage cannot reach community property which the wife, after the death of the husband, conveyed by way of gift to another on the theory that they were entitled under the statute.

2. Deeds ⚷211(3, 4)—Evidence—Capacity.

In a suit to set aside a voluntary conveyance, made by plaintiff's stepmother to one who had lived with the stepmother from the time she was a child, evidence held insufficient to show that the deed was procured by fraud and undue influence at a time when the stepmother was incapable.

3. Deeds ⚷196(1) — Conveyance — Confidential Relation.

Where a conveyance is by way of gift and a confidential and fiduciary relation existed between the parties, the burden of proving the good faith of the transaction is on the grantee.

4. Deeds ⚷72(3)—Validity—Undue Influence.

The mere fact that there was a confidential relation existing between a woman and a girl, who made her home with the woman from the time she was a child, and that such grantee might have exercised undue influence, will not of itself warrant a finding that undue influence was actually exerted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by Sampson B. Wright and others against Rosalie Catherine Rohr and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. A. Barham, of Santa Rosa, R. A. Long, of Willows, H. W. A. Weske, of Santa Rosa, and Herbert Choynski and James Raleigh Kelly, both of San Francisco, for appellants.

Geary & Geary, J. R. Leppo, and Phil Ware, all of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. This is nominally an action brought by plaintiffs, the appellants, to quiet title to a tract of land situated in Sonoma county. In addition to the relief usually sought in such actions, plaintiffs pray that a certain deed, set out in the complaint, be canceled. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and plaintiffs appeal.

Winfield S. M. Wright, prior to his marriage to Jarena D. Wright, now deceased, was a widower with two children, the plaintiffs and appellants here, the issue of his former marriage. On December 13, 1860, said Winfield S. M. Wright and Jarena D. Wright were married, and continuously lived together as husband and wife until June 17, 1892, on which date said Winfield S. M. Wright died, testate.

During their married life, Winfield S. M. Wright and Jarena D. Wright accumulated the lands involved in this action, and other property, both real and personal not involved here, and the land in controversy was community property at the time of Winfield S. M. Wright's death.

After the death of said Winfield S. M. Wright, upon due and regular proceedings had in the superior court of Sonoma county, his will was duly admitted to probate. Sampson B. Wright, one of the plaintiffs here, and J. E. Hall, became the duly appointed and qualified executors thereof. The will contained the following provision, relating to Jarena D. Wright, the surviving widow, and the property in controversy herein:

"Third Paragraph. I give and bequeath to my wife, J. D. Wright, in fee an undivided one-half of all those lands situate in Sonoma county, state of California, as follows, to wit: An undivided one-half of those lands conveyed to me by James M. Hudspeth by deed dated September, 1863, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of said Sonoma county in book of deeds numbered 14 at pages 205 and 206 thereof, the entire tract containing about 294 acres."

By the same paragraph of the will an undivided one-half of other lands described was also devised to the widow. In due course the executors filed their petition for distribution, and in the answer of Jarena D. Wright, the widow, to the petition, she alleged the property in controversy here to be community property. Thereafter a decree of distribution was duly given and made. The decree, in so far as it affects the property in controversy here, contained the following provision:

> "An undivided one-half interest in and to that tract of land known as the Hudspeth Tract" (amply describing the same) "is hereby distributed to Mrs. J. D. Wright in fee (the said tract being common property), and the other undivided one-half is hereby distributed in equal proportions, share and share alike, to Sampson B. Wright and Mahala Olive Hall, for and during their natural lives respectively, with remainder over in fee to all the children of the said Sampson B. Wright and Mahala Olive Hall, all the children of each taking in fee, share and share alike, whether born now or hereafter, the quantity that their respective parent had for life."

The Sampson B. Wright and Mahala Olive Hall mentioned in the decree are the children of Winfield S. M. Wright, and are the plaintiffs in this action.

Shortly after the entry of this decree of distribution, Jarena D. Wright instituted a suit in partition against the plaintiffs, her stepchildren, in which she sought to have partitioned the larger tract containing the property involved in this action. In her complaint, she averred herself to be "the owner in fee of an undivided one-half interest in both of said described tracts of land in common with the said defendants." As the result of this action, the property was partitioned, and the tract in controversy here was duly set apart to Jarena D. Wright in severalty and in fee.

On the 26th day of July, 1898, Mrs. Jarena D. Wright made, signed, executed, and acknowledged a deed of the property which had been partitioned to her in fee, in which deed Rosalie Catherine Suggs (now Mrs. Rohr), defendant here, was named as the grantee. The deed recited consideration of love and affection and that said deed was made for the better maintenance, support, protection, and livelihood of the grantee. This deed remained in the possession, or under the control, of Mrs. Wright until the 17th day of October, 1902, when, in the presence of reputable witnesses, she delivered the deed to Miss Suggs. The deed was duly recorded on the next day, and the property described herein, which is the land in controversy in this action, has ever since been assessed to respondent and she has paid all taxes levied thereon. It is this deed which plaintiffs seek to have canceled and under which defendant claims the right, title and interest which plaintiffs seek to have quieted.

Mrs. Jarena D. Wright died intestate as to the land involved here, on November 14, 1916, and left no issue.

The first contention of appellants is that, assuming a gift deed to have been made by Jarena D. Wright to Mrs. Rohr (née Suggs), respondent, no interest whatever was conveyed by such deed, owing to the fact that the property was community property of Winfield S. M. Wright and said Jarena D. Wright; that, upon the death of the husband, the surviving spouse took, and held, all the community property distributed to her, in trust for plaintiffs, the children of her deceased husband, during her life; that, under section 1386 of the Civil Code, Mrs. Wright, not having sold or exchanged the property, or disposed of it by will, it revested to them upon her death. Stated in another way, as we understand it, the contention of the appellants is that said section 1386 is a limitation upon the estate which Mrs. Wright, the surviving spouse, took in the community property upon her husband's death, and upon her power to dispose of or convey, other than by will; that she had, in effect, only a life estate therein; that, even had she seen fit to sell, or exchange, the property after distribution to her, the proceeds would, in turn, have become impressed with the same trust as the original estate; that, upon her death without issue, Mrs. Wright not having disposed of it by will, appellants are entitled to succeed to the property now claimed by Mrs. Rohr under the deed attacked in the court below. Reduced to a few words, the contention of appellants appears to be that Mrs. Wright, while living, could in no manner dispose of the property, but might by will, effective after her death.

[1] Appellants contend, secondly, that the deed from Mrs. Wright to respondent was obtained by means of undue influence and fraud, and at a time when Mrs. Wright was of unsound mind.

Section 1386 of the Civil Code, in so far as it affects this case, is as follows:

> "When any person having title to any estate not otherwise limited by marriage contract, dies without disposing thereof by will, it is succeeded to and must be distributed * * * in the following manner: * * *
> "(8) If the deceased is a widow, or widower, and leaves no issue, and the estate, or any portion thereof, was common property of such decedent and his or her deceased spouse, while such spouse was living, such property goes in equal shares to the children of such deceased spouse, and to the descendants of such children by right of representation, and if none, then one half of such common property goes to the father and mother of such decedent in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such decedent and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation, and the other half goes to the father and mother of such deceased spouse in equal shares, or to the survivor of them if either be dead, or if both be dead, then in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of such deceased spouse and to the descendants of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation."

Both appellants and respondents place much reliance on the opinion of the Supreme Court of this state in Estate of Brady, 171 Cal. 1, 151 Pac. 275. As we understand that decision, it appears rather to sustain the claim of the respondent that subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code is a rule of succession to be applied in the specified contingencies, and not a limitation upon the power of the surviving holder of community property to convey.

From the facts of that case it appears that the wife predeceased the husband. At the time of her death there was certain community property of her husband and herself, consisting in part of real property and partly of notes and mortgages. The husband died intestate several years later. In the meantime he had sold the land and collected the amounts due on the notes, and had reinvested the proceeds in stocks and bonds. His entire estate consisted of the rents, issues, and profits of the community property owned by him and his said wife at the time of the death of the latter, and of property purchased with moneys derived from the sale of said community property, and the satisfaction of the mortgages. Neither of the spouses leaving issue, on distribution of the husband's estate the lower court treated all of the property of the husband as being controlled in its devolution by said subdivision 8 of section 1386 and distributed it accordingly.

On appeal the principal claim was that none of the property left by Brady was common property of himself and wife at the time of the death of Mrs. Brady, and that consequently said subdivision was not applicable thereto. After deciding that "the apparent object of subdivision 8, when both spouses die without lineal descendants, is to provide for the inheritance of the property equally by the respective families of the two spouses by whose efforts it was accumulated," the Supreme Court disposed of appellants' claim by holding the more reasonable conclusion to be that—

> "The subdivision applies, not only to the community property in kind, as it existed at the death of the wife, but also to that into which the husband may convert it during his subsequent life, and that it also applies to the rents, issues, and profits thereof."

But the court went further, and said:

> "It does not follow * * * that the heirs of the predeceased wife have anything more than an expectancy in the property, or its proceeds, during the subsequent life of the husband. It does not affect the husband's title. It may also be conceded that if such community property is by the husband so mingled with his other property that it cannot be traced to its origin as a part of the community property, subdivision 8 could not be applied. * * * Mr. Brady * * * was, without administration, from the moment of the death of his predeceased wife, the absolute owner of all the community property (Estate of Klumpke, 167 Cal. 414, 419, 139 Pac. 1062), as fully as though it had been his separate property during coverture, with power to deal with it as he saw fit, even to the extent of effectually devising or bequeathing it by will; subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code applying only in the event of intestacy. This, however, is entirely immaterial in determining the proper construction of the rule of succession prescribed by subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. The situation is the same in this regard whether the property remain in its original form, or is exchanged by the surviving spouse for other property. In each case we are dealing with property which during the life of the surviving husband was his absolute property, to do with as he wills. The Legislature has simply enacted a rule of succession in regard thereto in the event of his dying intestate, as it unquestionably had the right to do." Estate of Brady, supra.

This exact question was also before this court but a short time ago, so recently, in fact, that the respective parties to this litigation were allowed to file supplemental briefs to discuss the decision in the case of Viers v. Roberts, 179 Pac. 689. The facts of that case are strikingly similar to those of the case at bar, and the contentions on appeal are identical. It was charged that the deed, in that case, from mother to daughter, was executed while the former was incompetent, was obtained by undue influence, and that the property in question, being proceeds of community property of Mrs. Roberts and her predeceased spouse, must be regarded as held by her in trust for their children, and that the attempted conveyance of it to one of them, to the exclusion of the others, was a violation of the rights of the latter. The last contention was based, as it is here, upon subdivision 8 of section 1386 of the Civil Code. Having reached and announced the opinion that there was evidence to sustain the findings of the trial court upholding the deed's due execution, this court said:

> "The most cursory reading of the above quotation from section 1386 makes it apparent that it has no reference to the situation presented in this case, for two reasons: First, the property concerned in this litigation formed no part of the estate of Mrs. Roberts at the time of her death; and, second, the subdivision quoted in part provides a rule of succession to a certain character of property when the owner thereof shall die intestate and leaving no issue. It fully recognizes the right of the owner to dispose of such property either by gift inter vivos, or by last will and testament, which right was exercised in this case."

After a careful re-examination of the matter as it is presented on this appeal, we have no hesitation in announcing our adherence to the views there expressed.

[2] The second point advanced by appellants on this appeal is that the deed from Mrs. Wright to Mrs. Rohr, of July 28, 1898, was made by Mrs. Wright at a time when she was of unsound mind, and was procured by means of fraud and undue influence imposed on her by the respondent. The finding of the trial court was opposed to this contention, and we are asked to review the testimony of some 25 witnesses, and the proceedings taken in the court below, brought here by the alternative method and consisting of a record of more than 1200 pages. Our labors have been lessened by the painstaking manner in which counsel for each side have observed the requirements of the court rule governing the matter, and have printed in supplemental form, appended to their respective briefs, such portions of the record as they desired to call to the attention of the court.

After a careful review of the testimony thus presented, we are satisfied that the trial court was correct in its decision. There is some evidence which, standing alone and uncontradicted, might support a contrary view; but on the whole the testimony preponderates strongly in favor of the respondent's side of the case. This is particularly so in view of the law applicable to such facts as we understand it. The most favorable view we can take in support of appellants' position is that there is a conflict in the evidence, which the trial court passed upon, and reconciled. We have no power to disturb the conclusion reached.

From the findings, amply supported by the evidence, it appears that in 1893 the respondent, then a girl of about 16 years of age, at the request of Mrs. Wright, went to live with the latter, at the ranch in Sonoma county, and from that time occupied a place in the home as a member of the family. The relation between the two soon became that of mother and daughter, and so continued until the death of Mrs. Wright. The younger woman referred to and addressed the elder as "mother." The respondent was affectionate, obedient, industrious, and respectful towards Mrs. Wright, and performed and shared with the latter the usual household, family and social duties, obligations and pleasures incident to the relation so existing between the two. They lived together in the home of Mrs. Wright until respondent married in 1898. After that date, the respondent and her husband lived with Mrs. Wright until 1912. From that time until her death in 1916 Mrs. Wright lived at the home of respondent and her husband.

In 1898, Mrs. Wright sent for her attorney and told him she wished to give her property to respondent, and wished when she died everything to go to her. The matter of carrying her plan into execution by means of a deed in escrow was discussed by her and her attorney, and the latter fully explained the details of the transaction and its results. These matters he discussed alone with Mrs. Wright, who gave the attorney the description of the property to be conveyed by the deed. The deed under attack in this case was the result of these interviews. Mrs. Rohr knew nothing about the making of the deed at the time it was made, did not discuss the subject with Mrs. Wright, and did not learn of its execution until told of it by her foster mother herself, more than a year later. At the time of the execution of this deed, there was nothing in the attitude or conduct of Mrs. Wright to indicate to her attorney, who had known her for some time, that there was any impairment of her mental faculties. Other witnesses, including the pastor of her church, testified that at this period of her life, both mentally and physically, Mrs. Wright was unusually active and alert for a woman of her years; she being at that time of the age of 74 years or thereabouts.

Four years later, in 1902, Mrs. Wright took the deed from escrow, and in the presence of an attorney (not the one who had drawn the deed) and other witnesses in her own home made actual delivery thereof to Mrs. Rohr, at the same time receiving from the latter an agreement, which, among other provisions, conveyed to herself a life estate in the property. The day following, the deed and agreement were duly recorded. The testimony shows that Mrs. Rohr knew nothing of the purpose of her foster mother to deliver the deed, and take back the agreement for a life estate, until called into the room by the notary who took her acknowledgment to the latter document.

The mental condition of Mrs. Wright during a period as far back as 1885, particularly between the time of the making of the deed and its delivery and until her death, was testified to by a number of witnesses, called by the opposing sides, other than those already mentioned. Among them were Mrs. Wright's physician, another doctor, relatives, friends, and acquaintances of long standing. To summarize their testimony, with some contradictions, is but to conclude that Mrs. Wright was not only strong-minded, clear-headed, and sound mentally, but that, as her physician testified, "her mental condition was extremely good for a person of her age—in fact, extremely good, regardless of age."

A number of witnesses also testified from their own observations, in instances extending over a period of many years, relative to the relations existing between Mrs. Wright and Mrs. Rohr, before and after the execution and delivery of the deed. From our review of the testimony of all of these witnesses, which in some material matters presents a conflict, we are led to the conclusion that the trial court was justified in finding these relations to be as we have heretofore described, and that the execution and delivery of the deed from Mrs. Wright to Mrs. Rohr was not the product or result of any influence, or act, whatever of respondent, and was not induced by any fraud on her part. The findings likewise properly exonerate the husband of respondent, who, although not made a party to the action, was directly charged in the complaint with being a party to the fraud and undue influence to which, it was therein alleged, Mrs. Wright was subjected.

[3, 4] Appellants contend that, it being established that the relationship between Mrs. Wright and Mrs. Rohr was one of unqualified affection and confidence, and that the opportunity for the exercise of undue influence existed through the parties living together for so many years, the burden was upon respondent to prove that fraud and undue influence was not practiced, and that no undue advantage of Mrs. Wright was taken in the matter. A confidential, and therefore fiduciary, relation being established, the burden of showing the good faith of the transaction was undoubtedly on the respondent. Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 14, 93 Pac. 289; Bacon v. Soule, 19 Cal. App. 429, 126 Pac. 384. This burden, we feel, was squarely met and sustained, as we have already indicated in expressing our approval of the findings of the trial court.

The confidential relation existing between Mrs. Wright and respondent, and the opportunity afforded therefrom for the latter to exercise undue influence, were proper matters to take into consideration with the other evidence in the case. But the relation itself and opportunity were not sufficient alone to warrant a finding that undue influence was actually exerted. Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 461, 117 Pac. 532. No activity on the part of Mrs. Rohr, or any one in her behalf, was shown in the matter of the preparation of the deed. Estate of Baird, 176 Cal. 384, 168 Pac. 561; Estate of Higgins, 156 Cal. 261, 104 Pac. 6. The record presents uncontradicted testimony that she knew nothing about its execution until long after it was made, and did not anticipate its delivery until it was actually delivered to her some years later by her foster mother, who, at the time, it is sufficiently shown, was acting upon independent advice of counsel and friends, and in pursuance of a well-defined plan, matured in her own sound and disposing mind.

The conclusion reached by the trial court in the matter was correct, and its judgment is affirmed.

COLEMAN et al. v. SPRING CONST. CO. et al. (Civ. 2819.)

1. Municipal Corporations 🔑294(1) — Street Improvements—"Notice."

The Improvement Act of 1911 is applicable to a city in which no paper is published and circulated, the word "notice" in section 79 referring to posting as well as publication of notice, and section 1 expressly making the act applicable to all municipalities.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Notice.]

2. Municipal Corporations 🔑294(7) — Improvements—Notice—Posting.

Under Improvement Act 1911, § 79, permitting posting in lieu of publication, notice of a proposed improvement should be given by posting where no newspaper is published in the city, although newspapers are circulated therein.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑294(2) — Improvements—Time for Filing Protest —Notice.

Under Improvement Act 1911, §§ 6, 7, no notice of the time or place within which protest against an intended improvement may be filed is required to be given by a city council.

4. Municipal Corporations 🔑294(6) — Improvements—Notice—Posting.

Since, under any circumstance, the greatest period of publication of notice of intention to make improvements, under Improvement Act 1911, would be eight days, the demands of such statute are satisfied, in a city where no newspaper is published, if the notices are posted and kept posted for a like period.

5. Constitutional Law 🔑290(3) — Due Process of Law—Street Improvements—Notice.

Since Improvement Act 1911 fixes the time and place for protesting against intended improvements, a lot owner is not denied due process of law in that a city council is not required to give notice of time and place for hearing protests.

6. Municipal Corporations 🔑485(3) — Street Improvements — Warrants — Issuance.

Where a warrant was recorded and thereafter handed back to the contractor, and, after demand for payment, was returned to the superintendent of streets within 30 days after its date, Improvement Act 1911 was complied with, in view of section 25.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷485(1) — STREET IMPROVEMENT BONDS — VALIDITY — INNOCENT PURCHASER.

If a bond issued by a municipal corporation to a contractor under Improvement Act 1911 is void upon its face, it is void in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value, as well as in the hands of the contractor.

8. QUIETING TITLE ⚷7(3) — CLOUDS UPON TITLE—VOID IMPROVEMENT BOND.

If a bond issued by a municipal corporation under Improvement Act 1911 is void upon its face, it does not constitute an enforceable obligation against a lot owner, and casts no cloud upon his title, and is no ground upon which to base an action to quiet title.

9. QUIETING TITLE ⚷14 — CONDITIONS PRECEDENT—PAYMENT OF SUM DUE.

Since the amending act of 1915 to Improvement Act 1911 changed the provisions of section 60 by giving to a lot owner the privilege of paying off bonds and discharging the land from the lien at any time before commencement of proceedings for sale, a lot owner, before bringing an action to quiet title on the ground that the bonds did not contain a recital that they might be redeemed before maturity, should offer to pay the obligation.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

10. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷485(5) — STREET IMPROVEMENTS — NOTICE — BOND —CONCLUSIVENESS.

A notice of improvement under Improvement Act 1911, posted along the line of the contemplated work, which was headed "Notice of Improvement," the words "notice of" being in letters of one inch in length and the word "improvement" in letters of five-eighths of an inch in length, although a technical departure from the requirement of the statute, will be held, after the issuance of bonds, a substantial compliance with the statute, in view of the conclusive evidence provision of section 66.

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by Robert L. Coleman and others against the Spring Construction Company and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appealed to the District Court of Appeals, which affirmed, and plaintiff applies for rehearing in the Supreme Court. Rehearing denied.

Edgar M. Wilson, Powell & Dow, and Francis Dunn, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Elston, Clark & Nichols, of Berkeley, Earl D. White, of Oakland, and O. F. Meldon, of Sausalito, for respondents.

NOURSE, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to quiet title to certain lots in the city of Larkspur. Plaintiffs attack the validity of certain street improvement proceedings which resulted in the levy of an assessment and the issuance of bonds thereunder, creating a first lien upon the property involved. They asked for judgment declaring the assessment void, canceling the bonds, and quieting their title. At the close of the trial the action was dismissed as to all defendants except the Spring Construction Company, which performed the street work, the city of Larkspur and its treasurer, all of whom are the respondents on this appeal.

The facts are that on April 7, 1915, the city council of Larkspur adopted its resolution of intention for the purpose of improving Baltimore avenue under the "Improvement Act of 1911." St. 1911, p. 730. There being no newspaper published and circulated in the city of Larkspur, copies of this resolution were posted in three public places, and kept so posted for a period of 14 days. Eighteen days after the expiration of the 14 days of posting, the city council adopted its resolution ordering the work to be done. On April 16th the superintendent of streets posted notices of the intended improvement along the line of the contemplated work. Thereafter, and on May 12th, sealed proposals were solicited in due time and order, a contract was executed with the Spring Construction Company, the work done, inspected, and accepted.

The assessment was levied January 16, 1916, to cover the amounts due, a warrant was attached to the assessment, demanding various sums and advising the owners that nine-year serial bonds would be issued for assessments remaining unpaid. This warrant was filed and recorded and thereafter delivered to the contractor. The assessment was read upon the property, demand was made, and the warrant was returned unsatisfied to the superintendent of streets within 30 days after its date, with the return indorsed thereon. On March 1, 1916, after the expiration of the full 30 days from the date of said warrant and the recordation of the return thereof, bonds were issued by the city treasurer covering the assessments unpaid.

No complaint, objection, protest, or appeal was ever made or filed by the owners in writing or otherwise at any stage of the proceedings.

Appellants advance five points of attack upon the validity of the proceedings and the bonds issued by the city council. These will be treated in the order presented.

[1] 1. Appellants insist that the Improvement Act is not applicable to Larkspur, because no paper is published and circulated in that city. The argument is that, as section 6 of the act gives to the property owners 15 days after the second publication of the copy of the resolution of intention within which to file their protests, and that where this notice is given by posting instead of publication in a newspaper there is no time fixed for the beginning of this period, the city council cannot acquire jurisdiction of any of the proceedings leading to the improvement of streets under this act if the preliminary notice is not given by publication in a newspaper.

But the act is expressly made applicable to all municipalities in the state (section 1), and notice by posting in lieu of publication is provided for where no newspaper is printed or circulated in the city (section 79). The latter section also provides that "no publication, or notice, other than that provided for in this act, shall be necessary to give validity to any of the proceedings." The word "notice," above quoted, refers to posting, and the clear purpose of the section is to substitute posting for printing in a newspaper in cities where no newspaper is published or circulated.

[2] In this connection appellants urge that as section 79 permits posting in cities only where no newspaper is "printed or circulated," if any newspaper of any character is distributed in the city posting cannot be had. The entire proceedings following the adoption of the resolution of intention are based upon the publication of a copy of the resolution in a newspaper "published and circulated" in said city. The same language is used throughout the act where the character of publication is specified. Therefore, when by section 79 of the act posting is permitted in lieu of publication, this method of giving notice is only available as a substitute for the character of a publication required by the act. As the act does not in any single section permit the publication of any of the proceedings in a newspaper merely circulated or distributed in the city and not published therein, manifestly it is only in a city where no newspaper is published as well as circulated that notice by posting alone can be given.

[3] 2. The second proposition is based upon the theory that the city council did not acquire jurisdiction to proceed because the running of the period within which protests could be filed was not fixed. As to this, appellants rely upon the provisions of sections 6 and 7 of the act, which read in part as follows:

> Section 6: "At any time within fifteen days after the date of the second publication of the resolution of intention, * * * any owner of property liable to be assessed * * * may make written protest against the proposed work."
> Section 7: "When no protests have been delivered to the clerk * * * within fifteen days after the date of the second publication of the resolution of intention * * * the city council shall be deemed to have acquired jurisdiction to order the proposed improvements."

In a city where a newspaper is published and circulated a copy of this resolution must be published twice. This may be in a daily, semiweekly, or a weekly newspaper. The publications may thus appear 2, 4, or 8 days apart, according to the kind of newspaper designated by the city council for the purpose. Protests may be filed within 15 days after the second or last publication. This time may therefore, be 16, 19, or 23 days after the first publication. The time within which protest may be filed is thus fixed by the statute in an indefinite way, depending upon the periods of publication, and no notice of the time or place within which such protests may be filed was required to be given by the city council.

[4] All that the statute required the city council to do in so far as the giving of notice of the preliminary resolution is concerned was, at the time these proceedings were had, to publish twice, or to post and to keep posted for the same length of time as publication should be had, a copy of its resolution of intention. As under any circumstances the greatest period of publication would be 8 days, the demands of the statute are satisfied if the notices are posted and kept posted for a like period. There is, thus, no more uncertainty as to the time within which protests may be filed where the notice is given by posting than where it is given by publication in a newspaper. Here the posting was made on April 10th, and the notices were kept posted for 14 days thereafter, and the work was not ordered done until May 12th, a period of 32 days thereafter. Thus the lot owners were given more time within which to make protest than they would have had under the most favorable conditions if notice had been given by publication.

[5] All that the guaranty of due process of law requires in this respect is that the lot owners be given notice of the intended improvement, and that they be accorded an opportunity to protest and to have their protests heard. This notice they have had, and it goes without question that notice of the intended improvement is as effectual for this purpose when given by posting as when given by publication. Appellants quote from numerous authorities holding that defects in notices of the time and place for hearing protests defeat the jurisdiction of the council to proceed. These authorities are not applicable here because the council was not charged to give this notice, but the statute itself gave to the lot owners the only notice required as to the time and place for hearing such protests. It is within the power of the Legislature to determine what notice is sufficient for this purpose, and, having done so, the city council acquires jurisdiction for all purposes on the expiration of the time fixed by the statute if notice of the resolution of intention has been given in the manner prescribed. This having been done, it is incumbent upon the lot owners to determine for themselves the limit of time within which their protest may be filed. And where, as in this case, more time was given for this purpose than is required by the statute, but, notwithstanding this, no protests were filed during the time given or at any time thereafter, the court cannot be asked to nullify the proceedings resulting therefrom.

3. The third objection is equally without merit. The complaint is that the word "improvement" in the notices of improvement which were posted along the line of the contemplated work was printed in type five-eighths of an inch in height instead of one inch, as required by the act. Aside from the fact that this objection is extremely technical, the lot owners were given an opportunity to appeal to the city council under section 26 of the act, the posting of these notices being an act required of the superintendent of streets. No appeal was taken, and in view of the provisions of that section the determination of the city council as to the sufficiency of these proceedings is conclusive and forecloses any objection on this score at this time. But the notice as posted was legible, and substantially complied with the requirements of the act. Clark v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 30, 43, 116 Pac. 722; McCaleb v. Dreyfus, 156 Cal. 204, 210, 103 Pac. 924.

[6] 4. The fourth objection is that the warrant was never returned as required by the act. The facts are that the warrant was recorded, and thereafter handed back to the contractor. After demand for payment was made the warrant was returned to the superintendent of streets, and this was done within 30 days after its date. This is all that the act requires (section 25).

[7, 8] 5. The fifth ground for relief urged by appellants is that each bond is void on its face because it does not contain the recital that it may be redeemed by the owner at any time before maturity, as required by the amendment to section 63 of the act as enacted June 11, 1915, effective August 10, 1915. St. 1915, p. 1464. It is conceded that none of these bonds contained this recital, and that all were issued subsequent to the effective date of the amendment.

Of course, if it be true that each bond is void upon its face, then it is void in the hands of an innocent purchaser for value as well as in the hands of the contractor. In such event they do not constitute enforceable obligations against the lot owner, and hence cast no cloud upon his title. If there be no cloud, then there is no ground for equitable relief. Bucknall v. Story, 36 Cal. 67, 71; Chase v. Treasurer, 122 Cal. 540, 542, 55 Pac. 414.

See, also, Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 87 Pac. 102.

[9] But in another respect appellants have mistaken their remedy. The amending act of 1915 above noted also changed the provisions of section 60 of the act by giving to the lot owner, or to any person interested therein, the privilege of paying off such bond and discharging the land from the lien "at any time before commencement of proceedings for sale." Thus if, as appellants insist, the form of the bonds as to payment before maturity is to be controlled by the amendment, the privilege of making payment before sale of the land is also available. He may thus remove an asserted cloud upon his title by paying the obligation, and this he should offer to do before he seeks equitable relief.

In answer to this attack of appellants, respondents urge that as the contract was executed under the original act, the contractor is entitled to a bond in the form prescribed by the act at the time of the execution of the contract. The argument is that as the form of the bond and the terms of payment were fixed in the original act, these provisions became a part of the contract, and the subsequent amendment impaired the obligation of the contract. There is much force in this argument, but the question is one which should be determined only in a proceeding where it is properly put in issue.

In conclusion, it should be said that the complaint in this action is wholly lacking in the essential averments of a bill in equity of this nature. There is no allegation that appellants did not have actual notice of every step in the proceedings leading to the improvement of their property. The proceedings were instituted on April 7, 1915. This action was commenced on December 12, 1916, some 20 months thereafter. If an owner sits quietly by while his property is being improved in this manner, and makes no objection or protest at any stage of the proceedings, having full knowledge of what is being done in the meantime, he cannot wait until he has received all the benefits of the improvement, and it is too late for the authorities to correct the alleged irregularities, before suing in a court of equity to remove the cloud placed upon his property through his own acquiescence.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM. [10] In denying the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District, Division 1, we withhold our approval from that portion of the opinion dealing with the objection that the notice of improvement posted was fatally defective in that the heading, "Notice of Improvement," was not printed in letters of sufficient length, except that portion which holds that there was a substantial compliance with the requirements of the statute. The statute requires "said notice shall be headed 'Notice of Improvement,' in letters not less than one inch in length." The notice was headed, "Notice of Improvement," the words "Notice of" being in letters of one inch in length and the word "Improvement" in letters of only five-eighths of an inch in length. Of course, there was in this a technical departure from the requirement of the statute, but we think, taking the whole heading together, that it should now be held that there was a sufficiently substantial compliance with the requirement of the statute to warrant us in sustaining the proceeding after the issuance of the bond, in view of the conclusive evidence provision of section 66 of the act. Stats. 1911, p. 760.

We disapprove the concluding paragraph of the opinion, the paragraph commencing with the words, "In conclusion it should be said," etc.

Application for a hearing is denied.

All concur, except MELVIN, J., and OLNEY, J., absent.

MINTER v. SAN DIEGO CONSOL. GAS & ELECTRIC CO. (L. A. 4919.)

1. Electricity 🔑19(2)—Personal Injury—Sufficiency of Complaint.

A complaint, alleging that it was defendant's duty to maintain its electric power wires so that they would not endanger persons in a certain tree, that it negligently failed to do so, and that such failure resulted in death of plaintiff's son, held to state a cause of action.

2. Electricity 🔑14(2)—Electric Power Wires—Negligence.

Defendant is liable for placing electric power wires some 30 feet from the ground near a tree if an ordinarily prudent person would reasonably anticipate that wires so placed would cause injury.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑999(3)—Jury Question—Negligence.

If reasonable men might fairly differ as to whether defendant was negligent in locating its electric power wires near a tree, a verdict for plaintiff will not be disturbed.

4. Electricity 🔑19(5)—Personal Injury—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Where electric power wires located 27 and 35 feet, respectively, from the ground and near a tree, killed plaintiff's son who had climbed into the tree for an unknown purpose, held, that evidence did not sustain a verdict that defendant was negligent in failing to anticipate such a result.

5. Electricity 🔑19(12)—Personal Injury—Contributory Negligence—Jury Question.

Evidence that plaintiff knew the danger of touching electric power wires, but did not caution his son when he saw him climbing into a tree near the wires, held not to establish plaintiff's contributory negligence as a matter of law, where plaintiff's evidence contradicted defendant's and defendant's expert stated it was not particularly dangerous to climb near wires.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by P. A. Minter against the San Diego Consolidated Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for appellant.

Crouch & Chambers, of San Diego, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment upon a verdict for the plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the death of the plaintiff's son. The deceased, a boy 16 years of age, was killed by an electric shock from one of the defendant's power wires while he was climbing a eucalyptus tree growing on the highway immediately in front of his father's premises. The death was alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant in maintaining imperfectly protected wires at an improper distance from the tree.

[1] The court did not err in overruling the defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The complaint alleged a duty on the part of the defendant to so maintain its wires that they would not endanger persons in the tree, a breach of this duty, and an injury to the plaintiff resulting from that failure of duty. The complaint therefore stated the three elements necessary to sustain an action to recover damages for negligence. Fallon v. United Railroads, 28 Cal. App. 60, 151 Pac. 290.

[2-4] Upon an analysis of the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, we are of the opinion that the appellant's motion for a nonsuit at the close of the plaintiff's case should have been granted, and we are satisfied that the evidence as a whole does not support the verdict.

The facts of the case are these: The deceased was killed on the 2d day of March, 1915. On that day, the plaintiff owned land in San Diego county situated in a country district and bounded by a public highway. Upon this land he maintained a small store patronized by the neighbors, passers-by, and by children from a school which was not far distant. There was a eucalyptus tree in front of the premises and in the highway. This tree was about 2½ feet in diameter near the ground and a little over 10 inches in diameter at the height of 35 feet from the ground. The first limb of the tree was approximately 6½ feet from the ground. The defendant maintained power wires strung upon wooden poles set along the highway on the side upon which the plaintiff's land was located. One wire was strung at a height of about 27 feet from the ground and at a distance from the tree of about 14 or 16 inches. It carried 2,300 volts and was insulated. The insulation did not make the wire safe to handle and was particularly inefficacious when it was wet. Another wire was strung 6 or 8 feet higher and at a distance from the tree of about 3 feet. This wire carried 11,000 volts and was not insulated. There was a crotch in the tree between the two sets of wires. There had been a shower on the morning in question, but the weather had cleared before the accident. The deceased was in the third year of high school and had worked with a pumping plant operated by electricity and had kept two automobiles in order. There was no evidence to show that he had ever before climbed over 15 or 18 feet into the tree. Some days before the accident, the defendant's workmen had trimmed the tree. There were some twigs left up in the tree described by the plaintiff as "small branches about the size of a wire * * * and leaves on the end of them, little green branches that come in pulling larger branches down." It seems that there had been some discussion between the plaintiff and the deceased about removing these twigs. But on the day in question, the deceased started up the tree without his father's knowledge and for a purpose not disclosed by the plaintiff's evidence. The plaintiff was at the time pulling weeds near by. He looked up and saw the boy in the tree and afterward looked down again to his work. About 90 seconds after that he heard a sliding noise in the tree. Looking up he saw the body of the deceased lodged in the crotch. The body was then in a position to indicate that it had slid down the trunk of the tree from a position facing north. In that position, the wires of the defendant would have been to the right of the deceased. The boy's right hand was badly blistered and burned with the exception of the thumb, index finger, and the portion of the hand below the middle of the palm. There were five punctuated burns on the left leg between the knee and the pelvis. The deceased had apparently been instantly killed.

It is not disputed that the defendant might lawfully maintain its power wires along the highway in front of the plaintiff's premises, being under the duty, however, to exercise such care in the operation thereof as would be exercised by a reasonably prudent and skillful person under the same or similar circumstances. The plaintiff does not contend, nor, indeed, in view of the generally known and accepted practices of electric companies, could he well contend, that there was a failure to use due care in maintaining an insulated 2,300-volt wire 27 feet from the ground or in maintaining an 11,000-volt uninsulated wire at about 35 feet from the ground carried through a country district on wooden poles set along a public highway. The breach of duty alleged was in maintaining these wires without further protection close to the eucalyptus tree in front of the plaintiff's premises.

If, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, an ordinarily prudent person would have had reasonable ground to suspect that the wires so placed would cause injury, the plaintiff can be said to have proved a breach of duty. And if reasonable men might fairly differ as to the answer to this question, the verdict for the plaintiff should not be disturbed. We are of the opinion, however, that it could not be fairly and reasonably found that an ordinarily prudent person would have considered additional precautions necessary under the circumstances here presented.

The plaintiff relies on the case of Giraudi v. Electric Imp. Co., 107 Cal. 120, 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114, where it was said that there was sufficient proof of negligence where it was shown that the defendant had failed to raise its current-bearing wires so high above a hotel roof, on which they were placed, that those having occasion to go there would not come in contact with them. It is to be noted, however, that the facts in that case showed that the plaintiff was injured while in the discharge of his duty in doing some work on the roof of the hotel where any person called upon to look after the structure or the signs placed thereon might be expected to have to go.

On the other hand, in Fairbairn v. American River, etc., Co., 170 Cal. 115, 148 Pac. 788, it was held that a power company whose wires were 27 feet 8 inches above the ground was not bound to anticipate that persons might wish to transport along the road under these wires a hay derrick extending to a higher elevation. It was held to be the duty of the company to consider carefully all uses of the highway reasonably to be anticipated and to take precautions to prevent its wires from interfering therewith. The same rule was announced on the appeal from the judgment rendered after the second trial in that case, though new evidence which had been adduced was held to warrant a finding of negligence. Fairbairn v. American River, etc., Co., 175 Pac. 637. By analogy, the defendant in the case at bar was bound to prevent its wires from interfering with any use of the highway and, in particular, of the eucalyptus tree which was reasonably to be anticipated. It affirmatively appears from the plaintiff's testimony that the trees were trimmed by the defendant's workmen. No evidence was adduced to show that the tree was used or needed for anything but shade or ornament, or to show the existence of any custom with reference to the care of the tree of which the defendant would be reasonably expected to take notice and which would be likely at times to require the presence of the deceased or of any other person in the tree at a height of 27 feet from the ground. In the absence of such evidence, we do not think that the existence of any such business or duty was fairly inferable under the circumstances here presented.

The plaintiff also relies upon Temple v. McComb Co., 89 Miss. 1, 42 South. 874, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 449, 119 Am. St. Rep. 698, 10 Ann. Cas. 924, wherein it was said that:

> "The immemorial habit of small boys to climb * * * trees filled with abundant branches extending almost to the ground is a habit of which companies stretching their wires over such trees must take notice."

The case does not support the plaintiff's contention that the defendant was bound to anticipate that children might be attracted to climb into the tree where they might be endangered by the wires. An examination of the photographs, appended to the record as plaintiff's Exhibits "A," "B," and "C," as well as uncontradicted testimony, shows that the tree in question was not one likely to appeal to young and irresponsible children. It was nearly 3 feet in diameter at the ground. The first limb branched out over 6 feet from the ground. For a considerable distance between the lower branches and the defendant's wires the tree was practically bare of limbs. Although the plaintiff stated that school children were wont to frequent his store and to gather around the tree, there was no attempt to show that any of them had ever undertaken to climb the tree. The facts of the case, so far as they bear upon the duty of the defendant to anticipate that the wires might be a source of danger to irresponsible juvenile climbers, are more analogous to those in Mayfield, etc., Co. v. Webb, 129 Ky. 395, 111 S. W. 712, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 179, 130 Am. St. Rep. 469, where it was held that the company was not bound to anticipate that children would be attracted to climb two nearly parallel guy wires placed a short distance apart at an angle of 45 degrees from the ground and passing within 8 inches of an electric wire at a height of 18 feet. Again, in Graves v. Washington, etc., Co., 44 Wash. 675, 87 Pac. 956, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 452, it was held that the company was not bound to anticipate that boys would climb into danger from its wires, placed near the piers of a public bridge, 30 feet above the roadway. This decision was made in the face of evidence that the piers were so constructed that their braces formed a ladder which could be easily ascended and that boys sometimes climbed there for purposes of sport or to catch pigeons which nested about the bridge. A judgment for the plaintiff was reversed and the cause remanded with instructions to dismiss the action.

The plaintiff appears to maintain the proposition that, because a person might climb the tree without committing a trespass, it was incumbent upon the defendant to assume the burden of keeping its wires so protected that a climber would not be subjected to risk. That, however, is not the test. The question is, not what a person might lawfully do, but what the defendant was bound, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, to assume that a person would be likely to do. Wetherby v. Twin State Co., 83 Vt. 189, 75 Atl. 8, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1220, 21 Ann. Cas. 1092; Brush Co. v. Lefevre, 93 Tex. 604, 57 S. W. 640, 49 L. R. A. 771, 77 Am. St. Rep. 898.

The case of Freeman v. Railroad Co., 54 App. Div. 596, 66 N. Y. Supp. 1052, is instructive in view of the theory advanced by the plaintiff that the defendant's workmen may have left green branches touching the wires and that through them the current may have been communicated to the body of the deceased. The plaintiff in that case was using a public bridge at the time of his injury. Instead of following the footpath, however, he had started to walk across on a girder which was 115 feet long and had a rise of 13 feet in the center. The defendant was lawfully maintaining a trolley wire on the bridge together with a guard wire. The guard wire should not have been charged with electricity, but current had in some manner leaked into it. While crossing the girder, the plaintiff was struck by this guard wire and suffered the injuries complained of. Although the plaintiff was using a public highway, it was held that, inasmuch as the defendant was not bound to anticipate that such a use would be made of the girder, it was under no active duty to keep its wires so protected as to make such use safe.

[5] There is no merit in the contention of the defendant that the court should have found as a matter of law that the plaintiff was precluded from recovering by reason of contributory negligence on his part or on the part of the deceased. The defendant introduced evidence to show that the plaintiff was fully aware of the danger of coming into proximity to the wires and of the fact that the deceased was about to do so and that he failed in his duty to exercise his parental authority to keep the boy out of danger. The evidence on behalf of the plaintiff, however, tended to contradict this, and one of the defendant's experts stated in effect that he did not consider it particularly dangerous to climb near the wires. The question of the plaintiff's negligence was therefore properly a question of fact for the jury. It was not shown beyond question that the deceased was guilty of some negligent act after entering the zone of danger. The question of his negligence was therefore also a question of fact for the jury.

While isolated sentences from the court's instructions to the jury, considered alone and unqualified by the context, do, in some instances noted by the defendant, appear to be erroneous or misleading, the instructions, viewed as a whole, are sufficiently clear and correct.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

1. JUDGMENT 🔑489—CONCLUSIVENESS—PERSONS CONCLUDED.

Where after the superior court sitting in probate had approved a compromise whereby the administrator was to pay claimant a sum of money, respondent filed a petition setting up that she was entitled to the entire estate, that she was not a party to the compromise, and that the claim was wholly unfounded, held that a decree, adjudging respondent to be the owner of the entire estate and enjoining the administrator from selling any portion of the estate for the purpose of paying claimant the sum agreed upon in the compromise, which brought claimant's right within Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, subd. 2, is binding and not open to collateral attack, and he cannot thereafter in probate proceedings assert his right to amount fixed in compromise agreement on theory the decree was without the court's jurisdiction.

2. JUDGMENT 🔑410, 441—VALIDITY—FRAUD.

The courts in an equitable proceeding may inquire whether a judgment valid on its face was obtained by fraud, and this principle applies to probate decrees.

3. JUDGMENT 🔑503—COLLATERAL ATTACK—GROUNDS.

The failure of a complaint to state a cause of action is not a defect going to the jurisdiction of the superior court, and a judgment upon such a complaint cannot be held void on collateral attack.

4. JUDGMENT 🔑505—COLLATERAL ATTACK—INSUFFICIENT FINDINGS.

That findings do not support a judgment given does not render the judgment void on collateral attack.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased. From orders of the superior court overruling the opposition of Robert E. R. Scanlan to the petition of Maggie G. Steinberger for final distribution to her of the whole estate, and denying Scanlan's petition for an order directing payment to him of a sum of money, he appeals. Affirmed.

Louis P. Boardman, of San Francisco, and Davis, Kemp & Post, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. H. Merriam, of Pasadena, and G. Harold Janeway, Hunsaker & Britt, and Leroy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

H. M. Barstow, of Los Angeles, for administrator.

Philip C. Boardman, of San Francisco, for Mary E. Ross.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal from two certain orders of the superior court overruling the opposition of appellant, one Robert E. R. Scanlan, to the petition of Maggie G. Steinberger for final distribution to her of the whole of the estate, and denying appellant's petition for an order directing the payment to him of the sum of $8,000, the amount of his asserted claim against the estate.

There is no conflict as to the material facts, which are substantially as follows: The deceased died intestate on January 5, 1910, leaving a considerable estate, included in which, according to the records at least, was a parcel of real estate in the city of Pasadena known as the Ross Block. Appellant Scanlan claimed to be the owner of an undivided one-half of this property under a conveyance alleged to have been executed and delivered by deceased in the year 1907 to him and his mother, a sister of deceased, notwithstanding that prior to the death of deceased both appellant and his mother had apparently executed a reconveyance to deceased and this had been recorded. In this connection the claim of appellant was that this reconveyance had been executed solely for the purpose of insuring to deceased the possession and income of the property during her lifetime, and that it had been placed in the possession of a third person with the understanding that it was not to be delivered to deceased, but that contrary to such understanding it was so delivered and then recorded. Milton K. Young having been appointed administrator of the estate of deceased, appellant commenced an action against him to obtain a decree declaring the reconveyance invalid, and that he was the owner of a one-half interest in said property. In this action the issues made by the pleadings were tried by a jury and a verdict given for appellant, on which judgment was entered in his favor. The trial court granted the defendant administrator's motion for a new trial, and appellant appealed from the order granting such motion. While this appeal was pending an agreement of compromise was made between the administrator and appellant, the substance of which was that in consideration of $1,000 to be paid at once, and of $8,000 as soon as money therefor was available in said estate, appellant would abandon his action, and he and his mother would execute a conveyance of the property to the administrator. The latter presented a petition to the department of the superior court in which the probate proceeding was pending, setting forth the facts relating to the litigation and compromise, and asking the court to approve the compromise. This petition was heard by the court without any notice being first given, and on February 26, 1912, an order was made approving the compromise and directing that it be carried into effect. No appeal was taken from this order. The $1,000 was paid to appellant, a conveyance of the property to the administrator was made by appellant and his mother, and a stipulation filed in the action providing for a final determination thereof against appellant and in favor of the administrator. A little later, on the application of the administrator, an order was made for the sale of certain property of the estate to obtain the money necessary to pay appellant the balance due under the terms of the compromise. No sale was ever made. It is not questioned that throughout the administrator acted in good faith and according to what he conceived to be for the best interest of the estate. Up to this time it was supposed that the lawful heirs of deceased were the only persons interested in the succession to her estate.

Subsequently, on August 14, 1912, one Maggie G. Steinberger commenced an action in the superior court of Los Angeles county, alleging an agreement between herself and her stepfather on the one part and deceased on the other, by the terms of which deceased had agreed that she would adopt said Maggie G. Steinberger, take her into her house and treat her as her daughter, and that in consideration of her obedience, affection, and services she would be the heir of deceased, and on the death of the latter would be entitled to all her property. She alleged full execution of the agreement on her part, and that she had thereby become the equitable owner of all the property of deceased, to the exclusion of her heirs at law. In that action the parties defendant were the administrator, the appellant here, and a number of other persons, including appellant's mother, alleged to be the only heirs at law of deceased. As to appellant, the plaintiff alleged the matters leading up to the compromise, the compromise agreement between the administrator and appellant, and the order of court for the sale of property to pay the $8,000 agreed to be paid him. She further alleged that she was not a party to the compromise or to any of the proceedings in court relative to the same, that the claim of appellant to any portion of the property of the estate was wholly unfounded, because founded on a purported deed made by deceased while she was wholly incompetent to make a conveyance, and further because appellant and his mother had reconveyed the property to deceased in her lifetime, and that the compromise was illegal and void. She asked for a decree adjudging her to be the owner of the entire property and to be entitled to have the same distributed to her, and also that the administrator be enjoined from selling any portion of the estate for the purpose of paying appellant the sum claimed by him, and from paying any portion of such claim out of the funds or property of the estate. The administrator and appellant and certain others of the defendants answered, denying the plaintiff's claim in toto, and appellant further specifically reasserted his original claim of ownership in the Ross Block, the proceedings to enforce the claim, the compromise, the court's orders approving the same, and that such orders had never been appealed from or vacated and were in full force and effect, and constituted a final adjudication of his rights. The findings of the court in that action were entirely in accord with the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and it was concluded that the purported compromise was neither fair, nor proper, nor binding as against the plaintiff Steinberger. Judgment was accordingly given that said Steinberger was the equitable owner of all the property of deceased; that the defendant heirs at law held the legal title in trust for the benefit of plaintiff, that none of said defendants had any right or beneficial interest therein. It was further adjudged that the administrator be enjoined and restrained from making any sale of any of the property of the estate for the purpose of raising funds with which to pay appellant said $8,000 or any part thereof, and that he be enjoined and restrained from paying to appellant said sum or any part thereof out of any of the funds or property belonging to the estate.

From this judgment an appeal was taken to this court by all the defendants, and on May 9, 1917, the judgment was affirmed. Steinberger v. Young et al., 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432. No point appears to have been made upon that appeal as to any want of jurisdiction on the part of the trial court to embody in its judgment the provisions relative to the claim of appellant, and the matter was not discussed in the opinion of this court, but this fact is altogether immaterial in determining the effect of the judgment. See Neale v. Morrow, 163 Cal. 445, 125 Pac. 1052.

After the aforesaid judgment had become final following its affirmance upon appeal, the administrator of said estate presented to the court in which the proceedings in the matter of said estate were pending his final account and petition for the distribution of said estate to said Maggie G. Steinberger in accordance with the aforesaid judgment. Thereafter, and on February 20, 1918, the appellant herein presented and filed his opposition to said distribution, together with his petition for an order directing the administrator of said estate to pay to him the sum of $8,000 out of the funds and property of said estate in accordance with the terms of said compromise and of the order of said probate court approving the same. In his said petition the appellant herein set forth the facts relating to the institution and trial of the action of Steinberger v. Young et al., and of the judgment rendered therein, but averred that the prior determination of the probate court, as embodied in its order approving said compromise, and directing said administrator to pay said sum of money to the appellant, was a final determination of said matter and of all matters involved therein, and that the trial court in the case of Steinberger v. Young et al., was without jurisdiction to review the validity of said compromise or of the order of the probate court approving the same, or to enjoin the administrator from paying to the appellant the sum agreed to be paid therein; wherefore the appellant prayed for an order directing the administrator to pay him said sum. To this petition the respondent herein, Maggie G. Steinberger, appeared and filed her opposition in the form of a demurrer to the sufficiency thereof, and also and at the same time filed her answer thereto, wherein she again set forth in detail the matters which she had averred in her complaint in the case of Steinberger v. Young et al., and which matters the court upon the trial of said cause had adjudicated in her favor, together with the further fact that the judgment therein had been affirmed and became final upon appeal. The court overruled said demurrer, but proceeded to trial upon the issues raised by the answer to said petition, and after a hearing thereon made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, reciting the history of the whole complicated series of proceedings and determining that the findings and judgment of the trial court in the case of Steinberger v. Young et al., as to all of such matters, was a final adjudication thereon, and hence that appellant was thereby barred and estopped from prosecuting or maintaining his opposition to the distribution of said estate, and that said administrator was precluded and debarred from paying petitioner any sum out of the funds of said estate. From the orders thereupon made overruling the appellant's opposition to the distribution of said estate and dismissing his said petition this appeal has been taken.

This somewhat extended statement has been deemed essential to a proper understanding of our brief discussion of the questions that we consider determinative of this appeal.

[1, 2] Manifestly, if the judgment in the action of Steinberger v. Young et al. was in no respect in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court rendering it, appellant's claim of right to participate in the property of the estate is foreclosed thereby. He was made a party to that action for the purpose of having his rights in regard thereto determined, issues were made thereon, and a judgment was given which in substance and effect debars him from such participation. While the judgment in this respect is perhaps not as happily expressed as it might have been, being simply a permanent injunction restraining further proceedings on the part of the administrator looking to the sale of property for the satisfaction of appellant's claim, or the payment of the claim or any part thereof out of funds or property belonging to the estate, such is its necessary effect. By the judgment his alleged right was, in effect, directly adjudged within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 1908, Code of Civil Procedure, the diversion of any part of the property of the estate to the payment of his alleged claim being thereby forbidden. The effect of this judgment, if accepted as a valid judgment in toto, is not disputed by appellant, whose real claim is that the portion of the judgment relative to the claim of appellant was absolutely void because in excess of the jurisdiction of the court giving it, the theory, in short, being that it constituted an attempt on the part of the court to enjoin the execution of valid decrees of the superior court sitting in probate and practically nullify the same, notwithstanding that they had become final. The answer to this claim is very simple. It was not sought in Steinberger v. Young, supra, to vacate or annul the orders of the probate department of the superior court on which appellant relies for the award to him of $8,000 from the funds and property of the estate of Elizabeth Ross, and no such relief could properly have been awarded the plaintiff in that action. See Larue v. Friedman, 49 Cal. 278, 284; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St. Rep. 98. In so far as the action related to appellant, it was an action in equity against him on the part of the plaintiff, alleging herself to be entitled to all the property of the deceased, for the purpose of foreclosing his claim to any part thereof based on orders of the probate court illegally and fraudulently obtained. If it had been that by force of such orders he had already been paid the $8,000 from the funds of the estate, the relief sought would have been a decree adjudging that he held the same in trust for plaintiff because the orders under which he had obtained the same had been illegally and fraudulently obtained to the detriment of the plaintiff, who was the real beneficial owner of the property. As was said in Title Ins. Co. v. California Development Co., 171 Cal. 208, 152 Pac. 557:

> "It is elementary that the courts of this state may in an equitable proceeding inquire whether a judgment valid on its face was obtained by fraud. Sometimes such judgment may be set aside, but even in cases where this relief cannot be had a court of equity may 'prevent an inequitable advantage being taken of it [the judgment] by adjudging the guilty beneficiary or his successor with notice a trustee for the defrauded party.'"

This principle has frequently been applied with relation to probate decrees. See Campbell-Kawananakoa v. Campbell, 152 Cal. 201, 92 Pac. 184; Bacon v. Bacon, 150 Cal. 477, 89 Pac. 317; Estate of Walker, 160 Cal. 547, 117 Pac. 510, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 89; Sohler v. Sohler, 135 Cal. 323, 67 Pac. 282, 87 Am. St.

Rep. 98. Here the property sought to be improperly diverted had not yet come into the possession of the appellant, and consequently all the equitable relief essential in regard thereto was the decree forbidding the actual appropriation of any of the funds or property of the estate, to all of which the plaintiff was adjudged to be entitled, to the payment of any part of his, Scanlan's, claim. Such a decree rests upon the same basis as those involved in the cases just cited, and is within the well-recognized jurisdiction of a court of equity. See Larue v. Friedman, 49 Cal. 278. We are of the opinion that there is no force in the claim that any portion of the judgment in Steinberger v. Young was in excess of the jurisdiction of the court rendering it.

It is urged that neither the complaint nor findings in Steinberger v. Young, supra, in allegations and statement of facts, showed anything in the way of extrinsic fraud or other matter justifying the portion of the judgment complained of. The theory appears to be that this is a matter going to the jurisdiction of the court to give such judgment. Manifestly there is no force in this claim. Assuming appellant to be correct in his view as to pleadings and findings, the objections amount to nothing more than that the complaint in this respect failed to state a cause of action, and that the findings fail to support the judgment.

[3, 4] It is thoroughly settled in this state that the failure of a complaint to state a cause of action is not a defect going to the jurisdiction of the superior court, and that a judgment given upon such a complaint cannot be held void upon collateral attack. In this connection it is only necessary to refer to our recent decision in Gillespie v. Fender, 180 Pac. 332. Of course the same thing is true as to an objection that the findings do not support the judgment given. We are not here concerned with any question as to the correctness of the judgment given by the superior court in Steinberger v. Young, supra, except in so far as the court may have exceeded its jurisdiction, and there is no basis for holding that the judgment was in any respect in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court. Appellant's remedy for any errors committed by the trial court in the exercise of its jurisdiction was, of course, by way of appeal.

It follows from what we have said that the lower court was not in error in its conclusion that appellant was barred and estopped from asserting his claim by the judgment in Steinberger v. Young, supra.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑314(2)—FINAL DISTRIBUTION—PROCEEDINGS—JURISDICTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1634, 1665, an administrator is authorized to file with his final account his petition for final distribution of the estate, and the filing of this petition and the giving of notice prescribed by law confers on the court jurisdiction in the proceeding thus initiated to proceed with the matter of distribution immediately upon settlement of the final account, and it is immaterial that the administrator has no legal interest in any dispute that may arise between claimants on distribution as to how the estate shall be distributed.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑314(3)—FINAL DISTRIBUTION—DENIAL—PENDENCY OF APPEALS.

The pendency of appeals, one from parts of an order settling the administrator's account, and the other by a claimant whose claim was denied, does not warrant the denial of the petition for final distribution, even though the court might properly, in the exercise of its discretion, have continued hearings in the proceedings for distribution pending determination of the appeals.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS 🔑314(3)—FINAL DISTRIBUTION—DENIAL—GROUND.

The denial of a petition for final distribution filed by the administrator on the ground of the pendency of a petition filed under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, by one claiming the estate of the decedent held erroneous; it appearing that the claim might as readily have been disposed of in the proceedings for distribution as in the special proceeding inaugurated under section 1664.

4. DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION 🔑52(2)—SURVIVING WIDOW.

Under no circumstances does the surviving widow of a deceased brother of a deceased husband of a deceased take directly from such deceased under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 8; and, where no relative of the deceased spouse specified in that section survives the surviving spouse, there can be no succession to the surviving widow of a deceased brother thereunder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Elizabeth B. Ross, deceased. From an order made in proceedings for final distribution of the estate, denying her motion for dismissal of the petition filed by one Mary E. Ross, praying that the court proceed in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine who were entitled to the estate, and denying the application for final distribution presented by the administrator, Maggie G. Steinberger appeals. Order reversed, and matter remanded.

See, also, 182 Pac. 303, 752.

J. H. Merriam, of Pasadena, and G. Harold Janeway, Hunsaker & Britt, and Le Roy M. Edwards, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Davis, Kemp & Post, of Los Angeles, Philip C. Boardman, Louis P. Boardman, of San Francisco, and H. M. Barstow and Kemp & Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by one Maggie G. Steinberger from an order made in proceedings for the final distribution of the estate of deceased, denying appellant's motion for a dismissal of the petition filed therein by one Mary E. Ross, praying that the court proceed in accord with the provisions of section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, to determine who were entitled to succeed to the estate, and denying the application for final distribution presented by the administrator.

On May 9, 1917, this court affirmed the judgment in favor of plaintiff in the action of said Maggie G. Steinberger against said administrator, one Scanlan, and various persons found to be the only heirs of deceased, decreeing that subject to the debts, charges, and expenses of administration of said estate said Maggie G. Steinberger was entitled to all the property of the estate by virtue of a contract between herself and her stepfather and deceased, under which she was to be the sole heir of deceased. See Steinberger v. Young, 175 Cal. 81, 165 Pac. 432. After the affirmance of this judgment, viz. on June 23, 1917, the administrator presented his final account, together with his petition for final distribution of the estate, as is authorized by the law. Sections 1634 and 1665, Code of Civil Procedure; Estate of Sheid, 122 Cal. 528, 531, 55 Pac. 328. The estate proceeding had then been pending for over 7 years, and the estate was in condition for final settlement and distribution. By the petition distribution was sought in favor of said Maggie G. Steinberger, according to the judgment in Steinberger v. Young, supra, all of the next of kin of deceased, alleged to constitute her only heirs, having been parties defendant in that action, and their rights as heirs at law being barred by the judgment therein. Notice of the time fixed for settlement of the account and hearing of the petition for distribution was duly given. When the matter came on for hearing, the only appearance in opposition was that of Maggie G. Steinberger, who, claiming to be entitled to all of the distributable assets, as alleged by the administrator, objected to various items of his account. The matter was heard by the court, evidence being received both as to the account and as to the petition for distribution, the evidence on distribution being to the effect that the only heirs at law were the next of kin of deceased who were parties defendant in Steinberger v. Young, supra. On February 18, 1918, the court made an order settling the final account, allowing certain credits which had been objected to by Maggie Steinberger.

Two days later, February 20, 1918, one Scanlan appeared, opposing distribution pending payment to him of a claim of $8,000, alleged to be due under a compromise with the administrator, approved by the probate court, and seeking payment of this claim. A hearing was had on this, and on March 15, 1918, an order was made overruling Scanlan's opposition and denying his petition. On the same day Maggie Steinberger appealed from the portions of the order of settlement of the account disallowing her objections to certain specified items thereof. The hearing on the petition for distribution having been regularly continued from time to time and finally to March 16, 1918, and there being apparently no further bar to final distribution to Maggie Steinberger, except possibly her own appeal from portions of the order settling the administrator's final account, a new claimant made her first appearance on the field of action, viz. Mary E. Ross, the surviving widow of one Albert E. Ross, deceased, who was alleged to have been a brother of R. E. Ross, the deceased husband of deceased, and to have survived such deceased husband of deceased. On March 16, 1918, more than 8 years after the institution of the proceeding for the settlement of the estate of deceased, and nearly nine months after the filing of the final account and petition for distribution, and after the hearing on such settlement and petition for distribution was practically completed, she appeared at the hearing on distribution, and, opposing distribution to Maggie G. Steinberger, instituted the proceeding provided for by section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, by filing a petition praying the court to ascertain and declare in the manner provided by that section the rights of all persons to the estate and all interests therein, and to whom distribution should be made. The theory of her claim to heirship was substantially that all of the property of deceased was the same property, "or the proceeds or avails thereof" which she, the deceased, had received under a decree of final distribution made in the year 1885 in the matter of the estate of her deceased husband, R. E. Ross; that all property received by her under such decree was separate property of said R. E. Ross at the time of his death; that deceased having died intestate, leaving no issue, the property of deceased should go to next of kin of her deceased husband, R. E. Ross, who also left no issue, as provided in subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code; that claimant Mary E. Ross, the surviving wife of Albert E. Ross, who was a surviving brother of R. E. Ross, and various other unnamed persons who were heirs at law of R. E. Ross, none of whom has appeared herein, were entitled to share in this estate as heirs, by virtue of the provisions of subdivision 8 of section 1386. Neither said Mary E. Ross nor any of the next of kin of the deceased husband of deceased, R. E. Ross, if any there were surviving, were parties to the action of Steinberger v. Young, and it is conceded that their rights, if any they had, were not concluded by the judgment in such action.

Upon the filing of this petition, the hearing on final distribution was continued to April 2, 1918, at which time Maggie G. Steinberger made a motion for an order dismissing the petition of Mary E. Ross, or such other order as might be proper, on the ground substantially that the estate was then in condition for distribution and would be unreasonably and unnecessarily delayed if deferred pending the proceeding provided by section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the question of the heirship of Mary E. Ross and all other persons should be heard and determined on the hearing on the pending petition for distribution. The court having heard the motion, made an order on May 24, 1918, denying the motion to dismiss the petition of Mary E. Ross, and also denying the petition for final distribution, without prejudice, however, to the rights of Maggie G. Steinberger. This is the order appealed from by the latter. At the same time the court made an order on the petition of Mary E. Ross, directing the notice required by section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure. In the meantime, viz. on May 3, 1918, Robert E. R. Scanlan had taken an appeal from the order denying his claim. This is the appeal entitled "In the Matter of the Estate of Elizabeth B. Ross, Deceased, L. A. No. 5758," 182 Pac. 752, this day decided, the order appealed from being affirmed. It may also be noted that the appeal of Maggie G. Steinberger from parts of the order settling the account was decided December 5, 1918 (Estate of Ross, L. A. No. 5705, 182 Pac. 303), and that all questions in regard to such account are now finally settled.

[1, 2] In view of our statutes and the decisions of this court thereunder, it is clear that the administrator was authorized to file with his final account his petition for the final distribution of the estate among the persons entitled to succeed thereto, and that the filing of this petition and the giving of the notice prescribed by law conferred upon the court jurisdiction in the proceeding thus initiated to proceed with the matter of such distribution immediately upon settlement by it of the final account. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1634, 1665; Estate of Sheid, 122 Cal. 528, 531, 55 Pac. 328; William Hill Co. v. Lawler, 116 Cal. 359, 361, 48 Pac. 323; Smith v. Westerfield, 88 Cal. 374, 379, 26 Pac. 206. It is entirely immaterial in this connection that the administrator has no legal interest in any dispute that may arise between claimants on distribution as to how the estate shall be distributed. The statute expressly authorizes the administrator to so initiate the proceeding, the purpose perhaps being, as was suggested in Estate of Sheid, supra, "to enable the administrator to hasten the closing of the estate, and to make one notice and one hearing serve both purposes." By the notice required by the law upon such a filing being given, as was said in the William Hill Co. v. Lawler, supra "the entire world is called before the court, and the court acquires jurisdiction over all persons for the purpose of determining their rights to any portion of the estate; and every person who may assert any right or claim therein is required to present his claim to the court for its determination." The law contemplates that this proceeding thus properly instituted shall be carried on to decree of distribution as speedily as is reasonably practicable with due regard to the interests of all concerned, and any interested party appearing is entitled to have it so carried on. Certainly such a party may justly complain of the absolute termination of such a proceeding by an order denying the petition, whether with or without prejudice to a future application, if no proper ground for such denial is made to appear. We need not discuss here the question whether, in view of the pending appeals, the one taken by Maggie G. Steinberger from parts of the order settling the administrator's final account, which parts allowed certain credits to the administrator objected to by her, and the other taken by Scanlan, to which we have heretofore referred, the trial court might properly, in the exercise of its discretion, have continued the hearing in the proceeding for distribution pending the determination of said appeals. The trial court did not do this, but absolutely terminated the distribution proceeding by denying it, and the question suggested is no longer of practical importance in the matter of this estate. It is clear that the mere fact of the pendency of these appeals afforded no warrant for the order denying the petition for distribution.

[3] Doubtless but for the petition filed by Mary E. Ross, the trial court would have proceeded with the matter of distribution. The record seems to indicate that the learned trial judge was of the view that the institution and pendency of the special proceeding given by section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, a proceeding in the nature of an action to determine heirship, either required or authorized a denial of the pending proceeding for distribution. We think it clear that it could not have such effect. The nature and effect of the proceeding authorized by this section, a special proceeding which may be instituted by "any person claiming to be heir to the deceased, or entitled to distribution in whole or in any part of such estate," for the purpose, as said in Whalen v. Smith, 163 Cal. 364, 125 Pac. 905, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1319, "of ascertaining and determining, in advance of distribution, the persons who have succeeded to the estate," are sufficiently shown by the section itself, and the decisions of this court thereunder make extended discussion unnecessary. The section itself provides:

> "Nothing in this section contained shall be construed to exclude the right upon final distribution of any estate to contest the question of heirship, title, or interest in the estate so distributed, where the same shall not have been determined under the provisions of this section, but where such question shall have been litigated under the provisions of this section, the determination thereof, as herein provided, shall be conclusive in the distribution of said estate."

In Estate of Sheid, 129 Cal. 172, 61 Pac. 920, the pendency of such a proceeding instituted prior to the filing of the petition for distribution was set up by way of a plea in abatement in the distribution proceeding, and it was held, quoting the portion of section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, above set forth, that the plea was not good. In Estate of Sheid, 122 Cal. 532, 55 Pac. 328, it was substantially held, referring to In re Oxarart, 78 Cal. 109, 20 Pac. 367, that notwithstanding the pendency of a proceeding under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, all questions of heirship and title to the estate can be properly determined in a distribution proceeding regularly initiated. In the Oxarart Case just cited, a proceeding under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, was instituted by a claimant, and thereafter the executor of the will filed his final account, together with a petition for final distribution. The petition for distribution having come on for hearing, the claimant sought a continuance thereof pending the determination of her proceeding under section 1664, Code of Civil Procedure, insisting that the court could not properly proceed with such hearing in the face of the pendency of her proceeding. The trial court's action in denying a continuance was approved by this court. It was substantially said that it was clear that the court had the power to proceed with the distribution proceeding, notwithstanding the pending proceeding under section 1664, and that it was plain that the question of heirship involved "might as well have been heard and determined on the hearing of the petition for distribution." The court plainly said that where the circumstances are such that the questions involved may as readily be determined on a pending proceeding for distribution, there is no good reason for even postponing the hearing and determination of the distribution proceeding merely because a proceeding under section 1664 has been initiated. Assuming that by reason of special circumstances a trial court might be justified in the exercise of a wise discretion in postponing the hearing on distribution, this court said:

> "In our judgment, the court very properly exercised its discretion in refusing to postpone the cause. If resort is to be had to the provisions of section 1664 to delay the settlement and distribution of estates, it had better never been passed. We have no doubt that the object of its enactment was to expedite such distribution by enabling persons claiming interests in estates to have their claims determined in advance of the application for distribution. * * * The determination of the proceedings initiated by the appellant * * * under section 1664 would have involved much delay, and would have deprived the devisee of the estate of his right on the showing made of having the question determined then and there on the application for distribution made by him."

In view of the expressions of this court referred to it seems clear, not only that the lower court erred in absolutely terminating the pending proceeding for distribution by its denial of the petition for distribution duly presented by the administrator, but also that there was nothing shown in connection with the attempted proceeding under section 1664 that would have warranted a continuance of the hearing of the distribution proceeding pending the determination of the proceeding under that section. Clearly the claim thereby made was one that could as well be determined in the latter proceeding as in a proceeding under section 1664. No showing whatever was made of inability to at once produce the testimony desired in support thereof. It is worthy of note that the petition filed by Mary E. Ross did not in its allegations of specific facts show any right in her to share in the estate of deceased, even upon the theory upon which she claimed such right.

[4] Under no circumstances does the "surviving widow" of a deceased brother of a deceased husband of a deceased take directly from such deceased under subdivision 8 of section 1386. The subdivision specified to whom the property shall go in the event therein stated, and such a surviving widow is not among those enumerated. She could only take through her dead husband, the brother of the deceased husband, or one or more of his descendants, and then only in the event that such husband or descendant survived deceased, Elizabeth B. Ross, for of course descent is cast under subdivision 8 of section 1386 as of the date of death of the surviving spouse whose estate is being administered and whose heirs are being determined. If no relative of the deceased spouse specified in said subdivision 8 of section 1386, Civil Code, survives the surviving spouse, there can be no succession under such subdivision. The petition of Mary E. Ross does not suggest that her husband or any descendant of her husband survived deceased, Elizabeth B. Ross, who died more than 25 years after her own husband's death. Nor does it specify the relationship to R. E. Ross, the deceased husband of deceased, of any of the unnamed "heirs at law" of said R. E. Ross, alleged "to claim an interest in the estate" of deceased, none of whom has ever appeared in this proceeding. We mention these facts solely to show the character of the petition interposed on the very eve of distribution, more than 8 years after the institution of the proceeding for the settlement of the estate of deceased, nearly nine months after the filing of the petition for distribution and notice given thereon, and after the hearing on distribution was practically concluded. We are satisfied that there was nothing shown in connection with the attempted proceeding under section 1664 that warranted either the denial of the petition for distribution or postponement of the hearing and determination thereof pending the determination of such attempted proceeding, and that in so far as the distribution proceeding was concerned the utmost effect to be given to the petition filed by Mary E. Ross was to treat it as a claim to be determined in that proceeding.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the matter remanded for proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

ATKINSON v. CHARLES NELSON CO. et al.
(Civ. 2568.)

1. Trover and Conversion 🔑25—Acts of Independent Contractor.

The fact of a boat company being an independent contractor under its contract with defendant to receive from another 20 spars belonging to defendant, and to transport and deliver them to S., defendant's agent, does not prevent defendant being guilty of conversion, where the company received, as part of such spars, 6 spars belonging to plaintiff, and transported and delivered them to S., and S sold them, and defendant refused to reimburse plaintiff therefor.

2. Principal and Agent 🔑23(3)—Agency—Evidence.

That defendant, engaging a boat company to transport spars belonging to defendant, directed it to deliver them to S., in the absence of a showing to the contrary, justifies inference, in action for conversion of spars belonging to plaintiff which the boat company took and delivered to S., that S., in receiving the spars, was the agent of defendant.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑1050(3)—Harmless Error—Admission.

Error in admission of evidence as to facts concerning which there is no substantial dispute is harmless.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by T. G. Atkinson against the Charles Nelson Company and others. From an adverse judgment, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cooley & Lachmund and A. E. Cooley, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry A. Jacobs and G. B. Blanckenburg, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action for damages for the alleged conversion of certain spars.

The plaintiff's assignor had delivered to the United States government at the Mare Island Navy Yard a number of spars 85 feet in length. Six of these had been rejected by the government, but were lying at the boom of the Mare Island Navy Yard pending their removal by the plaintiff's assignor. The defendant had also and about the same time delivered a number of spars of the maximum length of 65 feet to the United States government at said navy yard, of which 20 had been rejected, and these were also lying at the boom of the navy yard awaiting removal. This was the condition of things on May 17, 1914, when the defendant wrote the following letter to the general storekeeper in charge of whatever spars were at the boom of the navy yard, viz.:

"S. F., May 17, 1914.

"General Storekeeper, Mare Island:

"Please deliver to Oakland Launch & Towboat Company 20 rejected spars.

"The Charles Nelson Co.,
"Per James K. Nelson."

This letter, or order, was delivered to the captain in charge of a tug of the Oakland Launch & Towboat Company named therein, who was at the same time instructed by the defendant to deliver the spars named in said order when received by him to one R. B. Swayne in Oakland. In executing this order and instruction the captain of the tugboat of the Oakland Launch & Tugboat Company proceeded to Mare Island, and there received from the said storekeeper 20 spars, of which however, 6 were the rejected spars of the plaintiff's assignor, and these he transported to Oakland and delivered to said Swayne, who sold the entire lot to other parties. Later the plaintiff, to whom the 6 rejected spars had been assigned, sent a tugboat to Mare Island for the purpose of having his spars towed to San Francisco, and then for the first time learned that his spars had been delivered to the Oakland Launch & Tugboat Company on the defendant's order. Upon learning these facts the plaintiff, at first orally and then in writing, demanded of the defendant reimbursement for the value of the spars so taken. To these demands the defendant replied, disclaiming any liability for the plaintiff's spars, or any interest in the matter. Whereupon this suit was begun, and resulted in a judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $900, the value of said spars, and $188.14, interest thereon from the date of the alleged conversion.

[1, 2] The first and in fact the main contention of the appellant is that it was not guilty of the conversion of the spars in question, for the reason that the Oakland Launch & Tugboat Company, which actually received said spars from the government official at Mare Island, was an independent contractor, for whose tortious acts the appellant cannot be held responsible. It would seem to be conceded by the respondent that the authorities cited by the appellant sustain its contention that the said tugboat company, which received the respondent's 6 spars from the storekeeper at Mare Island upon the appellant's order to said storekeeper to deliver to the captain of the tug "20 rejected spars," was, in the receipt of the respondent's spars, an independent contracter, for whose mistake or tortious act the appellant would not be liable; but it seems to us that this is not the determining factor in the case, for the reason that the tugboat company, after receiving whatever spars it did receive under said order, was under its further instruction to deliver said spars to R. B. Swayne in Oakland. Had the appellant's said instruction to the towboat company been to deliver said spars to the appellant directly, and had it done so, and had the appellant sold said spars, its liability for their conversion could not be disputed. The evidence shows that the tugboat company was instructed by the appellant to deliver whatever spars it received from the storekeeper at Mare Island to R. B. Swayne, and that it obeyed said instruction. This in the absence of any showing to the contrary, would have been sufficient to have justified the inference that said R. B. Swayne was to be the agent of said appellant in receiving said spars.

This view is amply supported by the unquestioned fact that the appellant, in its dealing with the United States government in the matter of the sale to it of spars, was acting as the owner of whatever spars it had delivered at the Mare Island Navy Yard, and of whatever portion of said spars the government had rejected, and that it was seeking to have transported by the tugboat company and delivered in Oakland according to its instruction. Having shown such delivery of the 6 spars in question to Swayne, the consignee of the appellant's own selection, and having further proven that, upon being informed by the respondent that its chosen carrier had taken possession of his said spars and delivered them to Swayne and that the appellant made no other response or explanation than to disclaim either liability or interest in the premises, the plaintiff was entitled to rest upon the inference of Swayne's agency which thus arose, and the burden was, in our opinion, cast upon the defendant to rebut such inference by proof of the real relationship between itself and Swayne. This, however, the appellant made no effort to effectually do. In its briefs it is suggested that Swayne was not its agent, but was the agent of one Vallens, from whom it originally procured the spars which it had delivered at Mare Island upon the government requisition; but the proofs which it proffered do not justify this claim, but, on the contrary, seem to show that Swayne, in the receipt of these spars and in their resale, was acting for the appellant and made his accounting to it. For whatever of deficiency there may be in the proofs on this subject, the appellant must be held responsible, since all of the facts from which the relationship between itself and Swayne was to be inferred were within its own knowledge. Upon this branch of the case we are of the opinion that the plaintiff had made out a case of conversion when he had traced his missing spars into the custody of Swayne, who had resold them, and when he had failed to receive any satisfaction from the defendant upon demand for reimbursement for his spars.

[3] The appellant further contends that the court committed several errors in the admission of evidence. We have examined these, and are of the opinion that the appellant was not prejudicially affected by any of said errors (conceding them to be such), since the matters to which they refer cover evidence in regard to facts concerning which there is no substantial dispute.

The judgment is affirmed.

MEAD v. MEAD. (Civ. 1974.)

1. Trusts ⟹44(2)—Evidence—Sufficiency.

In a suit by a father against his son to compel the reconveyance of land conveyed to the son, on the ground that it was granted subject to a trust, etc., evidence held sufficient to sustain a judgment for plaintiff.

2. Witnesses ⟹240(2) — Examination — Leading Questions.

The allowance of leading questions is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and where plaintiff was a very old and feeble man it cannot be held that to allow leading questions to be propounded to him was an abuse of that discretion.

3. Trusts ⟹35(1) — Agreements to Hold in Trust.

In a suit by a father to compel reconveyance of land which he deeded to his son, on the ground that the conveyance was obtained by the son's claim that he would hold the property as trustee for his father, etc., the fact that the statements antedated a conveyance is no ground for denying reconveyance, where the father executed the deed in reliance thereon.

4. Trusts ⟹44(3)—Parol Trust—Rules of Evidence.

The rule that the evidence of a verbal agreement must be clear, satisfactory, and conclusive, where the effort is made to set aside a deed or have it adjudged affected by parol trust, is for the trial and not the appellate court.

5. Trusts ⟹107—Constructive Trusts — Rules of Evidence.

Where it is asserted that a conveyance was subject to a parol trust, and it appeared that the grantor, who was the father of the grantee, was an elderly man, and that a relation of business confidence existed between them, the transaction, being beneficial to the son, will be viewed with most scrutinizing care, and the presumption of fraud arises.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by W. H. Mead against Frank Mead. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

White, Miller, Needham & Harber, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Driver & Driver and G. W. Bedeau, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The matter in controversy is set out substantially in appellant's brief, as follows:

"Respondent and appellant are father and son respectively. By his bill of complaint respondent seeks a reconveyance of certain real property deeded by him to his son in the year 1911, when respondent was of the age of 76 years. The complaint, which was filed during the fall of 1916, * * * sets forth in substance that for several years prior to the date of the execution of the deed in question respondent was the owner of real property therein described; that he is of advanced age, is ignorant of business and legal transactions concerning the selling and conveying of real estate and title thereto, and that appellant had been his trusted agent and counselor in matters relating to the management of his real estate; that in the year 1909 respondent had executed a contract for the sale of said property on the installment plan, appellant acting as agent and adviser and having entire charge and management of the sale; that subsequently default was made in the payment of installments on the purchase price, whereupon appellant stated to respondent that the title to said real property would be clouded and trouble and litigation would result by the recordation of said contract by the purchasers; that defendant then advised plaintiff to convey said property to him and promised and agreed that if plaintiff did convey said property to him that he would hold the same in trust for plaintiff and would reconvey said property to plaintiff upon demand; that on April 4, 1911, respondent, without receiving any consideration, executed and delivered a deed of said real property to appellant, which was at once placed of record; and that appellant refuses to reconvey the same, although demand has been made. Appellant's answer contains certain denials of the alleged ignorance of the respondent, of the confidential relationship, of his alleged management of the sale, of the making of the alleged parol trust to reconvey on demand, of the execution and delivery of the deed because of the alleged confidential relation, or respondent's ignorance or inexperience or customary reliance upon appellant's advice, etc.; and alleged, on the contrary, that respondent conveyed said property to appellant of his own free will and volition and without any solicitation of any one, and without menace, fraud, or undue influence of any person.

"The issues thus presented were tried on December 5, 1917, by the court sitting without a jury, and the learned judge who presided concluded to grant the prayer of the complaint."

Two points only are made by appellant why this decree should be reversed, to wit: (1) The insufficiency of the evidence to support it, and (2) the abuse by the trial court of its discretion in permitting respondent's counsel to persist in propounding leading questions on direct examination.

[1] We will discuss the above points in the order named. It will not be necessary to quote extensively from the record, as a careful perusal of the same discloses a sharp conflict therein upon the material points, with sufficient and ample evidence to support the judgment of the trial court.

Indeed, the inquiry might properly be limited to one question, and that is whether the son induced the father to execute the deed upon the promise that the former would reconvey to the latter upon demand. If there is evidence in the record to justify an answer thereto in the affirmative, the judgment of the lower court must be affirmed. This is admitted by appellant in the following language:

> "It will clear the atmosphere if we concede at the outset of this reply that if our client induced his father to execute the deed in question on a promise to reconvey on request, then the son's refusal to reconvey constitutes such fraud that a court of equity will impose a trust on the legal title the son derived under the deed."

One has only to read the father's testimony to find support for the conclusion that the deed was executed under such conditions. Two or three questions and answers will show this beyond peradventure:

> "Q. I say, did he ask you to deed it to him? A. Yes; he wanted me to give him the deed so Osborne would not do anything. Q. Frank made certain representations to you about the Osborne proposition. Did you depend upon those representations when you made the deed? A. Yes. Q. Was that the reason why you made the deed? A. He would keep it so it would not get out of his hand, so Osborne would not get it. Q. What did Frank say to you, if anything, about deeding it back? A. He said when Osborne left, the property would return to me. He left, so I knew there would be no trouble with his wife. * * * Q. Did Frank tell you that if Osborne left the place he would deed the property back to you? A. Yes."

The trial court undoubtedly believed the witness, and it surely cannot be seriously contended that it is not a fair construction of his language that his son requested the deed and promised to return the property. We discover nothing cryptic or complicated in the testimony of the old man. It is true that he did not express himself as accurately or happily as one might wish, but the learned trial judge apparently understood him, and we are satisfied that he interpreted the language of the witness in accordance with the fair import of its terms. Of course, we might expect some inconsistency, some hesitation, and some confusion on the part of the plaintiff in attempting to narrate the occurrence in reference to the deed. He was an old man, 83 years of age; he was quite deaf; he had been stricken with paralysis; he was feeble in body; his mind, we may surmise, was greatly disturbed by the contemplation of his troubles, and was not altogether unimpaired by the ravages of time. An artist could hardly paint a more vivid picture of his condition than is presented by his own language:

> "I have been very sick. I have been in very bad shape. I wish I had died last night than come up here to-day. I wished I had been found dead. The trouble I have had. The trouble I have over loss of property, loss of property and money and health, too. I wished I had died last night. This morning they make me get up and come here. I wished to God I had died last night."

[2] Appellant complains that so many leading questions were addressed to the witness. This is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and we cannot say that it was abused. The physical and mental condition of the witness justified this manner of examination, and it may be added that there was no curtailment of the right and privilege of cross-examination. Indeed, the court invited the fullest inquiry on the part of appellant. Moreover, the witness, without the suggestion of a leading question, virtually stated that Frank had promised to deed the property back to him. That, at least, is a fair inference from the statement that we have already quoted in reference to the property returning to him.

Appellant contends that there are some inconsistencies in the testimony of plaintiff. That would not be surprising, and, granting the claim, they are not of such character as to demand the repudiation of the testimony as unworthy of belief. In this connection, it is claimed that the trial court misconstrued the following remark of respondent, made at the time of the execution of said deed: "It goes to Frank anyhow. He is going to get all I got. He is to have it." This was in response to the question of the scrivener, "Well, what is going to become of it if you should die?" The court below saw in the statement an implication that the deed was not intended as an absolute conveyance of the fee. Be that as it may, it is clear that the witness was referring to the time of his death, and it was then that Frank was to have all the property. This statement is not at all inconsistent with the theory that the property was to be returned to plaintiff upon the condition stated in his testimony. But the case is not to turn upon the proper construction of this somewhat doubtful expression, since there is direct evidence, as we have seen, in favor of respondent's position. It may be added that plaintiff was not required to explain to the scrivener the agreement between him and his son, and even if he had intentionally misled him in that respect no one would have any legal cause to complain.

[3] A further contention is that, if the father and son had such communications as are asserted by the former, they antedate the execution of the deed and constituted only negotiations that were superseded by the terms of the written instrument. As to this, appellant is in error. There is some evidence that said understanding was expressed at the time the deed was delivered. At any rate, it was not necessary for appellant to repeat the promise to make it binding, and it was just as significant made days before the transaction was consummated, provided it induced the father to convey the property. That the said promise did so move the father the trial court was entirely justified in finding.

[4] It is further contended that the general rule requiring only substantial support for the finding of the lower court does not apply to this class of cases where an effort is made to set aside a deed or to have it adjudged as affected by a trust not expressed in writing. The claim is that the evidence of a verbal agreement in such cases must be "clear, satisfactory, and conclusive," and that this case does not meet that test. We reflect, though, that such rule is for the trial and not the appellate court (Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 334, 27 Pac. 186), and we have no doubt that the evidence so appeared to the judge below.

[5] Moreover, there are certain circumstances established by the evidence which take this case out of the general rule in reference to the burden of proof. These we may briefly mention. Of first importance is the fact that the relation of trust and confidence existed between the parties. This is virtually conceded by appellant. At any rate, besides the inference created by the natural relation of father and son, the evidence shows that the father reposed implicit faith in his son, and that he had for years relied upon his advice in business transactions and maintained the closest bond of intimacy.

The record reveals this intimacy and shows the willingness of the son to profit by the situation thus created. To this circumstance must be added the fact that plaintiff had no independent advice, and the conveyance was without valuable consideration. Under such circumstances, the decisions hold uniformly that the transaction resulting in benefit to the trustee should be viewed with "the most scrutinizing jealousy," and that the presumption of fraud attaches and must be overcome by evidence that the deed is what it purports to be. Yordi v. Yordi, 6 Cal. App. 20, 91 Pac. 348; Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 15, 93 Pac. 289; Piercy v. Piercy, 18 Cal. App. 755, 124 Pac. 561; Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 145, 31 Pac. 910; Odell v. Moss, 130 Cal. 358, 62 Pac. 555; Cox v. Schnerr, 172 Cal. 371, 156 Pac. 509.

In the last of these decisions it is said:

> "The burden of proof usually rests upon the person asserting fraud, but when one bases a claim upon a contract obtained from a person to whom he stands in a relation of trust and confidence, it becomes his task to prove that he exhibited that uberrima fides which removes all doubt respecting the fairness of the contract."

However, the principle is well settled, and we need go no further in its exposition.

Viewing the evidence in the light of this presumption, there can be no earthly doubt of the justification for the court's finding.

What we have already said is, we think, a sufficient answer to appellant's second contention. We cannot say that the course pursued as to leading questions resulted in prejudice to appellant. It cannot be assumed that by the form of the question the witness was misled or induced to commit perjury. The trial court was in a position to determine whether such procedure was in the interest of justice, and it is not for us to say that error was thereby committed.

Probably the only surprising thing in the matter is that the son should have contested his father's claim. It is to be hoped that such cases are of infrequent occurrence. It is fair to suppose that nearly every son, even under the admitted circumstances of this case, would rather surrender the property to the father, who had earned it and believed he was entitled to have it reconveyed, than, by insisting upon a sordid legal right, bring his aged parent in sorrow to his grave.

It may be added that the son does not present a pleasing spectacle, when, by his testimony, he virtually brands his father as a perjurer. It would have been much better for him if he had obeyed the Commandment: "Honor thy father and thy mother."

The judgment is affirmed.

COLLINS v. BICKNELL. (Civ. 1870.)

1. PLEADING 🔑355—ANSWER AFTER TIME—STRIKING.

A court in proper case may, in the exercise of its discretion, strike out an answer filed after time.

2. PLEADING 🔑358—FRIVOLOUS ANSWER—STRIKING.

Where the answer and cross-complaint, which were filed by defendant after expiration of the time for filing the same, were wholly frivolous and without merit, so that plaintiff would have been entitled to judgment on the pleadings, defendant cannot complain of a judgment entered on an order striking from the records the answer and cross-complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by S. L. Collins against Annie G. Bicknell. From a judgment, entered upon an order granting plaintiff's motion to strike from the record an answer and cross-complaint, filed by the defendant after expiration of time within which to file the same, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. Irving McKenna and Catherine A. McKenna, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clyde Bishop and B. E. Tarver, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon an order of court granting plaintiff's motion to strike from the records an answer and cross-complaint filed by defendant after the time within which to file the same had expired.

[1, 2] The action was to recover upon a promissory note, copy of which was set forth in the complaint. A demurrer to a former pleading had been sustained, and defendant granted 10 days within which to file an amended answer and cross-complaint. The pleading stricken out was not only frivolous, sham, and wholly without merit, but was not filed until after the expiration of the time granted for the filing thereof. That a court in a proper case may, in the exercise of its discretion, strike out an answer so filed, admits of no question. Bowers v. Dickerson, 18 Cal. 420; Acock v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 216, 27 Pac. 193; Lunnun v. Morris, 7 Cal. App. 710, 95 Pac. 907. In the absence of a showing of abuse of such power, no cause exists for complaint by reason of the making of such order. In the instant case, as stated, the answer was wholly without merit and alleged no facts constituting any defense to the cause of action stated in the complaint; nor were any facts alleged in the cross-complaint upon which any affirmative relief could be granted defendant. Indeed, waiving all objection as to the pleading not being filed within time, plaintiff, upon demand therefor, would have been entitled to judgment on the pleadings.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. VICKROY. (Cr. 649.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 26, 1919.)

1. Criminal Law ⚷1159(3, 4) — Review — Weight of Evidence — Credibility of Witnesses.

Court of Appeals is not empowered to weigh conflicting evidence or pass upon the credibility of witnesses.

2. Criminal Law ⚷747—Jury—Weight of Evidence.

The weight of evidence as to disputed fact is for the jury.

3. Rape ⚷54(1) — Evidence — Uncorroborated Testimony of Prosecutrix.

In a prosecution for rape of female under 18 years of age, defendant can be convicted upon the uncorroborated evidence of prosecutrix.

4. Criminal Law ⚷723(2) — Trial — Conduct of Counsel—Argument to Jury.

In prosecution for rape of female under 18 years of age, statements by district attorney during argument to jury: "A man who would commit such a crime as is here charged against this defendant is a moral leper. He is a Hun. He becomes a vile ulcer suppurating on the shoulder of decency. He is a moral cancer on the breast of humanity"—held proper.

5. Criminal Law ⚷1037(2)—Review—Misconduct of Counsel.

Alleged misconduct of counsel in argument to jury will not be considered on appeal, though exception thereto was taken, where court was not requested to instruct jury to disregard it, unless the character thereof be such that its effect cannot be removed by such an instruction.

6. Witnesses ⚷270(2) — Cross-Examination—Impeachment—Conspiracy.

In prosecution for rape of female under 18 years of age, defendant was not entitled, during cross-examination of prosecutrix, to impeach her testimony by showing acts and conversations of others in which she had no part, on theory that a conspiracy existed to have defendant arrested for chastisement of prosecutrix's sister, even though there was evidence of such conspiracy; the fact of such conspiracy being collateral to the issue.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Charles J. Vickroy was convicted of rape upon a female under 18 years of age, and from judgment of imprisonment and an order denying motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Irwin & McNamara, of Fresno, and Edwards & Smith, of Denuba, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was charged with and convicted of the crime of rape, alleged to have been committed upon a female under the age of 18 years. Judgment of imprisonment followed, from which and an order denying his motion for a new trial he has appealed.

[1-3] Counsel for appellant, claiming the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, devote much of their argument, not to showing a want of sufficient evidence, but to a discussion of the weight which they claim should have been accorded the testimony of the respective parties. As we have so often said, but apparently without purpose, this court when considering cases on appeal is not empowered to weigh conflicting evidence or pass upon the credibility of witnesses. On this point, suffice it to say that the jury, whose province it was to weigh and determine the value of the evidence touching the fact in dispute, heard the direct and positive testimony of the prosecutrix, a girl some 12 or 13 years of age. If true, it proves conclusively that defendant was guilty of the crime charged. Nothwithstanding his denial and testimony tending to establish an alibi, the jury, under proper instructions as to the law applicable, found him guilty, thus, when compared with evidence offered on behalf of defendant, showing its belief in the truth of her testimony. The fact that she was contradicted by defendant, or even though she told conflicting stories, raises no question of law for the determination in this court on appeal. In this connection, appellant insists that, since there was no evidence offered in corroboration of the testimony of the prosecutrix (which fact, for the purposes of this case may be conceded), it, standing alone, even if believed by the jury, was insufficient to justify the verdict. In other words, he claims that as a matter of law the testimony of one upon whom a statutory rape has been committed, unless corroborated, will not warrant the conviction of the accused. We do not so understand the law; indeed, the contrary is held in People v. Stewart, 90 Cal. 212, 27 Pac. 200; People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880; and People v. Akey, 163 Cal. 54, 124 Pac. 718, in the last of which cases it is said:

> "It is a rule of evidence in this state that, in a prosecution for rape, the defendant may be convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecuting witness."

Hence, there is no merit in the appellant's contention that the court committed prejudicial error by instructing the jury that it was not essential to the conviction of defendant that the testimony of the prosecuting witness should be corroborated. While it is true that in exceptional cases judgments rendered upon convictions for rape where the testimony of the complaining witness was uncorroborated have been reversed, circumstances were made to appear throwing discredit upon such testimony or tending to show the improbability thereof. People v. Ardaga, 51 Cal. 371. No facts are made to appear bringing this case within the exception, and the rule announced above prevails.

The instructions given, taken as a whole, went to the full extent in protecting defendant in his substantial rights; the court, among other things, telling the jury that, owing to the nature of the charge from which it is difficult for a defendant to clear himself, they should examine the testimony of the prosecutrix with caution, and, unless they were "satisfied to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that the case is made out by evidence convincing you to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt," should find defendant not guilty.

[4, 5] It is also claimed that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct, the effect of which was to prejudice the right of defendant in the minds of the jury. An examination of that part of the record upon which this claim is based discloses no ground therefor. Appellant's contention in this behalf is fairly illustrated by the fact that the district attorney in the course of his argument said:

> "I tell you, gentlemen of the jury, a man who would commit such a crime as is here charged against this defendant is a moral leper. He is a Hun. He becomes a vile ulcer suppurating on the shoulder of decency. He is a moral cancer on the breast of humanity."

To which, in response to defendant's objection, the court replied:

> "I see nothing wrong in counsel's remark."

That any decent person should entertain a contrary view to that expressed by the district attorney as to this most heinous offense is to us inconceivable. Moreover, even were there any merit in the claim that the district attorney was guilty as contended, the misconduct was not assigned as prejudicial, nor was any request made that the jury be admonished to pay no heed to it, without which action there is no ground for complaint in the appellate court. People v. Vaughn, 25 Cal. App. 736, 147 Pac. 116, 117. Where the district attorney is guilty of misconduct in the course of his argument to the jury, a mere exception thereto by the defendant is no ground for reversal of the judgment. It must be made to appear that it was improper and prejudicial and at the time assigned as error, accompanied by a request that the court instruct the jury to disregard it, unless the character thereof be such that its effect cannot be removed by such an instruction. People v. Shears, 133 Cal. 154, 65 Pac. 295.

[6] The court appears to have accorded appellant the widest latitude in the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness for the purpose of showing ill feeling or animus on her part toward defendant due to chastisement of her sister, for which act it seems there had been some talk among the members of the family of having him arrested. Upon this showing it is claimed a conspiracy existed which defendant was entitled to prove by independent evidence, followed by the claim that the prosecutrix was bound by the acts of her coconspirators. There was no evidence of a conspiracy to have defendant arrested for correcting the sister; but, assuming there was, such fact was collateral to the issue being tried, and neither tended to prove nor disprove defendant's guilt. In so far as he was entitled, defendant was given every opportunity in the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, but he was not, upon the theory that a conspiracy existed, entitled to impeach her testimony by showing acts and conversations of others in which she had no part.

Owing to the gravity of the case, and notwithstanding the want of a proper and intelligible brief or argument on the part of appellant directing the court's attention to what he deems to be errors, together with the reasons for such claims, we have carefully examined and read the entire record and satisfied ourselves that in his trial defendant was accorded every right to which he was legally entitled, and that it discloses no error which can be held to have prejudiced him in his substantial rights.

PEOPLE v. FLOOD. (Cr. 645.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑383—EVIDENCE—IDENTIFICATION.

In a forgery case, a bank teller's testimony that accused presented the check in question, but that he could not positively identify him, is competent.

2. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑511(9)—CORROBORATION OF ACCOMPLICE.

In a forgery case, an accomplice's testimony was sufficiently corroborated, as required by Penal Code, § 111, by a witness' testimony that accused had borrowed his typewriter to aid in the forgery and by a bank teller's partial identifications of accused.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑508(1)—TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICE—OTHER OFFENSE.

In a forgery case, an accomplice's testimony that he and accused had attempted to pass another forged check upon another bank the same day was admissible.

4. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑508(1)—EVIDENCE—ACCOMPLICES.

The competency of an accomplice's testimony is governed by the same rules as apply to the testimony of other witnesses.

5. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑383—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—CONVICTION OF ANOTHER.

In a forgery case, excluding court records in which another had pleaded guilty to the same offense is proper, since that would not tend to establish accused's innocence, for the same offense might have been committed by several persons.

6. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑419, 420(1)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

In a forgery case, testimony that a third party had admitted to the witness that he had committed the forgery in question is inadmissible, because hearsay.

7. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1186(4)—APPEAL AND ERROR—EVIDENCE.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, a forgery conviction will not be reversed for alleged errors in evidence rulings unless the record shows a miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Charles P. Flood was convicted of forgery, and appeals. Affirmed.

Paul W. Schenck and Richard Kittrelle, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Jerry H. Powell, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant, jointly with Robert A. Benkert, was, by information containing two counts, charged with the crime of forging two checks, copies of which are set forth in the information. Upon a separate trial given him, he was convicted upon both counts of the information. His motion for a new trial was denied, and from this order and the judgment of imprisonment pronounced he has appealed.

Of the several alleged errors assigned as grounds for reversal, the most important thereof, says counsel for appellant, is want of evidence sufficient to corroborate the testimony of Benkert, who was a self-confessed accomplice of defendant in the commission of the crime. It appears from the testimony of Benkert that in January, 1918, he and defendant, who were engaged in business together, conceived the idea of obtaining money from banks by means of forged checks. With that end in view, they procured a pad of checks upon the Exchange National Bank of Long Beach, and during the week ending with January 12, 1918, prepared the forged checks described in the information, one of which was made to the order of John Norton, signed by R. D. Lindsay and certified by W. J. Gardner, cashier of said Exchange National Bank, payable for the sum of $4,520.80; the other purported to be drawn by Ed Collins, payable to L. N. Brooks and likewise certified, calling for the payment of $4,855.75; and both of which purported to be indorsed by the payee named therein, and both of which were marked "O. K.," with the initials "J. A. G." following. The names of the makers and payees in these checks were fictitious, and the name of Gardner, as well as everything contained in the checks, was forged. The initials "J. A. G." purported to be the initials of J. A. Graves, vice president and manager of the Farmers' & Merchants' National Bank, by which the checks were paid when presented. It was the custom of the bank on Saturdays to close its doors at 12 o'clock, as a result of which there was more or less congestion of business immediately before that hour. On Saturday, January 12, 1918, shortly before 12 o'clock defendant and Benkert, pursuant to their agreement so to do, went to the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank, at which time defendant presented one of the checks to one of the tellers therein, who paid the same, and Benkert presented the other check to one of the tellers, who likewise paid it. Thereupon they left the bank and subsequently divided the money equally between the two.

That the uncontradicted testimony to Benkert conclusively shows that the defendant committed the forgery and unlawfully and feloniously uttered, published, and passed the checks upon which he fraudulently and feloniously procured the money, admits of no controversy. Nevertheless, under the provisions of section 1111, Penal Code, such testimony is insufficient upon which to warrant the conviction, unless it be corroborated by such other evidence as shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. It appears from Benkert's testimony that in the preparation of the checks a typewriter was used; that a few days prior to January 12th defendant and Benkert met in a saloon at Venice; that defendant left Benkert, stating that he would try to find a typewriter upon which to do the work; that shortly thereafter he returned and stated they could use the typewriter in the office of Mr. C. G. Parkhurst. Thereupon, it being in the evening and after dark, they went to the office of Parkhurst, Benkert taking in his hand the pad of checks, where the typewriting upon the checks was executed upon the typewriter of Mr. Parkhurst. The forging of the names of the purported makers to the checks was done in the office of defendant and Benkert, located in the city of Los Angeles. Other indorsements on the checks were made at the Farmers' & Merchants' Bank. In corroboration of this testimony Mr. Parkhurst testified that he remembered an occasion, soon after the first of the year, when Mr. Flood came to his office and asked for the privilege of using his typewriter; that it was after dark; that he replied in the affirmative; whereupon defendant went out and came back with Mr. Benkert, who had some papers in his hand; that they went into a back room and, turning on the lights, closed the door and used the typewriter; that he, telling them that when they got through to put out the lights and close the door, went away. The same typewriter was produced in court at the trial and an exemplar of the typewriting found upon the forged checks was introduced in evidence, which without contradiction showed that the work done upon the typewriter in court was identical with that upon the forged checks.

[1] That this evidence was inculpatory and tended strongly to connect the defendant with the offense, to our minds, admits of no doubt. People v. Morton, 139 Cal. 719, 73 Pac. 609. Moreover, Mr. Hogan, the teller who paid one of the checks, testified that, while he could not say absolutely that defendant was the man who presented the check, "my best opinion is that the defendant presented the check to me; that is my best opinion;" that in size, height, and general appearance he compared favorably with defendant and appeared to be the same man.

[2] While this witness was not absolutely certain of defendant's identity, nevertheless his testimony tended to establish such fact, and this was sufficient to entitle it to admission, the weight thereof being for the jury to determine. People v. Young, 102 Cal. 411, 36 Pac. 770; People v. Rolfe, 61 Cal. 540; People v. Barker, 114 Cal. 617, 46 Pac. 601. In addition to all of this, there was other equally cogent evidence which clearly tended to connect defendant with the commission of the crime. "Strong corroborative evidence is not necessary. * * * Even though the circumstances constituting the evidence offered and received in corroboration of the testimony of an accomplice be slight, such evidence is nevertheless sufficient to meet the requirements of the law if, in and of itself, it tends to connect the accused with commission of the offense." People v. Martin, 19 Cal. App. 295, 125 Pac. 919; People v. Garwood, 11 Cal. App. 665, 106 Pac. 113; People v. McLean, 84 Cal. 482, 24 Pac. 32.

[3] For the purpose of showing guilty knowledge and intent, Benkert was allowed, over defendant's objection, to testify to matters in connection with an attempt made on the same day and at about the same time to pass another forged check upon the California Commercial & Savings Bank, which ruling is assigned as error. While appellant concedes the general rule that such evidence is proper, as held in People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 472, 98 Pac. 194, and People v. Bercovitz, 163 Cal. 636, 126 Pac. 479, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 667, he nevertheless insists that the rule does not apply to such testimony when given by a codefendant.

[4] The fact that a witness is an accomplice constitutes no ground upon which to base an objection to his testimony, which as to its competency is governed by the same rules applicable to testimony of witnesses having no part in the commission of the offense charged. People v. Grundell, 75 Cal. 301, 17 Pac. 214. The provision of the statute requiring that the testimony of an accomplice must be corroborated by other evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense before he can be convicted, "does not mean that the accomplice may not be believed." People v. Hoosier, 24 Cal. App. 746, 142 Pac. 514. The testimony of Benkert with respect to the attempted negotiation of the check upon the California Commercial & Savings Bank is fully corroborated by two witnesses.

[5] It appears that one Carl Du Vey was charged with the same crime of which defendant was convicted, to which charge Du Vey entered a plea of guilty. Error is predicated upon the ruling of the court in refusing to permit the introduction of the judgment and records in the Du Vey case, and also in sustaining objections to testimony sought to be elicited from one Stemshorn that Du Vey cashed one of the checks set forth in the information charging defendant with the commission of the crime, and that Du Vey made statements to one George Pross which tended to show that Du Vey committed the offense, the purpose of all of which was to show that defendant did not commit the offense. In the case of People v. Mitchell, 100 Cal. 328, 34 Pac. 698, a general statement is made that it is always proper to show that some person other than the defendant committed the crime with which he is charged. While a correct statement of the law as applied to the circumstances involved in that case, it is inapplicable where the offense charged could as well have been committed by a half-dozen persons as by one. Conceding that Du Vey was guilty, such fact would not tend to establish the innocence of defendant. "The evidence offered by accused as to the commission of the crime by another person must be limited to such facts as are inconsistent with his own guilt, and to such facts as raise a reasonable inference or presumption as to his own innocence. * * *" 16 Corpus Juris, 560, § 1085.

In People v. Johnson, 47 Cal. 122, the defendant and one Emerson had been jointly indicted for the crime of burglary. It was there held that the conviction of Emerson did not raise a presumption that defendant was innocent.

[6] As to the testimony sought to be elicited from the witness Pross as to the statements made to him by Du Vey, it was clearly hearsay and the objection thereto was properly sustained. Evidence of "the declaration of another person that he committed the crime, is not admissible." Hence the court did not err in sustaining objections to the proffered evidence consisting of the record in the case of Du Vey and his admission that he passed one of the checks.

[7] There are a number of alleged errors predicated upon rulings of the court in the admission and rejection of evidence, appellant's contentions as to some of which are disposed of in the views hereinbefore expressed. As to the others, it may be said the record discloses beyond the shadow of doubt that defendant committed the crime with which he was charged, and, conceding that some of the numerous rulings of the court may have been erroneous, it it apparent that they did not result in a miscarriage of justice. "Charity covers a multitude of sins," and it is equally true that section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution covers a multitude of errors; indeed, all errors predicated upon "the improper admission or rejection of evidence, * * * unless, after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." To justify a reversal it is not sufficient, standing alone, that error be made to appear, but "that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Unless such fact is made to appear from the record, it is the duty of the court, notwithstanding the alleged error, to affirm the judgment.

An examination of appellant's objections to the information, based upon alleged insufficiency thereof, shows the attack to be groundless, and it is unnecessary to discuss the same.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

KLINGENSTEIN v. MIEHLE PRINTING PRESS & MFG. CO. et al. (Civ. 2827.)

1. Master and Servant 🔑277 — Injury to Servant — Evidence of Relation — Independent Contractor's Assistant.

In an action for death of plaintiff's intestate by the fall of a printing press which he was assisting to move and install in the purchaser's pressroom under the direction of the seller's installer, evidence held to warrant a finding that the intestate was at the time in the service of the seller, and not of an independent contractor engaged to convey the press to the pressroom floor by whom intestate had been engaged.

2. Master and Servant 🔑189(2)—Injuries to Employé——Liability for Acts of Representative.

A printing press company's erector who is in charge of the work of uncrating, assembling and erecting a press sold by the company and who is its sole representative on the ground at the time of injury to one assisting him in the work has such authority that it is liable for his acts or omissions.

3. Trial 🔑133(2)—Misconduct of Counsel—Reference to Insurance.

Where one of defendant's witnesses, who was in its employ, stated that his expenses were being paid by an insurance company, held that, where the answer was stricken, and, when the subject was later opened up, the jury was instructed to disregard that matter, any error was cured.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Clifton H. Connick, Judge, at the trial, and George D. Murray, Judge, at the motion for new trial.

Action by B. Mary Klingenstein, as administratrix of the estate of Frederick Klingenstein, deceased, against the Miehle Printing Press & Manufacturing Company and another. From a judgment against it alone, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank McGowan, Walter H. Linforth and Mastick & Partridge, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Mahan & Mahan and Coonan & Kehoe, both of Eureka, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor and against the defendant Miehle Printing Press & Manufacturing Company for the sum of $15,000 for damages arising out of the death of one Frederick Klingenstein, the husband of plaintiff, through the alleged negligence of said defendant. As to the codefendant McGaraghan the verdict and judgment exonerated him from liability.

There is no substantial dispute as to the facts of the case. On and prior to the 7th day of August, 1913, the defendant Miehle Printing Press & Manufacturing Company was the owner of a printing press described as a No. 1 Pony Miehle Printing Press, which it on said day contracted to sell and deliver to the firm of Lambert & McKeehan, printers, at Eureka, the purchase price to be paid in installments during a period of two years thereafter, title to remain in the seller until the installments were fully paid. On August 27, 1913, the said defendant Miehle Printing Press & Manufacturing Company, in contemplation of the delivery of said press to the purchaser, entered into a written contract with its codefendant McGaraghan, a drayman of Eureka, wherein the latter offered to "unload, haul and handle" said press and to convey the same "from the steamer to the pressroom of Lambert & McKeehan for the price of $7.50; we to furnish all necessary ropes, planks, tools, etc., and we to be responsible for damages done to property or persons while said press is in our care. And we agree to allow use of ropes, planks, tools, etc., free of charge to your erector while erecting press. Any labor desired by you to assist your erector in setting press will be furnished you by us on request at 50 cents per hour per man." This offer, which was upon one of the printed forms of the said printing press company, was negotiated, signed, and accepted by the parties thereto at the pressrooms of the said purchasers of the press and after an inspection of the premises by McGaraghan, accompanied by the agent of his said codefendant, during which it appeared that the press was to be delivered through a back way to the pressroom and admitted to the floor thereof through the back door. At the time this contract was entered into none of the immediate parties to it knew where the press was to be set up in the pressroom, since that, apparently, was a matter to be determined by the seller's erector, who was later to appear upon the scene. The press arrived at the steamer landing in Eureka on or about October 6, 1913, and on that day also one J. C. Nicholson also reached that city. Said Nicholson was an employé of the said defendant Printing Press Company charged with the duty of erecting and installing said press. He had been engaged in the business of erecting printing presses by his said employer for some eight or nine years, and his duties, as defined by himself when on the witness stand on behalf of his said employer, were "to assemble the machine and put it in running order; handle the various parts of it." In the performance of these duties, according to his own statement, he was to uncrate the several parts of the press for the purpose of assembling, putting in place, and erecting the same. Nicholson had been sent to Eureka by his said employer in conformity with its agreement with the purchasers of the press providing that—

> "The vendor agrees to send a competent man to erect and put said press in first-class running order."

On reaching Eureka, Nicholson went to the pressrom, and there determined the place upon the floor thereof where the press when erected was to stand, and directed the removal of certain other machinery and appliances then occupying said floor so as to make room for the assembling and erection of the press. He then inquired as to what drayman was to haul the press to its destination, and was informed that McGaraghan had the contract so to do. He sought McGaraghan and arranged for the delivery of the press on the following day, and for the engagement of two men who were to assist him in the installation of the press. McGaraghan thereupon enlisted the services of the deceased, Frederick Klingenstein, and of one P. W. Davis, who were to assist him in the performance of his agreement for the drayage of the press, and were also to continue to assist Nicholson in the erection of the press after McGaraghan's duties in respect to its delivery were done. On the following morning McGaraghan with his said two assistants loaded the main body of the press, weighing about two tons, on his dray, and hauled it to the rear of Lambert & McKeehan's printing office, unloading it in the alley, and, conveying it through the back door of the pressroom, deposited it on the pressroom floor inside the door. Nicholson was there clad in working clothes and ready to begin the work of assembling and installing the press. The work of conveying the heavy portion of the press, which was crated and lying on the floor of the pressroom, was immediately entered upon by Nicholson, and with the assistance of Klingenstein and Davis. McGaraghan went out to get some other parts of the machine, but presently returned, and was standing by while the work of moving the heavy crate in the direction of the spot which the press when fully assembled was to occupy. Mr. Nicholson suggested the advisability of putting rollers under the crate, but Davis thought it could be handled with a jack, and Nicholson apparently acquiesced in this suggestion. While the press was thus being moved across the floor, which at the time was greasy and slippery with oil, the crate tilted over and fell upon Klingenstein, causing his death, as a result of which this action was instituted by his widow against both of the defendants herein.

[1] It does not seem to be seriously contended that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover against one or the other of these defendants, the main question discussed upon this appeal being that at the moment of the accident it was McGaraghan, and not the appellant herein, who was in charge of the work of moving the crate containing said press across the pressroom floor, which work he was performing under the terms of his contract with his codefendant, and in the doing of which he was an independent contractor, for whose acts or omissions of duty this appellant cannot be held responsible. We are unable to give our support to this contention upon the facts of this case, which we deem amply sufficient to have justified the jury in finding a verdict against the defendant (appellant) and in exoneration of McGaraghan. The contract of appellant with McGaraghan was that he should convey the press in question "to the pressroom floor" of its purchaser. This contract had been fulfilled when the press was laid upon the pressroom floor, and when, as the evidence sufficiently showed, the appellant's employé Nicholson undertook the task of moving it to the particular place upon said floor where the work of its installation was to be performed. The two assistants of McGaraghan, who were his employés while his contract was being executed, became the employés of the appellant by the express terms of its agreement with McGaraghan from the moment Nicholson's duties began.

It is not necessary to further review the evidence which justified the jury in reaching this conclusion, but it might be pointed out that the acts of the appellant's employé, Nicholson, immediately attending and succeeding the death of Klingenstein, as testified to by himself, indicate that he considered himself as in charge of the situation at the time the casualty occurred, as, for example, he was actually occupied in helping to move the press when it fell upon Klingenstein; he directed Davis to hire another man to replace the deceased; he proceeded on the morrow to raise and uncrate the press; he paid on behalf of his employer the wages of Davis and of the successor of Klingenstein.

[2] It is contended by the appellant that Nicholson was a mere mechanic without authority in the premises, but the evidence of the nature, extent, and importance of Nicholson's past and present employment and duties does not support this view. His business was that of an erector or installer of printing presses. He had been in the employ of the appellant in that capacity for several years. He was in full charge of the work of uncrating, assembling, and erecting this press, of selecting its location and of putting it into operation. He had the power of selection and control of those who were to assist him in this work. He was, in fact, the appellant's sole representative on the ground at the time of the accident in which Klingenstein lost his life, and hence his acts or omissions in the premises must be held to be the acts or omissions of his employer, the appellant herein.

[3] There are several assignments of error in the rulings of the trial court and in its instructions to the jury. We have examined these, but do not deem it necessary to refer to them in detail. As to the rulings of the court in the admission or rejection of certain evidence we find no prejudicial error. Upon oral argument appellant's counsel waxed warm over the alleged misconduct of the plaintiff in respect to the question as to whether Nicholson's expenses at the trial were being paid by "an insurance company," as tending to prejudice the appellant's case in the minds of the jury; but the record shows that the basis for this inquiry was supplied by the witness Nicholson himself, who volunteered the statement that his expenses were thus being paid. This portion of his answer was stricken out by the court, and, the subject thus opened being later adverted to, the court ruled out all evidence on the subject as improper, and instructed the jury to disregard all questions and answers touching the subject. We are satisfied that the error, if any, growing out of the witness Nicholson's volunteered remark was thus sufficiently cured.

As to the matter of the court's instructions, we have examined these as a whole, and are satisfied that they fully, fairly, and adequately state the law of the case, and that whatever instructions asked by the appellant the court refused to give were fully covered by those which were given by the court.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment is affirmed.

TOBEY v. RANDALL. (Civ. 1883.)

APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑766—BRIEFS—PRINTING PORTION OF RECORD.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953c, providing that in cases appealed upon typewritten transcripts the parties must print in their briefs the material portions of the record, etc., the court will not search typewritten transcript for further information; and, where parties disagree as to facts, and appellant has not complied with rule, the case will be affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Arizona Tobey against Frances H. Randall. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Earl Rogers and Milton M. Cohen, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gordon, Elliott & Gordon, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In the briefs of counsel for appellant we are informed that this is an action to compel specific performance of a contract; and that the appeal is from a judgment entered after an order sustaining a demurrer to the second amended complaint, without leave to amend. The opening brief contains a statement that the second amended complaint "alleges in summary" certain facts concerning transactions between plaintiff and defendant. But the learned writers do not favor us with even a summary statement of the contents of the demurrer which was so fatal to their third attempt to state a cause of action.

Where the record is prepared under the "alternative method" now allowed, and the parties do not cause to be printed in their briefs or in a supplement thereto those portions of the record which they desire to call to the attention of the court, the court will not search the typewritten transcript for further information. Code Civ. Proc. § 953c; Barker Bros. v. Joos, 171 Pac. 1085; Magee v. Burt Motorcar Co., 174 Pac. 687; Scott v. Hollywood Park Co., 176 Cal. 681, 169 Pac. 379; Chandlee v. McCalla (Sup.) 178 Pac. 709.

The arguments in the briefs in this case indicate (although the facts do not so appear in the "summary" of the complaint) that the agreement which plaintiff seeks to have specifically performed was one not to be performed within a year from the making thereof, and that the agreement was not in writing and subscribed by the defendant. Appellant in her brief says that respondent "agreed, contracted, and represented" that from the water supply owned by her on land adjoining that sold by her to appellant the respondent would furnish, from the system already in operation, ample water for all flats and dwellings erected by appellant on the property purchased by her. In the brief of respondent we are told that it is nowhere specifically alleged that the defendant entered into a contract to do any of the matters set forth in the complaint.

These illustrations show that counsel disagree about the facts, and that we cannot ascertain the precise facts upon which the appeal should be determined, without examining the typewritten record. While it would not be difficult, in the case of a short record, for the court to disregard the rule, it must not be forgotten that in many cases the records are long and complicated. The rule exists in the statute, for the very purpose of compelling counsel to select from the record, and accurately present for convenient reference, those portions of the record which are necessary to a decision. The time which judges might consume in searching through the original transcript of a case is time taken from other cases that wait for attention.

But the rule should be uniformly enforced, or else should be abandoned. We have no inclination to declare it abandoned, and such declaration would be out of harmony with the law, even if we were so inclined.

The judgment is affirmed.

INSURANCE 🔑530 — ACCIDENT INSURANCE POLICY.

Though an accident policy, providing for payment of a specified sum in case of the death of the insured on account of bodily injuries accidentally sustained, declared that if injury should be a hernia the limit of liability should be $50, the beneficiary is entitled to recover the full amount, where the insured suffered an accident causing a hernia of which he shortly died; the hernia being regarded as the result of the accident and the accident itself and not the hernia as the cause of death.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Sam Ellen Hanna against the Interstate Business Men's Accident Association of Des Moines, Iowa. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Haines and Dunshee, Haines & Brody, all of Des Moines, Iowa, and Hadsell, Sweet & Ingalls, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Jacobs & Oliver, of San Francisco, and Frank E. Green, of Seattle, Wash., for respondent.

HAVEN, J. Plaintiff sued as beneficiary under a policy of accident insurance issued to her deceased husband by defendant. Verdict and judgment were entered for plaintiff for the sum of $5,000 being the full amount specified in the policy, from which judgment defendant appeals.

Under the terms of the policy, the defendant agreed to pay to the beneficiary, in case of the death of the insured, "the sums hereinafter specified, for loss of life, * * * on account of bodily injuries sustained by the member * * * effected directly and independently of any other contributing, concurring or intervening cause, by external, violent and accidental means." Certain conditions and limitations were specified in the policy and made a part thereof. Those material to the consideration of this appeal are the following:

> "If, as a result of such injury, independently of all other causes, intervening, contributing or concurring, the death of the member shall occur within ninety days from the date thereof, the association shall pay the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00), which shall be in full and complete satisfaction of every claim against it, including any claim for disability."

Then follows a specification of certain "Special Limited Benefits and Indemnities," among which is the following:

> "C. Hernia.—If the bodily injury be a hernia, the limit of the liability of the association shall be fifty dollars ($50.00)."

The appellant contends that its liability under the policy was limited to the sum of $50, for the reason that the death of the insured resulted from hernia. It was alleged in the complaint that the insured "received personal injuries through external, violent and accidental means, to wit: By being struck on his chest and abdomen by a heavy board, plank, or piece of wood, causing a strangulated hernia and a strangulation and paralysis of his bowels. That by reason of the aforesaid injuries and as the direct result thereof, independently of any other contributing, concurring, or intervening cause, the said insured died on or about the 30th day of November, 1916." The evidence disclosed that at the time mentioned in the complaint the insured was moving a heavy plank when he slipped and the end of the plank struck him on the chest and abdomen; that he immediately suffered great pain, and showed signs of serious injury; that a physician examined the deceased about 20 minutes after the accident and discovered a severe strangulated hernia, which was conceded to be the result of the fall and blow. The insured was operated on immediately and the hernia reduced, but he died seven days later from paralysis of the bowl and gangrene, resulting from the injuries received at the time of the accident. The appellant admits the above facts, but claims that the bodily injury from which death resulted was the hernia, and not the accidental blow from the plank.

The question involved is whether or not the liability of the defendant is limited to $50 under the terms of the policy, when death results from a hernia, which in turn is caused by an accidental blow of the character above set forth. Under familiar legal principles the hernia must be regarded as the result of the accident, and the accident itself, and not the resultant hernia, as the cause of the death. The provision in the policy for insurance against loss of life "on account of bodily injuries" is equivalent to loss of life caused by bodily injuries, which injuries under the further provisions of the policy must have been "effected directly and independently of any other contributing, concurring or intervening cause, by external, violent and accidental means." The cause of the injury is that which sets in motion a train of events which brings about a result without the intervention of any force operating or working actively from a new and independent source. In this case there can be no question but that the accidental blow from the plank was such cause. The hernia was one of the effects of such cause, but likewise was the resulting death.

The exact question here involved has been considered in a number of cases, all of which are in accord with the views above expressed. In several of such cases the reasons for refusing to insurance companies the benefit of a reduced liability on account of death resulting from hernia, under provisions of policies of accident insurance of like effect to those of the policy here involved, as far as the question now under consideration is concerned, received careful and exhaustive consideration. The courts to which such question has been submitted have been uniform in holding that, under facts similar to those in the case at bar, the death was caused by the accident from which the hernia resulted, and not by the hernia itself. They have refused, therefore, to reduce the liability of the insurance company. The leading cases so holding are: Berry v. United Commercial Travelers' of America, 172 Iowa, 429, 154 N. W. 598, L. R. A. 1916B, 617, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 706; Travelers' Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Murray, 16 Colo. 296, 26 Pac. 774, 25 Am. St. Rep. 267; Summers v. Fidelity Mutual Aid Ass'n, 84 Mo. App. 605; Atlanta Accident Ass'n v. Alexander, 104 Ga. 709, 30 S. E. 939, 42 L. R. A. 188. Appellant concedes that the authorities above referred to are contrary to its contention, but claims that provisions of the policies involved in said cases to the effect that the insurance "does not cover accident nor death resulting wholly or partly from * * * hernia" differentiate the cases from the facts of the instant case. In our opinion, the reasoning of the authorities referred to applies with equal force to the policy now under consideration. The only case cited by appellant which sustains a reduced liability of the insurance company for death resulting from hernia is Keen v. Continental Casualty Co., 175 Iowa, 513, 154 N. W. 409. In that case the exempting clause was:

> "Where accidental injury results in hernia * * * the amount payable shall be one-fourth of the amount which otherwise would be payable."

This is a very different provision from the one contained in the policy in the instant case or those involved in the other cases above referred to.

Appellant complains of certain instructions given by the trial court as being contradictory and as assuming facts not in evidence. The instructions as a whole correctly stated the law as applicable to the facts in issue, and we fail to find therein any prejudicial error.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Edwin G. Forbes, administrator of John C. Forbes, deceased, against E. F. Forbes, administrator of E. A. Forbes, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Michael & Nathan and Jacob Schlussel, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and C. W. Thomas, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. On the 19th day of August, 1889, Alexander Forbes and his two sons, E. A. and John C. Forbes, the latter known as Clarence Forbes, granted and transferred the lands and premises mentioned in the complaint and other lands to one Mary E. Wilson, for the sum of $18,000. Twelve thousand dollars of this amount was for the lands belonging to the two sons, and $6,000 was for lands belonging to the father. There was paid on account of the purchase price $6,000, which was divided between the grantors, and several promissory notes for the aggregate sum of $12,000, secured by a mortgage on all the property were executed by Mary E. Wilson and her husband. The Wilsons were unable to pay the notes, and on the 5th day of January, 1891, they reconveyed all the lands to E. A. Forbes, the promissory notes were canceled, and the mortgage was released. Subsequently, E. A. Forbes settled with his father for the latter's interest in the lands.

John C. Forbes died on or about the 20th day of April, 1891, and his son, Edwin G. Forbes, was appointed administrator of his estate on the 27th day of July, 1915. E. A. Forbes died on the 18th day of July, 1915, and his son, E. F. Forbes, was appointed administrator of his estate on the 20th day of July, 1915. This action was commenced March 30, 1917.

The complaint alleged that the deed from the Wilsons to E. A. Forbes was made without the knowledge or consent of John C. Forbes, he "expecting and believing that said deed of reconveyance would be made in the name of and would reconvey said property to" himself and E. A. Forbes; that John C. Forbes, at the time of his death, did not know that the property had been conveyed to "E. A. Forbes, individually and alone, and died in the belief and with the understanding that said property had been reconveyed to him and the said E. A. Forbes"; and that they were then the owners thereof. The prayer of the complaint was that the deed from the Wilsons be declared a trust and that E. A. Forbes hold the property as a trustee for the benefit of the heirs at law of John C. Forbes; that defendant account for the rents, issues, and profits of the property; and that he deed an undivided one-half interest therein to plaintiff.

The answer alleged that, prior to the 20th day of January, 1891, E. A. Forbes settled in full with John C. Forbes and became the sole owner of said lands. It was also alleged that the cause of action was barred by the provisions of the statute of limitations.

Judgment was in favor of defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and contends: That the evidence is insufficient to sustain certain findings of the court; that the trial court erred in certain rulings on the admission of evidence; and that the court should have found upon the issue as to whether the cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations.

The portions of the findings attacked by appellant are as follows:

Finding 6, referring to the deed from the Wilsons to E. A. Forbes, stated:

> "There was no agreement or understanding for any reconveyance of said real property to said John C. Forbes or to any person except said E. A. Forbes."

Finding 7 was that—

> Said deed from the Wilsons "was made with the full knowledge and consent of said John C. Forbes who at no time expected, believed, or desired that said deed of conveyance should be made in the name of himself and said E. A. Forbes."

Finding 8 was that John C. Forbes knew that said real property had been transferred to E. A. Forbes individually and alone, and that E. A. Forbes was the sole owner in fee and entitled to the possession of said lands.

It was found in finding 9 that E. A. Forbes never informed the widow of John C. Forbes that an undivided one-half interest in said property was preserved to herself or her son, Edwin G. Forbes, or to any other person than to himself.

Finding 10 was to the effect that E. A. Forbes had settled with John C. Forbes and paid to him his full interest in and to the canceled notes excepting the sum of $1,250, for which amount, at the request of John C. Forbes, E. A. Forbes, on the 21st day of April, 1891, delivered to the widow of John C. Forbes his promissory note payable to her, and that said note was fully paid by E. A. Forbes prior to his death.

Mrs. Emma Morse, formerly the widow of John C. Forbes and the mother of plaintiff, testified: That, on or about the last day of April, 1891, E. A. Forbes gave her a note, dated January 19, 1891, for $1,250 and at the same time gave to her the following document:

> "Marysville, Cal., January 19, 1891.
> "It is hereby understood by and between J. C. Forbes and E. A. Forbes, both of the county of Yuba, that if said E. A. Forbes, or his heirs sells the 'Forbes Ranch' in Oat Hills, in Yuba county, Cal., for $12,000 (twelve thousand dollars), or more, he shall pay to said J. C. Forbes, or his heirs, the sum of seven hundred and fifty ($750.00) dollars. E. A. Forbes."

The only testimony adduced at the trial was that of plaintiff's mother, now Mrs. Morse, who testified in behalf of the plaintiff, that of Mrs. E. A. Forbes, relict of the defendant's intestate, and the deposition of Mrs. Mary E. Wilson, one of the grantees of the Forbes of the land in question.

The facts stated in the complaint as to the sale of the property to the Wilsons for the sum of $18,000, the payment by them of $6,000 in cash on the execution and delivery of the deed, the execution by them of a mortgage for $12,000, balance of the purchase, their failure to pay the notes to secure which said mortgage was given, and the reconveyance of the land by them to E. A. Forbes, who subsequently passed away, are not disputed.

Mrs. Morse's testimony as it appears in the record before us, falls far short of sustaining the averments of the complaint. All she appears to have been able to say of the transaction between J. C. Forbes, her then husband, and the late E. A. Forbes, was that, after the death of her husband, E. A. delivered to her the promissory note for $1,250 and the conditional contract for the payment to her of the sum of $750. Although the complaint alleges that E. A. Forbes had told Mrs. Morse, after the death of J. C. Forbes, that "the undivided one-half interest in and to the above-described property was preserved to herself and her son, Edwin G. Forbes," there is not a particle of evidence supporting the claim so made. Indeed, about all that she testified to may briefly be stated as follows: That the promissory note for $1,250 was made payable in installments, and that the obligation had been entirely extinguished by the payment to her of the last installment some 14 years subsequent to the execution and delivery of the note; that no part of the $750 mentioned in the contract was paid to her; that for some years her husband had been suffering from tuberculosis; that he had been able to attend to his business until within two months of his death; that, about the first of March, 1891, he took a trip to Arizona; that for some time prior to her husband's death he and his family lived at the residence of E. A. Forbes in Marysville and they lived there for two weeks after Clarence returned. She said that from the time of her husband's death until the death of E. A. Forbes in 1915, the relations between the two families were of a friendly nature, though she had not seen the family of E. A. Forbes for quite a number of years. When E. A. Forbes handed her the promissory note for $1,250, she asked him no questions "because I trusted him to do what was right"; that he owed her nothing personally; that both the note and the contract were handed her by E. A. Forbes without comment and she received them in like manner, without comment or statement.

In rebuttal, Mrs. Morse testified that all she remembered about the contract for $750 was that when she received it E. A. Forbes had said: "Keep this contract. It will be of use to you some day." She said that both the promissory note and the contract were handed to her about ten days or two weeks after the death of her husband; that when he handed her the promissory note he said, "This is for you"; that he did not tell her to hold the contract for Edwin. The witness testified, on cross-examination, that when the note was handed her she took it and asked no questions; that she did not look to see the amount of it until later.

Mrs. Mary E. Wilson, in her deposition taken in the state of Vermont, deposed that her husband, Thomas Wilson, was dead; that she purchased the Forbes ranch for $18,000, paid $6,000 cash and gave promissory notes, secured by mortgage, for $12,000; that no interest on the notes was ever paid; that she, her husband and her son, joined in executing the deed back to E. A. Forbes; that she knew the latter, but that he never made any statement to her concerning the interest of his brother, John C., in the property.

Mrs. Jennie E. Forbes, widow of E. A., testified: That in a general way she knew about the sale of the ranch to Mrs. Wilson; that in January, previously to his death, Clarence Forbes had been at her residence in Marysville; that on the 3d of March, 1891, he went to Arizona for his health, and E. A. Forbes went with him; that the latter returned on the 14th of March; and that Clarence came later, lived at her residence, and died there. She said that about the 19th of January, 1891, while Clarence was at her house, she saw him and her husband "go over the books and examine them and heard them consent to the agreement, and that they agreed to have this note drawn up that was turned over to Mrs. Forbes; * * * that the $1,250 was the difference between them, and that this note was to be drawn up in favor of his wife on account of his poor health, and he expected to take this trip to Albuquerque, and in case anything happened him on his trip it was agreed that she should have this money." The difference between J. C. and E. A., spoken of by the witness, has reference to certain indebtedness of J. C., which E. A. agreed to and did liquidate. The witness said she heard them discuss the Wilson mortgage for $12,000 and that the difference agreed upon was $1,250; that she saw the note for $1,250 on the morning after Clarence died, about the 21st day of April, at her residence; that E. A. Forbes handed the note to Mrs. Clarence Forbes, in the presence of the witness, and that he said, "Emma, this is yours"; that at the same time her husband handed to Mrs. Clarence Forbes the contract for $750, saying to her: "Emma, he did this for Edwin (the son of Clarence). You keep this and put it away for Edwin."

The record presents no satisfactory explanation of what disposition was made of the contract for the conditional payment by E. A. Forbes of $750 to J. C. Forbes or his heirs. There is some testimony tending in a hazy sort of a way to show that E. A. Forbes settled an outstanding obligation against J. C. Forbes and in favor of one Phiningham for $1,000, in consideration of the cancellation of said contract. But be that as it may, the contract is of no importance in this case, and the court so treated it by failing to make any finding with reference to it. It may be added that it does not appear that the condition upon which the $750 was to be paid ever happened.

[1] Now, even conceding it to be true, as the complaint alleges, that E. A. Forbes was the attorney and legal adviser of J. C. Forbes and that by reason of that fact a confidential relation existed between them, or that such relation is to be presumed from the relationship by consanguinity in blood between them, and that the burden was therefore upon the defendant to show that the transactions between the deceased brothers relating to the property in dispute were conducted and consummated with fairness, honesty, and in good faith, it cannot be doubted that the evidence, of which the above is an epitomized statement, was sufficient, if accepted by the court as exposing the real facts of the transactions (and the result shows that it was so accepted), to overcome or dispel any presumption of bad faith in said transactions on the part of E. A. Forbes raised by the law as to such transactions executed under analogous circumstances—that is, such transactions, characterized by somewhat similar circumstances, as are treated in Nobles v. Hutton, 7 Cal. App. 14, 93 Pac. 289, and in the many cases therein cited and examined, distinguishable, however, from the case at bar in one important particular, viz., that therein the property which was in controversy was transferred by gift to the defendants, whereas, in this case, there is no such element entering into the controversy.

[2] As to the objections involving certain rulings relative to evidence, the first called to our attention and to be considered is as to the action of the court in striking out from the deposition of the witness Mrs. Wilson the answer returned by her to the following interrogatory propounded by the plaintiff:

> "What disposition, if any, was made by you of the real property described in the deed and mortgage previously referred to by you?" Ans. "We deeded it back to E. A. Forbes and John C. Forbes."

The ground upon which the court, upon the motion of counsel for defendant, struck out the answer, was that it was "incompetent, immaterial, and not the best evidence." The objection to the testimony on the last-stated ground was good. Obviously, the deed itself was the best evidence of the contents of the deed and as to the identity of the party or parties named therein as the grantee or grantees of Mrs. Wilson.

What is said of the last considered point is equally applicable to the objection that the court erred in striking out the answer made by Mrs. Morse to the following question: "What knowledge did you have?" referring to her knowledge of the conveyance by Mrs. Wilson and the parties to whom the conveyance was made, the answer being: "My knowledge was that they (meaning J. C. and E. A. Forbes) both took the property back again."

[3] The complaint by appellant that the court erred by failing to find on the defense of the statute of limitations interposed by defendant is so plainly without merit, coming as it does from the plaintiff, who, of course, desired a trial on the merits, that further comment would be superfluous. It may be said, though, that the defendant seems not to have pressed that defense, and other than what was shown in that particular by the complaint itself there was no evidence to support the defense or authorize a finding thereon. But however that may be, it obviously does not lie in the mouth of the appellant (plaintiff in the case) to complain because the court omitted to notice the defense in its decision.

PEOPLE v. HUNTOON. (Cr. 642.)

CRIMINAL LAW 🔑981(2) — INSANITY AFTER CONVICTION—DISCRETION OF TRIAL JUDGE—SUBMISSION OF CAUSE TO JURY.

Where, after plea of guilty had been made to a charge of forgery and before sentence was pronounced, a physician was called by the accused, and testified that in his opinion, based upon a brief observation, accused was not rational, it was within the discretion of the court to rule that such testimony did not produce in his mind a sufficient doubt as to the defendant's sanity, and to enter an order refusing to submit the question of sanity to a jury.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

James Harvey Huntoon pleaded guilty to a charge of forgery, and from the judgment of imprisonment he appeals. Affirmed.

Dana Ong, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. On this appeal taken from the judgment of imprisonment the sole question presented is as to the alleged error of the trial judge in refusing to submit to a jury the question of the sanity of the defendant. The judgment was entered after plea of guilty had been made to a charge of forgery. Before sentence was pronounced a physician was called by the defendant, and he testified that, in his opinion, based upon a brief observation of the defendant, he was not rational. However, his testimony did not produce in the mind of the trial judge a sufficient doubt as to the defendant's sanity, and we think that the mere opinion of a medical witness was not sufficient to compel a determination of the question in the defendant's favor, but that the trial judge had discretion to make the ruling which he caused to be entered. People v. Hettick, 126 Cal. 425, 58 Pac. 918; People v. Keyes, 175 Pac. 6.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WEYER v. WEYER et al. (Civ. 2757.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 23, 1919.)

1. VENUE 🔑16½—JOINDER OF DIVORCE ACTION AND ACTION FOR RECOVERY OF REAL ESTATE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 427, wife's divorce action cannot be joined with cause of action to recover property situated in a county other than that of wife's residence, the statute requiring the divorce action to be brought in county of wife's residence, and section 392, and Const. art. 6, § 5, requiring the action to recover real estate to be brought in county in which it is situated.

2. ACTION 🔑50(4) — MULTIFARIOUSNESS — DIVORCE—FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE.

A wife's action for divorce, and alimony, in which she seeks to have husband's assignment of notes secured by mortgages set aside as fraudulent, is not multifarious, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 136, 137, 139–141, and constitutes but one cause of action, though the notes are his separate property and not community property.

3. DIVORCE 🔑66—VENUE—SETTING ASIDE A FRAUDULENT TRANSFER.

A wife's action for divorce and alimony, in which she seeks to have husband's assignment of notes secured by real estate mortgages set aside as fraudulent, is properly brought in county of her residence, though land is situated in another county, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 392, and Const. art. 6, § 5; there being but one cause of action.

4. VENUE 🔑5(3) — RECOVERY OF REAL ESTATE—APPLICABILITY OF STATUTE.

An action must be wholly local in its nature to require it to be brought in the county in which land involved is situated under Code Civ. Proc. § 392.

5. Divorce ⚷90—Allegations as to Community Property—Presumption.

In the absence of an allegation in a petition for divorce that there is community property, court will presume that there is no community property.

6. Courts ⚷90(1)—Rules of Decision.

Under Civ. Code, § 3511, where reasoning of court in deciding one case is directly applicable to another case, the rule laid down in former case should be followed in latter case.

7. Divorce ⚷275(1)—Alimony — Fraudulent Conveyance.

A husband cannot put his separate property out of his hands for the purpose of defeating his wife in an anticipated application for alimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Action by Madge Weyer against Gustavus A. Weyer and H. P. Weyer. From an order denying motion for change of place of trial, the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. H. Dennett and J. C. Needham, both of Modesto, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The appeal is from an order denying a motion for change of place of trial. The plaintiff wife sought divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, and joined as a defendant her husband's brother, alleged to be the fraudulent grantee of the husband. The brother alone moved to change the place of trial.

The plaintiff alleged the husband is the owner of a one-third interest in four promissory notes of the aggregate face value of nearly $14,000, secured by mortgages and deeds of trust, and in certain described lands, some of which are in Stanislaus county and some in Tuolumne county. It is further alleged that on January 31, 1917, some eight months before suit was brought and three months before the separation of the parties, the husband purported to grant and convey to his brother, the appellant, upon no consideration, all the property without the knowledge of the plaintiff, and with the intent of defrauding her of her right to subject the same to her claim for maintenance, support, and alimony. After praying for a divorce the plaintiff prayed for a monthly sum for her support and lump sums for counsel fees and costs. She further prayed the conveyance and transfer of her husband to his brother be decreed to be fraudulent and void as to her, and that a lien be imposed upon the property as security for the payment of such sums as may be directed by the court to be paid by the husband to her for support, counsel fees, and costs.

The appellant moved for change of place of trial on the ground that San Francisco, the place of residence of the plaintiff, is not the proper county, and that Stanislaus is the proper county by reason of the residence of H. P. Weyer there. Further, that as to him, the action is for recovery of real property and the determination of the right or interest of the plaintiff therein, and that all the real property is in the counties of Stanislaus and Tuolumne.

The argument on behalf of the appellant in substance is that section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution provides that all actions for the recovery of possession of, or for the enforcement of liens upon, real property must be commenced in the county where the real property is situated, and, under Code of Civil Procedure, § 392, tried in such county; that so far as H. P. Weyer is concerned, the suit is simply one concerning title to his real estate, and that it is not in any way subsidiary to the suit for divorce, with which he has nothing to do. It is further argued there is a misjoinder of causes of action, one being the action for divorce in which the brother must sit as a silent spectator, and the other an action to set aside a conveyance in which the husband, the grantor, must remain equally quiescent.

[1-4] The statute required the action for divorce to be brought in the county of the residence of the wife. If the suit were, as claimed on behalf of the appellant, one involving two separate causes of action, and the second cause of action were for the recovery of the property, under the constitutional provision the second cause of action would necessarily have been brought in one of the counties in which the land is, and it would follow under the provisions of section 427, Code of Civil Procedure, that the two causes could not be joined. There are not two causes of action. The case is not within the provisions of section 5 of article 6 of the Constitution or section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An action must be wholly local in its nature to require it to be brought in the county designated by section 392, Code of Civil Procedure. Smith v. Smith, 88 Cal. 573, 26 Pac. 356; Clark v. Brown, 83 Cal. 181, 23 Pac. 289.

[5] The appellant contends there is a different principle involved where separate property of the husband is conveyed from that where the property belonged to the community, and, further, that regardless of the power of a court of equity in a suit for maintenance, or more properly alimony, without divorce, there can be no joinder such as is here made in a suit for divorce. The Legislature has dealt with this subject. Even though divorce is denied, the court in the divorce action may provide for the maintenance of the wife (Civ. Code, § 136); it may provide for alimony pending the suit (Civ. Code, § 137); and for maintenance after divorce (Civ. Code, § 139). The court may require reasonable security for providing maintenance or making any payments required under the provisions of the chapter, and may enforce the same by an appointment of a receiver, or by any other remedy applicable to the case. Civ. Code, § 140. In executing the preceding sections, the court must resort: (1) To the community property; then (2) to the separate property of the husband. Civ. Code, § 141. The appellant asserts that it appears in this case the property transferred by the husband was his separate property. It further appears negatively from the complaint there was no community property to which the court might resort for the maintenance of the wife. In the absence of an allegation that there is community property, the presumption is there was none. No such allegation is made in the complaint in the present case. Kashaw v. Kashaw, 3 Cal. 312. Provision is to be made for the wife, and it must be from the separate property of the husband, either owned or to be acquired by him. No reason exists why either the wife or the chancellor should forego the certainty of recourse to property owned by the husband for the uncertainty of speculation regarding future earnings.

In Kashaw v. Kashaw, supra, the wife sued for divorce, joining certain other defendants to whom it was claimed by the wife the husband, with intent to defraud her of her community rights, had conveyed community property. It was contended there, as here, that the bill was multifarious. Basing its decision upon the then existing act in relation to husband and wife, which required a division of the community property, the Supreme Court said:

> "It seems, from this, to be beyond dispute that a partition of the common property is one of the direct results of a decree for divorce, and is part and parcel of the decree to be rendered, and consequently is necessarily one of the proper subjects of the action. How, then, can its introduction render the bill subject to the charge of multifariousness? The bill would really not be perfect without it, for the purpose of obtaining the decree of division, as contemplated by the law. * * * And as the one-half of it is equitably the right of the plaintiff, and to be so determined in this action, she may well make a party of any one claiming an interest in it, in order that she may obtain a complete determination."

[6] In the present case, as there is no community property, it is the duty of the court to make provision for the wife out of the separate property of the husband. The reasoning of the court in the Kashaw Case is directly applicable. Where the reason is the same, the rule should be. Civ Code, § 3511.

The rule of Kashaw v. Kashaw has never been questioned. It has been made the basis of numerous decisions in other jurisdictions. It is cited as a leading case in a note appended to a case decided in Alabama, where it was held that a bill for divorce was not rendered multifarious by a prayer for a conveyance by the husband to the wife of lands paid for by her with the title resting in him. Singer v. Singer, 165 Ala. 144, 51 South. 755, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 819, 138 Am. St. Rep. 19, 21 Ann. Cas. 1102. From the note it might seem that the Kashaw Case was limited to the division of the community property. The appellant in this case relies on a California case cited in the note. Cummings v. Cummings, 14 Pac. 562. It was published in the Pacific Reporter, and would seem to support the contentions of the appellant. It was not published in the official reports, no doubt because upon rehearing the Supreme Court expressly declined to determine the questions which in the unreported decision the department undertook to decide in a manner at variance with the Kashaw Case. In the unreported department opinion, which was concurred in by Mr. Justice McFarland, the wife, suing for divorce and a division of the community property, joined certain other parties in the litigation, alleging that they fraudulently entered into a contrivance with the husband to defeat the plaintiff of her rights. The argument was made, which is made here, that under Code of Civil Procedure, section 427, there was a misjoinder of causes of action. In the department opinion it was said:

> "We do not find the causes of action here united, * * * to belong to any of the classes of actions allowed to be united by the above section." Cummings v. Cummings, 14 Pac. 562.

Without reference to the earlier department opinion, in the same case, upon the same appeal, the Supreme Court in bank expressly determined it was not necessary to decide whether the court below did or did not err in overruling the demurrer, upon which ruling the department opinion was based, because on other grounds the judgment appealed from was reversed. The court in the final disposition of the case determined that the bank, which was the mortgagee defendant in the divorce suit, was a necessary party to the accounting. "Its mortgage is recognized as valid in the judgment, and no decree could properly be entered determining what sums had been paid to it by the defendant Ketchum, or giving priority to the alimony or suit money in the absence of the bank." Cummings v. Cummings, 75 Cal. 434, 17 Pac. 442. Mr. Justice McFarland concurred specially in the bank decision, saying:

> "The only proper parties to a divorce suit are, generally, the husband and wife."

His statement is fundamental, but under the rule of the Kashaw Case and in the

Cummings Case, where it is charged the husband has conveyed the community property, the grantee may be a proper party, as a third party may be a proper party under certain other circumstances. The appellant in the closing brief refers to the special concurring opinion of Mr. Justice McFarland in the Cummings Case. In another part of his concurring opinion, the learned justice said:

> "If, when such a suit has been commenced, or is about to be commenced, one of the parties having such suit in view colludes with a third party with intent to cover up community property, such third party may, perhaps, be made a defendant for the purpose of keeping the property in statu quo until after the determination of the action." Cummings v. Cummings, 75 Cal. 442, 17 Pac. 442, 446.

Mr. Justice McFarland, after the decision of Cummings v. Cummings, said:

> "The very purpose of alimony in such a case is to give support to the wife and to enable her to conduct her side of the litigation pending the trial of the issues made by the pleadings." Storke v. Storke, 99 Cal. 621, 34 Pac. 339.

[7] The husband cannot put his separate property out of his hands for the purpose of defeating his wife in an anticipated application for alimony. Murray v. Murray, 115 Cal. 266, 47 Pac. 37, 37 L. R. A. 626, 56 Am. St. Rep. 97. Counsel for the appellant state there is a broad distinction between suits for divorce and for support. Neither argument nor citation of authority is presented upon this claimed distinction. It does not exist. Under the broad equitable powers of the court, and in applying the provisions of the Civil Code sections to which reference has been made, the rule announced in Kashaw v. Kashaw must be held to extend to transfers of separate property where there is no community property.

In regard to the claim that the suit in so far as it affected the appellant's interest in real property was within the provisions of section 392 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in a similar case where the same question arose as to an alleged fraudulent conveyance of community property, the Supreme Court held that section does not apply, saying:

> "The object of the action, however, was not simply to procure the cancellation of the deed and reconveyance of the property. Another and probably much greater object was to secure a dissolution of the bonds of matrimony, and, so far as this last matter was the subject of the action, the proper county for the trial thereof was the county of the defendant's residence. It has been held here that if real and personal actions are joined in the same complaint the case falls within section 395 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and must be tried in the county of defendant's residence." Warner v. Warner, 100 Cal. 11, 34 Pac. 523.

In that case the plaintiff wife was a resident of San Bernardino. The real property was also in that county. F. R. Warner was joined as the alleged fraudulent grantee of C. A. Warner, the husband. The defendants sought to have the suit removed to their place of residence. The case was decided upon the construction of section 128 of the Civil Code, requiring the residence of the plaintiff in the county in which the action is commenced, and sections 395 and 397 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring personal actions on motion to be transferred to the place of residence of the defendants. Both defendants joined in the motion. Here the motion is made on behalf of one only of the defendants. The plaintiff in that case insisted upon the trial of the action in the county where the real property was, and which was her place of residence. The court determined that it was a personal action falling within section 395, Code of Civil Procedure, and not a local one under section 392, Code of Civil Procedure, and said the alleged fraudulent grantee "might perhaps have insisted upon the action being retained in the county of San Bernardino for trial." The statement of what Warner might perhaps have insisted upon, if not at variance with the matter decided, did not establish a rule of law contrary to the conclusions reached on this appeal.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

BAMBRIDGE v. CRANE. (Civ. 2692.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1. California. May 23, 1919. Rehearing Denied June 21, 1919.)

1. FACTORS ⟹43—NEGLIGENCE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action by a merchandise dealer against a commission merchant to recover damages claimed to have been suffered through negligence of defendant in the dispatch of the cablegram as to the price of an article, the burden of establishing that the cablegram was so negligently worded as to mislead him was upon the plaintiff.

2. FACTORS ⟹43—NEGLIGENCE OF FACTOR—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held insufficient to establish negligence on the part of the sender in the wording of the cablegram.

3. FACTORS ⟹14—NEGLIGENCE OF FACTOR—INFORMATION BY CABLEGRAM.

In action by a merchandise dealer against a commission merchant to recover damages claimed to have been suffered through negligence of defendant in wording a cablegram, the message should be read as a whole and in light of relations of parties and circumstances surrounding transaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by George Bambridge against Douglas B. Crane, doing business under the firm name of Wightman & Crane. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Goodfellow, Eells, Moore & Orrick, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. Plaintiff brought this action against the defendant for the purpose of recovering from him the sum of $1,691.35, the amount of damages claimed to have been suffered by him through the negligence of defendant, consisting in the dispatch of a cablegram to plaintiff by reason of which he made certain purchase of copra for shipment to San Francisco and which he was compelled to sell at a loss. The court gave judgment in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

The essential facts upon which the controversy depends are uncontradicted, and may be stated as follows: The plaintiff is a merchant of Tahiti, dealing in copra and other articles, and the defendant is a commission merchant of San Francisco. The business relations of the parties were initiated by a letter from plaintiff to defendant, dated November 18, 1915, in which the defendant was invited to communicate to the plaintiff the terms upon which business could be carried on between them, including the sale on commission by defendant of shipments of copra to be made by plaintiff. This letter was replied to by letter of December 8, 1915, in which the defendant stated the terms and conditions upon which he would engage in the business indicated. In this letter the defendant wrote:

> "We will by all steamers keep you advised of the current rate for this article (copra). * * * If you have anything to offer you can send us a wireless by means of the steamer, and we can offer you a price providing you will name a definite quantity with date of shipment."

Thereafter several shipments were made and sold and the proceeds duly accounted for, the business being done principally by correspondence. In the course of this correspondence plaintiff requested defendant to keep him informed of the price at which his shipments of copra were disposed of, and also of the market price at San Francisco of that article. Thus in one of his letters plaintiff writes:

> "Soon as you will sell the copra please send me a message via Awanui to Papeete as we have a receiving wireless station, and to let me know the rate per pound, as I will always be buying some more to prepare another next shipment. * * * You will not forget to send me a cable every time that the rate of copra will change in order for me to buy accordingly."

In reply to this letter the defendant wrote:

> "Regarding your request for information, we have to-day sent you the following cablegram: 'Copra Maitai five half cents Frisco,' and we trust that same will be entirely intelligible to you. It means that we have sold your copra per s. s. 'Maitai' at 5½ cents per pound delivered on wharf San Francisco. We have taken the matter up of further cables with your brother, and he is writing you in the premises. For your information we would say that we think your request is a very unusual one and one which will mean a great expense to you as the price of copra is changing daily. Rest assured that we will keep you advised of material changes in the market."

On January 14, 1916, plaintiff wrote to defendant as follows:

> "* * * I have received your cable of the 7th inst saying that 'Copra Maitai 5½ cents,' for which I thank you. You will not forget to send another cable when this lot will be sold" (referring to a shipment of which defendant was then being advised) "and to notify me every time that change of rate will occur."

On February 2d the defendant, having sold a shipment of copra by steamship Moana at the rate of 6 cents per pound, wrote plaintiff:

> "We have sold same at the high price of six cents per pound, and on the 31st ult. we sent you the following cablegram: 'Copra Moana six.'"

On February 18th the plaintiff wrote to defendant:

> "* * * You will receive by bearer 747 bags (21,566 kg.) of copra for which I will call your usual attention. Please send me a cablegram as usual. Your wireless message 'Copra Moana six' has not been received. * * *"

In a letter of March 11th the plaintiff advised defendant of another shipment of copra, and in that letter said:

> "I am sending to different fruit dealers some alligator pears, and as you will send me a cable for the copra as usual I will instruct my brother to see you for to add on your cable the approximate net proceeds obtained per case of fruit. For example 'pear six' will mean that pears have been sold at about six dollars a case."

On April 26th defendant wrote plaintiff as follows:

> "* * * On March 29th we cabled you as follows: 'Pears six copra Republic Moana six one-half.' * * * We trust to receive shipment of copra from you by next steamer. This article is quoted to-day in this market at 6½ cents per pound."

On May 8th the plaintiff wrote to defendant:

> "* * * I note that you have sold my two shipments of s. s. Republic and Moana at 6½ cents per pound, which I consider rather low, as news has arrived here by the same steamer saying that Moana copra has been sold for seven cents. * * * Please at all times inform me of the prospects of copra in order for me to be kept in the track. I do not mean to send me cable often, but from time to time and also write me fully."

On May 24th defendant wrote plaintiff:

"* * * We will follow your instructions as to keeping you advised both by mail and cable of the conditions here. We have to-day sent you the following cablegram: 'Moana seven cents,' from which you will understand that we have sold this cargo at seven cents per pound."

On June 3d plaintiff wrote defendant:

"In order to save cable expense regarding the insurance of copra can you arrange with some insurance house in advance to pay the insurance at the arrival of the copra in San Francisco. * * *"

On June 20th the defendant sent the following cablegram to the plaintiff:

"Maitai six one-half sold yours to arrive six three-quarters."

On June 3d plaintiff wrote to defendant:

"* * * I am shipping you by bearer 1,330 small and 147 large bags, representing about 52 tons of copra. * * * A wireless message as usual will be appreciated."

It is the cablegram of June 20th, reading, "Maitai six one-half sold yours to arrive six three-quarters," about which this controversy revolves, the plaintiff contending that he could only understand it to mean that the plaintiff had sold defendant's shipment per steamship Maitai at 6½ cents per pound, and that he had sold the next shipment that plaintiff would make (although the defendant had not been advised of any) at 6¾ cents per pound, and that, accordingly, after its receipt he purchased for shipment to San Francisco a quantity of copra at prices which would have netted him a profit if sold in San Francisco at 6¾ cents per pound, but from which he suffered a loss upon its sale at 5¾ cents. On the other hand, the information intended by the defendant to be conveyed to the plaintiff was that the general price for copra arriving at the port of San Francisco on the steamship Maitai was 6½ cents a pound, whereas he had sold the plaintiff's copra shipped on that vessel to arrive at 6¾.

[1-3] The burden of establishing that this cablegram was so negligently worded as to mislead him was upon the plaintiff; and we are clearly of the opinion that the conclusion of the trial court that he had not sustained this burden is correct. The parties were agreed that the expense of cabling made it advisable and even necessary when using this means of communication to be very sparing of words. The practice thus adopted, however, tended, of course, to render such communications ambiguous, which, in turn, necessitated caution in arriving at their meaning. The main argument of the appellant to establish the defendant's negligence in employing the language of the cablegram of June 20th in order to convey to the plaintiff the information that the general price of copra arriving on the Maitai was 6½ cents, and that the plaintiff's lot to arrive thereon had been sold before arrival at 6¾ cents, is that in previous cablegrams the name of a vessel followed by a price had been used to convey the information that the plaintiff's shipment by that steamer had been sold for the price named; that, accordingly, he could only understand the first part of the message of June 20th, "Maitai six and one half cents," to mean that his shipment on that vessel had been sold by defendant for 6½ cents, and that having thus interpreted the first part of the message he was naturally led to believe that the remaining part, to wit, "sold yours to arrive 6¾," was that defendant had sold plaintiff's next shipment at 6¾. But it appears to us, considering all the circumstances of the case, that the cablegram was plainly susceptible of the meaning that the defendant intended it to convey and which it very aptly does convey. The message should be read as a whole and in the light of the relations of the parties and the circumstances surrounding the transaction. The plaintiff had requested the defendant to supply him not only with information as to the price at which his particular shipments were sold, but also the market price generally. He had also recently complained to the defendant that a shipment made by him per steamship Moana had been sold at 6½ cents, while the general price of copra by that steamer was 7. A third fact rendering the meaning attributed by the plaintiff to the cablegram extremely improbable was that the defendant had never yet sold for the plaintiff a shipment of copra before he had been advised of its quantity and the vessel by which it was made; and, moreover, the defendant in his first letter to plaintiff at the inception of their business relations had stated:

"If you have anything to offer you can send us a wireless by means of the steamer, and we can offer you a price providing you will name a definite quantity with date of shipment."

The shipment by steamship Maitai was the last one of which defendant had been advised at the time of the dispatch of his cable message. These considerations all tended to negative the meaning attributed by the plaintiff to the message, as do also certain words of the message itself. Thus the words "sold yours to arrive" are plainly antithetical to the previous words. If, in fact, the message meant that the plaintiff's copra shipped by the Maitai had been sold by the defendant for 6 cents per pound, and the shipment to be made by the following vessel at 6¾, the words "sold yours" were entirely superfluous, and superfluity was the last thing to be expected in a cablegram of this nature. So far from the defendant being negligent in the dispatch of this message, the negligence, if any, was upon the part of the plaintiff in construing it as he did.

Having thus arrived at the conclusion that the plaintiff's proof failed to establish any negligence on the part of the defendant, it is unnecessary to consider the further question discussed in the briefs as to the proper calculation of the amount of the damage.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

MEEKER v. SPENCER et al. (Civ. 2648.)

1. Deeds 🔑56(2)—Delivery—Necessity of Intent to Part with Title.

An essential to a valid delivery of a deed is that grantor should have intended finally to part with title.

2. Deeds 🔑208(1)—Delivery—Evidence.

In a suit to quiet title, evidence that the notary handed plaintiff the deed from her husband without express authority from her husband but in his presence, that at the same time the notary handed the husband a deed for her property, but that both parties thereafter treated the property as though it had not been deeded, plaintiff selling that which she deeded to husband and after his death listing that deeded to her as part of his estate, held to sustain a finding that there was no delivery of the deed to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Carrie A. Deuress Meeker against Wilbur S. Spencer and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Andrews & Wright, of San Diego, for appellant.

Luce & Luce, of San Diego, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title. The complaint, in the usual form in such cases and filed on March 31, 1915, alleged that plaintiff is now, and for a long time has been, the owner of lot G, block 40, Horton's addition to the city of San Diego, as to which defendants, though having no title or estate therein, wrongfully and without right, claim an interest; followed by the usual prayer that defendants be required to set forth the nature of their claims, and that it be decreed that they have no title or claim to the lot. The answer, in addition to denials of plaintiff's allegations alleged that William A. Deuress, deceased, was at the time of his death in possession and the owner of the premises described in the complaint, and that his legal heirs, one of whom was defendant Taylor, were the owners thereof, subject to the rights of Wilbur S. Spencer, as administrator of the estate, and entitled to possession thereof; followed by a prayer for a decree in their favor.

The court found: First, that plaintiff was not then, nor at the commencement of the suit, owner of or entitled to the property. Second, that the claim of defendants Wilbur S. Spencer as administrator, and Katherine Taylor as heir of William A. Deuress, deceased, is not without right, but that said defendants have right, title, and interest in said land and every part thereof. Third, that the legal heirs of William A. Deuress, deceased, are the owners of the premises, subject to the administration of said estate by said defendant Wilbur S. Spencer as administrator thereof; followed by a conclusion of law in favor of said defendants, upon which judgment was entered in accordance therewith.

Plaintiff, claiming that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings, has appealed from the judgment.

Plaintiff at the trial founded her claim of title to the property upon a deed to her made by William A. Deuress on the 8th day of May, 1897, which she says her deceased husband, at the date of its execution, delivered to her. That the deed was signed and acknowledged by the husband admits of no controversy. The facts and circumstances touching the delivery of the deed are that on the day mentioned plaintiff and her then husband went to the office of a notary public, before whom three deeds were signed and acknowledged, one of which was a deed, signed by both parties, which purported to convey the real estate therein described to the defendant Katherine Taylor, stepdaughter of plaintiff; another was a deed by plaintiff purporting to convey certain property standing of record in her name to her husband William A. Deuress; and the other was a deed from plaintiff's husband to herself purporting to convey the property involved in this controversy and as to which the notary testified that, after it was executed, he, without any express authority so to do from the grantor, but of his own volition, handed it to plaintiff, saying, "Here, Mrs. Deuress, I deliver to you the deed to this property," and she took it. Mr. Deuress picked up the other deeds, and he and his wife went away. Plaintiff says they took the deeds to their home, where all three of them were together placed in a trunk which the husband and wife used in common. At the trial, occurring some 18 years later, she testified that, while she thought she had seen the deed after it was placed in the trunk, she was not certain. At all events, after a diligent search therefor, she was unable to find it. She did not record it for the reason that her husband wished to sell the property. The deed made to Mrs. Taylor was, a few weeks after its execution, taken from the trunk by Mr. Deuress and destroyed. Although she found the deed made by her to the husband, she did not inventory the property which it purported to convey as that of the estate, but, after the decease of her husband, she sold and conveyed it as her own property, which fact appeared of record. Her reason for making the deed to him was that she wanted him to have the property in case of her death, but as to the property in dispute, deed to which she claims was delivered to her, the reason for so doing was the desire of the husband to secure payment of money which she had loaned to him. Other evidence in favor of plaintiff was the testimony of a witness to the effect that Mr. Deuress had pointed out this lot to him, saying "that was one of his lots," but that he had given his wife a deed to it.

[1, 2] The one essential to a valid delivery of the deed in question is that the grantor should have intended to finally part with the title (Rice v. Carey, 170 Cal. 748, 151 Pac. 135; Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703), and this is a question of fact to be determined from all the evidence and circumstances of the transaction, together with reasonable inference which the court is entitled to deduce therefrom. In the instant case, while the evidence is not only meager and unsatisfactory in support of plaintiff's contention, it appears that the only act upon which delivery of the deed is based is that of the notary who, of his own motion and without authority so to do, handed the deed to plaintiff. Conceding the act done with the husband's assent, a like delivery of the deed executed by plaintiff was made to the husband, and this as shown by her own testimony and act in thereafter selling the property, was not intended as a transfer of the title which the deed purported to convey. The exchange of deeds so made constituted one transaction, and it is a fair inference from the circumstances shown that the purpose of the husband in executing the deed to his wife was identically the same as that had by the wife in executing a deed to him of her property, namely: That, retaining control over the instrument during his life, it should, if not destroyed, become operative in event of his death.

At the trial it further appeared that plaintiff was the widow of William A. Deuress, deceased, who died on the ——— day of ———, 1912, at which time the property in question stood of record in his name; that on October 11, 1912, she was appointed administratrix of his estate by the superior court of San Diego county, and as such administratrix she, on March 7, 1913, filed an inventory, duly verified by her, wherein she described, among other property of the estate, the lot in question, which was appraised at the sum of $40,000. On September 2, 1913, she, as widow of said deceased, filed a petition, alleging the total estate of deceased, which included the lot in question, was of the value of $65,237, and asking for an allowance of $250 per month to be made to her as widow of said deceased, which allowance was duly made. There was also filed by her a petition for an order of sale of said property for the purposes of paying the expenses of administration and the widow's allowance, which not being made, the court, upon her application, authorized her to negotiate a mortgage upon the property in the sum of $10,000 for said purpose. Her first annual account, duly verified, was filed March 30, 1914, which included rents received from said property by her as such administratrix, and the payment to her of said widow's allowance from June 15, 1912, to March 15, 1914, amounting to $5,250, which account was duly allowed by the court. On July 10, 1914, she filed a final account and petition for distribution and discharge, which exhibited the fact that she had borrowed $10,000 secured by mortgage upon the property, as per order of the court, and had paid balance due on account of widow's allowance and other expenses of $6,432.12, and showing that a further amount was due to her as the widow of deceased, from March 15, 1914, to July 15, 1914, in the sum of $1,000. And also by said petition showing that all of the property, including the lot in question, was community estate of herself and said deceased, and asking that the same be distributed to herself as widow, and defendant Katherine Taylor, as sole heirs of deceased. On August 3, 1914, prior to the court acting upon her petition for settlement of her final account and distribution of said estate as therein asked, she tendered her resignation as administratrix of the estate, upon acceptance of which and the appointment of Wilbur S. Spencer as administrator thereof, she instituted this action. As thus shown, her acts in regard to the property are wholly inconsistent with the claim asserted, but fully support the theory that the deed under consideration, like the one by her executed to the husband, was not intended as a present transfer of title, but rather in the nature of testamentary disposition of the property.

Under our view that the evidence supports the findings complained of, we deem it unnecessary to discuss the question of estoppel based upon the fact that she, upon representation that this property in value constituting nearly two-thirds of the estate, obtained $6,500 as widow's allowance, together with fees for administering thereon.

The judgment is affirmed.

GERMAIN SEED & PLANT CO. v. JUSTICE'S COURT OF NO. 2 TP., IN AND FOR MERCED COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2951.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 6, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 4, 1919.)

PROHIBITION ⚷3(2)—REMEDY BY APPEAL.

Conceding that the service of a summons out of the county was insufficient to vest a justice court with jurisdiction, the defendant's remedy was by an appeal to the superior court, and issuance of a writ of prohibition by the superior court was not justified, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1103, the action being a simple one on account for goods and merchandise sold, and an appeal being a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Petition by the Germain Seed & Plant Company for a writ of prohibition commanding the Justice's Court of No. 2 Township, in and for the County of Merced, Cal., and Frank H. Farrar, as justice of the peace of said township, to desist from proceeding with the trial of an action. From an order granting the writ, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Croop & Croop, of Merced, for appellants.
Earl E. Sidebottom, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. As disclosed by the record herein, one T. A. Griffin instituted a suit in the justice's court of No. 2 township, Merced county, against the plaintiff herein, which is a corporation having its principal place of business in the city of Los Angeles, to recover on an account for goods and merchandise sold and delivered in the city of Merced, county of Merced, to plaintiff at its special instance and request. The summons issued in said action so brought in the justice's court was served upon defendant in the county of Los Angeles. Thereupon Germain Seed & Plant Company, defendant in said action, appeared specially in said justice's court and moved to quash the service of the summons upon the ground that no facts were made to appear which, under the provisions of section 848, Code of Civil Procedure, warranted the service of said summons in a county outside of that in which the action was brought. This motion was denied by the justice's court. Thereupon petitioner brought this proceeding in the superior court of Los Angeles county for the purpose of securing the issuance of a writ of prohibition, commanding said justice's court and Frank A. Farrar, as justice thereof, to desist from proceeding with the trial of said action so pending in said court. Respondent interposed a general demurrer to the petition, which was overruled, and the writ of prohibition prayed for granted. Defendants appeal from the order so made.

The identical question presented has been before the courts in a number of cases, among which are Burge v. Justice's Court, 11 Cal. App. 213, 104 Pac. 581; Simpson v. Police Court, 160 Cal. 530, 117 Pac. 553; and Hamberger v. Police Court, 12 Cal. App. 153, 106 Pac. 894, 107 Pac. 614, in all of which it was held that, conceding the service of summons insufficient to vest the inferior court with jurisdiction, the defendant's remedy for threatened adverse action was an appeal to the superior court. Mere want of jurisdiction will not justify the issuance of a writ of prohibition. It must be made to appear that the applicant therefor has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law. Section 1103, Code Civ. Proc. Upon the authority of what is said in the cases cited, we are constrained to hold that the defendant's right of appeal upon questions of both law and fact from an adverse judgment rendered affords a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy, by means whereof it may have the alleged erroneous ruling of the justice reviewed.

The order of the superior court is reversed.

PEOPLE v. FUNTAS. (Cr. 848.)

1. SODOMY ⚷6—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for the infamous crime against nature evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⚷780(3)—ACCOMPLICE'S TESTIMONY—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for the infamous crime against nature defendant was entitled, under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, to an instruction that the testimony of his accomplice should be received with distrust.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⚷1173(2) — APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for the infamous crime against nature, the failure of the court to instruct that the testimony of defendant's accomplice should be viewed with distrust held harmless; it being presumed that the jury as men of ordinary understanding would know that an accomplice ordinarily testifies with a view to protecting himself from prosecution, and the evidence as to defendant's guilt being uncontradicted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Mike Funtas was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. Defendant was convicted of the infamous crime against nature, and prosecutes this appeal from the judgment. He relies upon two points for reversal, viz.: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict; and (2) that the court erred in failing to instruct the jury that the testimony of an accomplice is to be viewed with distrust.

[1] The evidence in the case is of a sordid character, and it is not necessary to refer to it in any great detail. The testimony of the accomplice in the offense, a boy 14 years of age, shows when and where the defendant and himself met, the method adopted by the defendant for inducing him to visit defendant's room, all that was done there on the occasion of two of such visits, which comprehended the act upon which the charge was based. Notwithstanding the criticism of appellant's counsel, this testimony appears to be full, straightforward, and free from material discrepancies. Mrs. Bessie Preston, who conducted the lodging house where the defendant roomed, testified that several visits made by the defendant to the room of her own son aroused her suspicion as to defendant's conduct with Frank Lynch, the accomplice above mentioned. She accordingly caused to be bored two auger holes in a wall of defendant's room. On the evening of November 22, 1918, when the act charged is alleged to have been committed, she met the defendant on his way to his room where, as she knew, the boy was waiting for him, and invited him to join a game of cards with her and others. On the plea that he was tired he declined to do so. This refusal heightened her suspicions, and while the defendant proceeded to his room, she left the house and secured the co-operation of a policeman. She stationed him at the door of the defendant's room, and herself repaired to the auger holes and through them witnessed the act which led to the arrest of and charge against the defendant. The bedroom door was locked, but the officer testified to hearing the shuffling of feet, and conversation between the two occupants of the room conducted in a low tone of voice. The door then being unlocked the officer entered, and found the boy dressed and the defendant undressed. The officer insisted upon learning what had just occurred between the pair, and the boy finally confessed to the conduct described later by Mrs. Preston when a witness at the trial. The defendant denied the truth of the boy's account, and claimed that Lynch was present in his room solely for the purpose of assisting defendant in his study of the English language, but nevertheless attempted to bribe the arresting officer while being conducted to the jail. This was testified to by both the officer and the accomplice. The defendant did not take the witness stand in his own behalf. We are clearly of opinion that there is no merit in defendant's first point, for the evidence abundantly supports the verdict of the jury.

[2, 3] The second point, however, is more serious, for the court should have instructed the jury as requested by the defendant, to the effect that the testimony of an accomplice is to be viewed with distrust. The defendant was entitled to have this instruction given (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061; People v. Bonney, 98 Cal. 278, 33 Pac. 98; People v. Sternberg, 111 Cal. 11, 43 Pac. 201); so that the question we are confronted with is whether the refusal of the court to so instruct the jury was under the circumstances of the case so prejudicial to the defendant as to require a reversal of the judgment. A consideration of the entire record satisfies us that this question should be answered in the negative. An accomplice ordinarily testifies with a view to protecting himself from prosecution, or to concealing his own guilty conduct, or in the hope of earning a reward or gaining a pardon. Such testimony is tainted. But the jury, being presumably men of ordinary understanding, know this; and the court having to some extent discredited such testimony by instructing the jury, as required by law, that they could not convict the defendant upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, they would, in following such instruction, closely scrutinize the testimony referred to, and naturally and necessarily view it with distrust. Moreover, the evidence is quite convincing of the defendant's guilt. There is no claim by the defendant that the witness introduced by the prosecution bore him any personal ill will, or that his prosecution was inspired by hostile motives. The testimony of these witnesses was not contradicted or even discredited, if we except that of the accomplice, which was subject to its inherent infirmity. The evidence thus adduced convincingly established the defendant's guilt; hence the verdict of the jury may not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

SILVA et al. v. RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 1001 et al. (Civ. 1972.)

1. Judgment 🔑585(2)—Conclusiveness—Matters Concluded—Reassessment.

A prior judgment canceling an assessment made against plaintiff's land for reclamation purposes is not conclusive as to validity of a reassessment made after prior judgment, especially where principal ground for former judgment was errors in proceedings for the assessment which were corrected in the proceedings for reassessment.

2. Drains 🔑83—Reassessment—Statute.

Pol. Code, § 3466½, authorizing reassessment for reclamation purposes after the prior assessment has been declared invalid, is not limited to cases where the reclamation work has been completed, but applies to assessments to complete work under section 3459.

3. Drains 🔑76—Proceedings for Assessments.

Plans and statements for reclamation work are sufficient to sustain an assessment if they show the works to be constructed with some certainty and completeness of detail, though they would not be sufficient for a contract for the construction.

4. Drains 🔑14(1)—Districts—Plans—Approval by State Board.

St. 1911 (Ex. Sess.) p. 117, requiring reclamation plans to be approved by the state reclamation board, does not apply to plans made before the statute was enacted, though there were certain modifications made therein subsequent to the statute, so long as those modifications did not materially affect the general plan.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑762—Waiver of Errors—Failure to File Reply Brief.

A claim that the evidence is insufficient to sustain certain findings need not be specifically noticed where respondent's brief called attention to evidence apparently of sufficient force to justify the findings, and appellants did not reply thereto.

6. New Trial 🔑103—Newly Discovered Evidence—Materiality.

Newly discovered evidence that the commissioners in making a reassessment for reclamation purposes did not visit all the lands in the district does not require granting a new trial in a suit to cancel the reassessment when it appeared that the commissioners had visited all the lands in the district in making the original assessment.

7. New Trial 🔑102(5)—Newly Discovered Evidence—Diligence.

Newly discovered evidence consisting of testimony of a commissioner to make assessments for reclamation purposes that the commissioners did not visit all the lands before making the reassessment does not justify granting a new trial, where the commissioner testified at the former trial, but was not asked about visiting the lands.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Charles F. Silva and another against Reclamation District No. 1001 and others to cancel an assessment. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Driver & Driver, of Sacramento, for appellants.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The action was to cancel and annul an assessment made for reclamation purposes. The district was organized in April, 1911, and it has been in effective operation ever since. On the 17th day of July, 1911, the board of trustees of the district presented to the board of supervisors of Sutter county, in which county the greater portion of the lands of the district is situated, the residue being in Placer county, the original plans for reclamation. The usual proceedings were had, and an assessment for $851,730 was levied upon the lands of the district, and this was fully paid. This, however, was insufficient to complete the contemplated work, and on September 25, 1914, the trustees of the district presented another report to the board of supervisors, showing the work already accomplished and the work to be done, together with its estimated cost, and asking for another assessment of $500,-

000. The request was granted, and the assessments were all paid except those of appellants herein and one C. F. Roth. They contested the assessment in the superior court of Sutter county, and, after trial had, their assessments were held to be invalid, and they were canceled and annulled. Thereupon the board of trustees proceeded, in accordance with section 3466½ of the Political Code, to obtain a reassessment of the two tracts of land owned by appellants and said Roth, and they caused a modification and amplification to be made to their report of October 25, 1914, and filed it with said board of supervisors on April 8, 1916. The same commissioners who levied the second assessment were appointed by the supervisors to make the reassessment on the lands of appellants and Roth. They proceeded with the work and made their report as required by law. Objections were made to this reassessment, but they were overruled by the board of supervisors, and the report of the commissioners was approved and ratified. Thereafter this action was brought in the superior court to annul said reassessment levied upon the lands of plaintiffs, but the judgment was against their contention, and from that judgment sustaining the action of said commissioners the appeal has been taken.

[1] 1. The first contention of appellants is that the question is res adjudicata by virtue of said judgment declaring the said second assessment to be null and void. Appellants indulge in a learned and comprehensive discussion of the doctrine, which is quite interesting and instructive, but we are satisfied that the principle does not apply to the case at bar. The main reason for holding said assessment invalid was that the "plans, location, and estimates of the costs of reclamation of said reclamation district adopted by its board of trustees and reported to the board of supervisors were too indefinite, uncertain, and incomplete to meet the requirement of the law." This objection was obviated, however, by the additional specifications to which we have alluded, but it is not deemed necessary to point them out specifically.

It may be stated, also, that the other important finding that the assessments were not levied on the various tracts of land belonging to appellants according to the respective benefits accruing thereto from said improvements would not be controlling, for the reason that a different apportionment was made by this assessment. But a more satisfactory and conclusive answer to the proposition is that we are herein dealing with a different cause of action. The said judgment of November 13, 1915, was based upon a cause of action arising out of the assessment of September 25, 1914, whereas the cause of action involved herein must have grown out of the assessment made in 1916, after said former judgment was rendered.

Appellants do not deny that the rule is:

> "A former judgment * * * constitutes no defense to a cause of action, which accrued between the same parties on the same subject-matter after the rendition." Jones v. Petaluma, 36 Cal. 230; Shanklin v. Gray, 111 Cal. 88, 43 Pac. 399; People v. Rodgers, 118 Cal. 393, 46 Pac. 740, 50 Pac. 668; Code Civ. Proc. § 1911.

However, if the facts relating to the two assessments were identical or similar, the former judgment would be, of course, entitled to careful consideration, but it would not be controlling, since it was the judgment only of the trial court. The course pursued, it may be repeated, in reassessing appellants' property, was taken by virtue of the authority conferred by said section 3466½ of the Political Code, providing:

> "In all cases in which an assessment shall have been levied or shall hereafter be levied for reclamation purposes upon the lands embraced within any reclamation district now or hereafter formed or created, is thereafter adjudged invalid by any court of competent jurisdiction, or shall be adjudged invalid as to any tract or tracts of land within said district, or if for any reason, any tract or tracts within such district shall not have been charged with said assessment, * * * a subsequent re-assessment of such tract or tracts of land may be made separately for the purpose of charging said land with the proper proportion of the costs of reclamation," etc.

The section further provides that such reassessment must be made and approved in the same manner as other assessments.

[2] 2. We do not think that the application of this section is limited to cases wherein the work of reclamation has been completed. The reassessment may be made for the payment of work in the future as well as for that already done. There is nothing in the language of the section which supports this theory of appellants. The reassessment is not for the purpose "of paying costs already incurred," but it is to be levied for "reclamation purposes," and to understand the scope of the expression we must recur to section 3459 of the same Code, referring to the "additional assessment." Therein it is provided that, in order to secure an additional assessment where the first was not sufficient, the trustees of the district must present to the board of supervisors "a statement of the work done or to be done, and its estimated cost," and the said board of supervisors is required to appoint commissioners to assess the amount of such estimated cost as a charge upon the land in the district. It is necessarily implied by the term "reassessment," used in said section 3466½, that the levy is for the same purposes as are contemplated by said section 3459.

[3] 3. The plans and statement, including the modifications to which we have referred, prepared by the board of trustees of the district, answer sufficiently the requirement of the law as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Meyer v. Reclamation Dist., 172 Cal. 104, 155 Pac. 635, Spurrier v. Reclamation Dist., 172 Cal. 157, 155 Pac. 840, and some earlier decisions. As stated in the Meyer Case:

> "The Code does not require that such statement shall have the certainty and completeness of detail that would be necessary in a contract for the construction of the works, but only 'a plan showing in some detail and with some degree of certainty the extent and character of the proposed works.' It is difficult to draw a line of certainty and fullness of detail to which such statements must conform."

[4] As to the objection that the plan of reclamation adopted by the trustees of the district was not previously approved by the state reclamation board, as provided by the statute creating said board (Stats. of 1911, Extra Sessions, p. 117), it is pointed out by respondent that said statute was enacted after the organization of this district and the adoption by the trustees of the general plan of reclamation. It is true that certain modifications and additions therein were afterward made when said statute was in force, but we do not think they were of such vital importance as to require their submission to said board for its approval. As long as the modifications did not materially affect the general plan, it was within the discretion of the trustees to adopt them without the direction of said board. The purpose of said statute was, of course, to secure, as far as practicable, harmony and uniformity among the various districts in the promotion of reclamation throughout the Sacramento and San Joaquin valleys, and we can see nothing in the course pursued herein tending to nullify or defeat such purpose.

It is also suggested by respondent that the fact that these works have been in operation since July, 1911, that a large sum of money has been expended therefor and that the work of reclamation has been done openly and without protest from said state reclamation board would raise a presumption of the acquiescence and approval of said board. It is further claimed that such question cannot be raised by a property owner, but these considerations, while worthy of attention, we deem it unnecessary to determine.

[5] 4. Certain findings as to the sufficiency of the plans, reports, and estimates made by the trustees in reference to drainage canals, bridges, a pumping plant, and a certain road and telegraph lines within said district, and also as to the benefit to accrue to the land of appellants from these contemplated improvements, are challenged as not supported by the evidence. Respondent, though, in its brief calls attention to circumstances disclosed by the record, which seem to be of sufficient probative force to justify the conclusions of the trial judge, and, as appellants have not chosen to reply to said brief, we do not feel called upon to notice these matters more specifically.

[6] 5. A new trial was sought on the ground of newly discovered evidence, appellants relying upon the affidavit of Louis Tarke to the following effect:

> "That he is one of the commissioners of assessment who levied that certain reassessment on the lands of Silva and Randall and C. F. Roth in reclamation district No. 1001 on the 17th day of March, 1916; that Lee G. Roberts and A. A. McRae were the other two commissioners; that in levying said assessment all of said commissioners viewed the lands of Silva & Randall and C. F. Roth in said district, but did not view or inspect any of the other lands of said district upon said reassessment, nor in making said reassessment."

But it appears that these commissioners had made the previous assessment, and at that time had gone over all the land in the district. As to that Mr. Tarke testified:

> "Before the $851,000 assessment was put on we estimated the value of the land before reclamation; that is, we went all over the district and placed a value on the land—what it would be worth without reclamation according to the situation and according to the relative elevation and according to the quality of the land and the general situation of the land."

It would have been idle for them to do the same thing again. Assuming, therefore, for the sake of argument, that all of the lands should have been visited by the commissioners to enable them to make a proper reassessment of the lands of appellants and Roth only, the requirement was substantially met.

[7] Moreover, the showing of diligence was entirely inadequate. Mr. Tarke was called as a witness by plaintiffs and interrogated as to what he did in making said reassessment, and there is no excuse for the failure of appellants to ask him if he and his associates at that time visited the other lands in the district. The rule as to motions of this kind based upon such showing is quite familiar, and it is manifest that the court's action in denying a new trial is amply justified.

It is probably not necessary to allude to the importance of the work of reclamation undertaken in this and other districts and how largely it affects the welfare of the community and the state. Indeed, this consideration has been forcibly and even eloquently set forth by the Supreme Court in some of the cases cited. The work should not, of course, be impeded by vexatious litigation nor jeopardized by attaching too much weight to unimportant matters of procedure. On the other hand, notwithstanding the great importance of these schemes, the substantial rights of the property owners must be protected, but in the present instance we are led to believe that appellants have suffered no legal injury, and the judgment is affirmed.

KLEIN v. LEWIS. (Civ. 2911.)

1. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷172(2)—CONSTRUCTIVE EVICTION.

Any act of a permanent character, done by the landlord or by his procurement, with the intention and effect of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the premises demised, or a part thereof, to which he yields, and abandons possession, may be treated as an eviction from the whole, and the tenant may abandon the leased premises and recover damages.

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷172(2)—CONSTRUCTIVE EVICTION.

Where the lessor of two lots and a strip 35 feet wide on one side thereof wrongfully entered upon and took possession of 20 feet of the 35-foot strip and erected a house thereon, there was a constructive eviction from the entire leased premises.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚷704(2)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

In action for constructive eviction, where plaintiff appealed from an alleged insufficient judgment on the judgment roll, findings that plaintiff was not damaged in any sum whatever by reason of value of the unexpired lease, loss of business, or prospective profits were conclusive on appeal.

4. TRIAL ⚷404(2)—CONFLICTING FINDINGS.

In action for constructive eviction, where court expressly found "that plaintiff necessarily expended about $868 in removing from said premises," a declaration in the findings that the plaintiff was not damaged by the expense so entailed must be construed as a conclusion of law, and an erroneous one.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT ⚷180(4)—EVICTION—DAMAGES.

The expenses necessarily incurred by a tenant in removing from premises upon an eviction are recoverable as damages.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Meyers, Judge.

Action by Eugene L. Klein against Fred R. Lewis. From an insufficient judgment for plaintiff, he appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

Frank Bryant and Oliver O. Clark, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Nichols, Cooper & Hickson, of Pomona (Bert L. Cooper, of Pomona, of counsel), for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the eviction of plaintiff from leased premises. Judgment was for plaintiff in the sum of $81 and costs for defendant. Plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll, contending that under the facts as found by the court he should recover a much larger sum.

The material facts as found by the court are substantially as follows: The plaintiff was in rightful and peaceable possession, under a lease executed by defendant, of lots 1 and 2 of block A of the city of Pomona, together with an additional strip 35 feet in width on the easterly side of said lots. The lease was for the term of 5 years. The plaintiff, upon taking possession under his lease, expended several thousand dollars in establishing on the premises his business of manufacturing and selling crystallized and canned fruits. While the lease had still some 3 years to run, and plaintiff still being rightfully in the possession of the whole of said premises and in no wise in default, and during the absence of plaintiff in the East, defendant, without right and without the consent of plaintiff, entered upon and took possession of a portion of the leased premises, consisting of a strip 20 feet in width and 120 feet in length along the easterly side thereof, and erected a dwelling house and its appurtenances thereon. Thereafter, on the discovery of said eviction, plaintiff demanded that defendant vacate and return to plaintiff the possession of the portion of said premises so taken by him. Defendant, however, refused to, and never did thereafter, redeliver the portion of the leased premises so wrongfully taken. The strip of land so appropriated by defendant included the driveway, which was the means of ingress and egress between the buildings on the leased premises used by plaintiff in his business and the public street, which driveway he had graded and graveled at an expense of $81. After the refusal of defendant to vacate and redeliver possession of this strip of ground, plaintiff elected to abandon his lease and the entire premises, and brought this action to recover for constructive eviction from the entire premises, demanding damages for loss of prospective profits, loss of a large quantity of orange juice, expenses incident to his removal from the premises, and for the $81 he had expended for grading the driveway, aggregating the sum of $3,538.

[1] The court further found that, after the wrongful entry by defendant and the erection of the dwelling house and appurtenances aforesaid, "there remained on the east side of said dwelling house and its appurtenances a strip of land 15 feet in width and 120 feet in length which was clear and unobstructed for the use of said

plaintiff, and which said plaintiff could have converted into a practicable driveway by the expenditure of $81," and "that the acts of defendant in evicting plaintiff from the portion of the leased premises hereinbefore described did not render the said premises wholly unfit and useless to plaintiff for the purposes of said business." It does not appear from the record just what proportion of the entire leased premises was included in the strip taken by the defendant, or what its relative value was to plaintiff's business, as compared with the entire premises; but a strip of land 20 by 120 feet in its dimensions, in relation to two ordinary town lots, especially as it included the driveway used in the plaintiff's business, would seem to be of some material importance to the leasehold. The finding of the court that the lessee could construct another driveway on the land remaining to him which was clear and unobstructed, and that his eviction from the strip in question "did not render the said premises wholly unfit and useless to plaintiff for the purposes of said business," does not militate against such conclusion. A trespassing landlord cannot be permitted to "apportion his own wrong"; nor can it be assumed that because a tenant leaves a part of the leased ground unutilized, it constitutes an implied license to his landlord to build a house on it and come and live with him. When the landlord, in violation of the covenant of quiet possession under the lease, moves in, the tenant surely is justified in moving out, and suing for damages, if he so elects. "Any act of a permanent character, done by the landlord or by his procurement, with the intention and effect of depriving the tenant of the enjoyment of the premises demised or a part thereof, to which he yields, and abandons possession, may be treated as an eviction from the whole." Royce v. Guggenheim, 106 Mass. 201, 8 Am. Rep. 322; Smith v. Raleigh, 3 Camp. 513; Tiffany, Landlord and Tenant, § 185. When the lessor by an illegal act materially disturbs the possession of his tenant, which he should protect and defend, the latter may abandon the premises leased and recover damages." Central Business College v. Rutherford, 47 Colo. 277, 107 Pac. 279, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 637, 19 Ann. Cas. 688; Agoure v. Lewis, 15 Cal. App. 71, 113 Pac. 882; Skaggs v. Emerson, 50 Cal. 6; Osmers v. Furey, 32 Mont. 581, 81 Pac. 345.

[2] We are of the opinion, on the facts found, that there was such an invasion by the landlord of the rights of the tenant under the lease as to constitute a constructive eviction from the entire leased premises, and to justify its abandonment by the lessee and the recovery of all proximate damages resulting from an eviction.

[3] The court found for the plaintiff on the question of damages, apparently on the theory of a partial eviction, and allowed the claim for $81, the amount plaintiff had expended on the driveway, which was part of the strip of land on which defendant wrongfully entered. Under proper pleadings, evidence, and findings in this case, plaintiff would be entitled to recover the value of his unexpired lease, not only on the strip from which he was actually evicted, but, upon the constructive eviction, for the entire premises, together with any other loss the natural and proximate result of such eviction. The pleadings are very vague upon most of the allegations of damage, the evidence is not before us, and the court has found that plaintiff was not damaged in any sum whatever by reason of value of the unexpired lease, loss of business or prospective profits, or by reason of loss of the orange juice as alleged in the complaint. On this appeal these findings of fact are not open to attack, and must be held conclusive. The findings of the court relative to the profits derived from plaintiff's business, while he occupied under the lease, gave no indication as to whether his profits were decreased or increased by his change of location.

[4, 5] It is also declared in the findings that plaintiff "has not been damaged in any sum by reason of the entailed expense incident to enforced, or any, removal of plaintiff from said premises"; but, as the court elsewhere expressly finds "that plaintiff necessarily expended about $868 in removing from said premises as aforesaid," the declaration that the plaintiff was not damaged by the expense so entailed must be construed as a conclusion of law, and an erroneous one. Ions v. Harbison, 112 Cal. 260, 44 Pac. 572; Niles v. Edwards, 90 Cal. 10, 13, 27 Pac. 159, 296. That the expenses necessarily incurred by a tenant in removing from premises upon an eviction may be recovered as damages seems to be generally recognized by the authorities. Sutherland on Damages, § 865; Jennings v. Bond Ind., 14 Ind. App. 282, 42 N. E. 957; McElvaney v. Smith, 76 Ark. 468, 88 S. W. 981, 6 Ann. Cas. 458; Griesheimer v. Bothman, 105 Ill. App. 585.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to include in judgment for plaintiff the cost of removal from premises as found on the trial, and his costs of suit.

SHEA v. BRODE. (Civ. 2644.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑581—SPECIAL ASSESSMENTS — SALE — NOTICE TO REDEEM —AFFIDAVIT OF SERVICE.

Affidavit of attempt to serve a notice to redeem property sold for a delinquent special assessment for municipal playgrounds which alleged posting of the notice on the property and search for the name of the owner in the municipal and telephone directories and at the office of a company claiming to list the addresses of property owners held to show due diligence in attempting to serve the notice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Action by Barbara N. Shea against A. W. Brode. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George H. Moore, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Conner, Heath & Maxwell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Plaintiff was the record owner of the lot in question. Defendant asserted title to the property under and by virtue of a deed made and delivered to him by the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles, in pursuance of proceedings had and taken under the provisions of the Park and Playground Act (Stats. 1909, p. 1066) to condemn certain property known as Exposition Park, the assessment for the cost of acquiring which was levied upon lots and parcels of land which included that in controversy.

The legality and correctness of the proceedings had and taken prior to the time when the assessments made became delinquent are unquestioned. Plaintiff, respondent here, challenges the validity of the proceedings upon five grounds. She claims: First, that the signing of the certificate of delinquency by R. I. Follmer, assistant clerk, was irregular and insufficient to constitute a compliance with the provisions of section 18 of the act; second, that the certificate of sale was not executed in duplicate, because, while conceding that one copy thereof was properly signed by the president of the board of public works, the signature to the other copy was a fac simile stamp signature of the same officer, affixed at his request by the clerk; third, that the signature "Board of Public Works of the City of Los Angeles, by Lorin A. Handley, President," affixed to the deed, was unauthorized and insufficient to constitute an execution of the deed; fourth, that the notice to redeem is invalid in that, after the statement of the amount due for redemption, it contained the following words inserted in parentheses: "And three dollars for serving of this notice and making affidavit thereto, as allowed by law."

In the case of O'Neil v. Brode, Civil No. 2630, reported in 181 Pac. 91, all of these questions were presented to this court upon an appeal which involved the same proceedings and assessment, and decided adversely to the contention of respondent. It is unnecessary to repeat what was there said; suffice it to say that the members of this court adhere to the conclusions reached therein in disposing of the same questions now raised on this appeal.

The other point made in this case and not involved in the O'Neil Case is that the affidavit of service of notice to redeem is insufficient, for the reason that it fails to show an exercise of due diligence on the part of defendant in serving the notice, as required by section 24 of the act. It appears from the affidavit that, the property being vacant and unoccupied, affiant posted a sufficient notice thereon in a conspicuous place, tacked upon a board and nailed to an upright stake driven into the ground, that the assessment showed the name of the owner of the property to be Cornelius Shea, that after making inquiry in the immediate vicinity of said property in an effort to locate Cornelius Shea and obtaining no information as to him or his whereabouts, he searched the city directory of Los Angeles and the directories of the two telephone companies without finding his name therein, that thereupon he, for a remuneration paid, sought the assistance of a company known as the Los Angeles Map & Address Company, which claimed to possess knowledge of the names and addresses of people owning lots and lands in the city of Los Angeles, and from said company learned that Barbara N. Shea, plaintiff herein, was the then owner of the property, and that a letter addressed to her, care Spokane Title Company, Spokane, Wash., should reach her, that thereupon defendant mailed said notice to redeem to the address so given him, which letter was returned by the post office department, and that affiant does not know of any method or way to induce the owner of said property to redeem the same, followed by a statement that prior to the posting of notice upon said property he had exercised due diligence to find the owner thereof. In support of her contention that this affidavit fails to show an exercise of due diligence, respondent cites Hennessy v. Hall, 14 Cal. App. 759, 113 Pac. 350, wherein the affidavit was held insufficient by reason of the fact that no acts performed by the affiant in his efforts to discover the whereabouts of the party were shown; the averment being merely that he had used due diligence. This was held insufficient; but it is not authority for the contention here made, since the acts done by affiant are set forth in the affidavit. In our opinion, the averments are sufficient under the circumstances to show due diligence on the part of defendant in his effort to ascertain the whereabouts of plaintiff and serve upon her the notice to redeem required by the statute.

Upon the authority of what is said in O'Neil v. Brode, supra, and our conclusion as to the sufficiency of the affidavit, the judgment is reversed.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷706(5)—AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT—EVIDENCE.

In pedestrian's action for injuries from being run down by automobile, testimony that, when defendant apparently saw plaintiff and applied his brakes, he "skidded his machine for fully 50 feet, the fire flying from under the tires, trying to stop," held to support finding that defendant was traveling at a dangerous and unlawful speed.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷705(10)—AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

That plaintiff pedestrian, run down by defendant's automobile, endeavored to save himself by grasping the machine, and that in so doing he may have aggravated his injury, does not show contributory negligence on his part.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ⚷706(2)—AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT—PROOF AND VARIANCE.

That plaintiff pedestrian, run down by defendant's automobile, may not have been actually thrown to the pavement, as he alleged, does not show failure of proof to sustain the complaint made, plaintiff being struck by the automobile in the manner described and suffering injuries, and it being immaterial whether, after being struck, he remained on his feet or fell.

Action by Loren Ellis against M. S. Sanberg. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. H. Appel and E. J. Dennison, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Hocker, Robert E. Austin, and Hocker, Morris & Austin, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. A judgment in this case was entered in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $400 as damages which the court found plaintiff had suffered by reason of personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1-3] In the complaint of plaintiff it was alleged that, while plaintiff was crossing a public street in the city of Los Angeles, the defendant came down the street operating an automobile, and that said automobile was traveling at a dangerous rate of speed and in excess of the speed permitted by law, and that defendant "so carelessly and negligently operated and drove his said automobile as to run the same into the person of plaintiff, running him down, and said automobile struck plaintiff with such force and violence that plaintiff was violently thrown to the pavement." Under findings made by the court the facts were determined to be as alleged by the plaintiff. Defendant in his answer denied that any negligent act had been committed on his part, and further alleged that the injuries to plaintiff were caused by the contributory negligence of the latter. It is here contended that the evidence was insufficient to justify the court in making findings in favor of the plaintiff and that the defense of contributory negligence should have been sustained. The case on the evidence was peculiarly one for the judgment of the trial court and was not a case where the evidence showed without conflict a lack of negligence on the part of the defendant. The plaintiff attempted to cross the street about midway between the corners of the block. He testified that he saw the machine of the defendant when it was 30 or 40 feet away, that he did not know upon which side the machine was going to pass, and, becoming confused in order to save himself he attempted to grasp the machine in front, and that as he did so the machine came to a stop, not before, however, his leg had been damaged by contact with it. Another witness testified to having observed the accident. He testified that he was in a machine following the machine of the defendant just before the accident, and that the machine of the defendant was traveling in the neighborhood of 40 miles an hour; that as the defendant apparently saw the plaintiff crossing in front of him he put on his brakes and "skidded his machine for fully 50 feet, the fire flying from under the tires, trying to stop the machine."

From this brief statement of the evidence it will at once be seen that, notwithstanding any contradictory testimony offered by the defendant, there was substantial evidence before the court tending to show that the defendant in driving down the street was traveling at a dangerous and unlawful rate of speed. Finding such to be the fact, the court was justified in concluding that, had defendant's machine been traveling at a reasonable and safe rate, it would have been more easily controlled, and plaintiff would have advanced beyond its course before he found the machine upon him. That the plaintiff endeavored to save himself by grasping the machine, and that in so doing he may have aggravated his injury, does not show contributory negligence on his part. His act may have been, and we must assume the court so considered it, the act of a reasonable man under the circumstances. That he may not have been actually thrown to the pavement, as he alleged, does not show that there was a failure of proof to sustain the complaint made. The plaintiff was struck by the automobile of the defendant in the manner described, and suffered injuries. It is immaterial whether, after being so struck, he remained upon his feet or fell to the ground. In our opinion, the decision of the trial judge is fully supported by the evidence.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Action by the McKissick Cattle Company against Baptista Alsaga. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Kelley, of Susanville, for appellant.

Dodge & Barry, of Reno, Nev., for respondent.

Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, amicus curiæ.

HART, J. This action was instituted by the plaintiff to enjoin the defendant from maintaining on certain of the plaintiff's lands a dam and a ditch, whereby water is diverted from Secret creek to the lands of the defendant. Findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintiff, and this appeal is prosecuted by the defendant from said judgment.

The plaintiff claims the exclusive right to all the waters flowing in said creek, both as a riparian owner and as an appropriator, and sets up both those claims in two different causes of action. The defendant, besides specifically denying by answer all the material facts alleged in the complaint, filed a cross-complaint, in which he sets up a claim to 50 inches of the water of the creek, measured under a 4-inch pressure, by virtue of appropriation and also by prescription. The facts, as disclosed by the findings, are these:

The plaintiff is the owner of a little more than a quarter section of land in township 26 and a number of other quarter sections in township 32, in Lassen county, and has been the owner of said lands for many years. The waters of Secret creek, above mentioned, in a well-defined channel, between well-defined banks, flow over and across said lands; the latter being, therefore, riparian thereto and susceptible of irrigation from the waters thereof. All the waters of said stream are necessary for the irrigation of said lands for the purpose of growing crops thereon.

More than 25 years prior to the commencement of this action a grantor of plaintiff appropriated all of the waters of said stream by constructing dams in the channel thereof at various places in and upon said stream and constructing ditches leading from said dams to and upon said lands, and for more than 25 years prior to the institution of this action the plaintiff and its said grantor have appropriated and diverted, by the means above indicated, all of the waters of said stream and, except when interfered with by defendant, have continuously used said waters for the irrigation of crops of hay and grasses for pasture standing and growing on said lands; that, inasmuch as the climate of that section of the state in which said lands are situated is arid, it is absolutely necessary and, in fact, indispensable to the growing of hay and grasses on the lands of plaintiff to irrigate the same; and that properly to irrigate said lands, or so that they will produce crops of hay and grasses, it is necessary for plaintiff to use all of the waters of said stream.

The defendant is, and for more than 10 years prior to the beginning of this action had been, the owner and in the possession of fractional portions of certain sections, in quantity amounting in the aggregate to a quarter section, in said township 32. Over a corner of the said lands of the defendant the creek above mentioned traversed, and the said lands, although (as the court found) riparian to said creek, are not susceptible of irrigation from the waters of said creek without the necessity of going upon the lands of plaintiff for the purpose of diverting the waters from the stream to the lands of defendant by the construction and maintenance of a dam on plaintiff's lands and constructing and maintaining a ditch leading from such dam to defendant's lands.

As above stated, the defendant in his cross-complaint claimed title to 50 inches of the waters of the creek by appropriation and prescription, and in this behalf alleged that in the year 1894 one Edward W. Tregaski, a grantor of defendant, at a time when said Tregaski was the owner of defendant's lands, constructed a ditch at a certain point on plaintiff's land connecting with Secret creek and leading to defendant's lands, and thereby appropriated and diverted to the latter lands 50 inches of the waters of said stream "for a useful and beneficial purpose"; that at the time of the appropriation so made such waters were unappropriated and unclaimed waters flowing in said stream, and that said appropriation was made "peaceably, quietly, and without objection or interference by the owners of said lands upon which said diversion was made"; that ever since the time of said diversion, in the year 1894, the defendant's said grantor and the defendant have continuously, in each and every year thereafter and until the year 1915, appropriated, diverted, and used 50 inches of said waters, measured under a 4-inch pressure, for the necessary irrigation of crops of hay, grain, and grasses growing upon defendant's lands. It is then averred that in the month of April, 1915, the plaintiff willfully, wrongfully, and without right, and against the consent of defendant, constructed a dam in said creek at the point where the ditch leading to defendant's land tapped said creek, and by means thereof and a ditch constructed by said plaintiff turned the waters of said stream away from the defendant's lands on to the lands of plaintiff, thereby depriving defendant of any use of the waters of said creek, etc.

As to the above allegations of defendant's cross-complaint, the court, after finding that said Tregaski did not in the year 1894, or at any other time, build the ditch referred to or otherwise make an appropriation of any of the waters of said stream to be used on defendant's lands or for any purpose, further found:

> "That prior to the winter of 1913 and 1914 there was an ancient channel heading upon the lands of plaintiff, lying on said stream above the lands of defendant, and that said ancient channel caught up the waste waters from the said lands of plaintiff so lying above on said stream, as aforesaid, and said Tregaski did construct a ditch from said ancient channel to and upon defendant's said lands, and said Tregaski and said defendant down to the winter of said years 1913 and 1914, used the waters of said ancient channel and ditch as the same wasted or flowed from the said lands of plaintiff, situated on said stream above said lands of defendant, that, in the winter of the years 1913 and 1914, the natural channel of said stream, by reason of unusual flood or freshet, washed out to such an extent that no water would or could flow from said stream to the lands of defendant, or to the head of said ancient channel, except by defendant constructing a ditch over the lands of plaintiff on said stream, and above the lands of defendant, and constructing a dam in the channel of said stream on the lands of plaintiff in the channel of said stream above the said lands of defendant.
> "That in the year 1914, after said flood or freshet, defendant, for the purpose of causing the water of said stream to flow into said ancient channel willfully and unlawfully, and without right, and without the consent of plaintiff, entered upon the west half of the northeast quarter of said section 26, township and range aforesaid, and erected a new dam in the channel of said stream, and constructed a new ditch leading from said dam upon and across a portion of the said west half of the northeast quarter of section 26, and to lands occupied and claimed by defendant lying west of said lands, and said defendant now claims the right to maintain said dam in the channel of said stream, and to maintain said ditch and take water therethrough, across a portion of the said lands of plaintiff, to and upon lands so claimed and occupied by defendant."

It was further found that the defendant "has no right to maintain said dam in the channel of said stream or said ditch across said lands." The findings further show that in the month of April, 1915, plaintiff, in the manner charged and described in defendant's cross-complaint, stopped the flow of the waters from the creek into the ditch leading to defendant's lands, but it was found that the act of the plaintiff in that respect was not unlawful or wrongful. Neither the defendant nor his grantors (so it was found)—

> "have ever diverted 50 inches of water, or any number of inches of water whatever, from said stream for any length of time whatever, openly, notoriously, continuously or adversely to the plaintiff or its grantors, or either of them, or under any claim of right and title against said plaintiff, and that neither defendant nor his grantors have ever appropriated and diverted, or used and appropriated and diverted, or used and appropriated the waters of said stream, or any portion thereof, openly, notoriously, continuously, or adversely to the plaintiff or its grantors, or either of them."

The appellant contends: (1) That the findings are not supported; and (2) that certain findings are so irreconcilably inconsistent with each other that the incongruity is fatal to the judgment.

[1] We do not intend, nor is it necessary, to present herein a detailed or an extended statement of the testimony, to show that the first point above stated is wholly destitute of merit. It will suffice to state that there is disclosed by the record ample evidence to show that since the year 1895, and down to the time in 1914 when the defendant constructed the ditch on the plaintiff's land to carry water from the creek to his land, the plaintiff had continuously and uninterruptedly used for the purpose of irrigating its lands all the waters of Secret creek, and that all the waters flowing in the creek were necessary for that purpose. Indeed, it was sufficiently made to appear that there was not enough water flowing in said creek to provide properly or adequately for the crops grown on all the plaintiff's lands. It was further shown by what appears to be sufficient proof that none but waste waters from the creek ever did reach the defendant's land, and this waste water was small in quantity and came from the irrigation by plaintiff of that portion of its lands known as the "upper meadow"; that the waste water referred to ran into what the court in its findings characterizes as an "ancient channel." Said channel, it seems, was an old slough which had ceased to carry water; that the use of the waste water emptying into said channel or slough as the result of the irrigation of plaintiff's "upper meadow" was accomplished by the defendant's grantor, said Tregaski, by a ditch connecting with said slough; that the use in such manner of said waste water was continued by the defendant's grantor and himself until the rainy season of 1913–14, when, as seen, the channel of Secret creek was so washed out by a freshet as to render it incapable of carrying its water so that it would empty the waste waters into the old slough.

In addition to the foregoing, it may be stated that certain witnesses testified that in certain years prior to that in which the defendant constructed the ditch in controversy, they had worked on the land owned by the defendant and that they knew that no water from Secret creek, except the waste above referred to, was ever used on said land. It may also be added that it appears that, just prior to the construction by the defendant of the ditch in question, the latter stated to the witness Enyart, who was foreman or superintendent of the plaintiff and as such had charge of its lands and stock business, that he (defendant) desired the use of the water of the creek for the period of 10 or 12 days only; that Enyart replied to the defendant, "I can't let you have it—it would be against the company's wishes, and I can't do it; I said, 'You can write out an agreement and pay me a dollar,'" whereupon a written agreement or promise was prepared and signed by defendant and delivered to Enyart, in which he promised "to pay the McKissick Cattle Company $1 for the water for my ryefield for 12 days." In this connection, it may be well to state that Enyart testified that the defendant, at the time of making said agreement, made no claim whatever to the water flowing in Secret creek, nor, from the time he (witness) first entered into the employment of plaintiff, in the year 1895, to the "present time," did any one living on or occupying "the Tregaski place or Alsaga land" make "any claim [to witness] of any right to use the waters of the creek, except in the last couple of years," when the witness discovered the ditch complained of.

The testimony further shows that the plaintiff has utilized the waters of the stream for its purposes by putting dams therein and building small ditches on its lands, and that there is no way in which the defendant can divert the water from the creek to his lands except by doing what he did in the year 1914, viz. by maintaining a dam in the channel of the creek in the meadow field of plaintiff and a ditch leading from the dam to the defendant's land. There is ample testimony from which the trial court was authorized to find that the ditch in question was constructed by the defendant in the year 1914.

It is clear from the foregoing statement of the evidence that (as above declared) the finding that the plaintiff for more than 20 years prior to the commencement of this action had continuously and uninterruptedly used, by virtue of rights acquired as an appropriator, until interfered with by defendant, as above explained, all the waters of Secret creek for a beneficial purpose and that all said waters were necessary for such purpose, is supported.

[2] The claim that there is a fatal inconsistency between certain of the findings is based upon the fact that while, as above shown, the court found that the plaintiff was entitled to take and use all the waters of said creek, it also found that the lands of the defendant were riparian to said stream. It must be conceded that the idea that a person may be a riparian owner and at the same time not entitled to exercise the rights which are the necessary corollary of such ownership is inherently inconsistent. If he be a riparian owner, or his lands are riparian to a flowing or any stream, he is ex necessitate, entitled to exercise riparian rights, unless he has by his own acts divested himself of such rights or otherwise suffered the loss of them. It is probable, however, that what the court meant to declare by said finding was merely that the lands of defendant were riparian to the creek so long as water flowed therein so as to reach that part of the creek passing over said lands.

But, assuming that the cross-complaint of defendant sufficiently shows by its averments that defendant's lands were ever riparian to the creek in question (an assumption directly opposed to the contention of counsel for plaintiff), we still have here this situation: The evidence shows, the court finds, and the defendant expressly admits in his briefs, that in the winter of 1913–14 the natural channel of said creek was, from natural causes, so changed as that the waters thereof no longer thereafter flowed to defendant's lands, the same being caused by a flood or freshet which washed out the natural channel to such an extent and in such manner as that it brought about the results indicated. And the defendant further admitted (and the court found upon evidence sufficient in itself, and independently of such admission, to warrant the finding) that the defendant could not restore the water without ditching the water from the creek at a point upon the plaintiff's lands. In other words, it was not only found by the court, but it was admitted by the defendant that he cannot secure a return of the water into the channel of the creek, so that it will reach his lands without using the plaintiff's lands for that purpose. It follows, therefore, that, even if it be true that defendant's lands were formerly riparian to the waters of Secret creek, the finding that they were riparian to said waters at the time of the commencement of this action is entirely devoid of any justification whatsoever; for when, solely by an act of Providence, the channel of riparian waters has been so changed as that such waters cease to flow over and across the lands of a riparian owner—that is to say, when such waters cease through the operation of some natural force to pursue their accustomed course and in consequence cease to flow in a portion of that natural channel, which portion of such channel passes or crosses over certain lands—then in that case the owner of such lands loses the rôle of a riparian owner. Or, as this proposition is learnedly and lucidly explained by former Justice Henshaw, in Wholey v. Caldwell, 108 Cal. 95, 41 Pac. 31, 30 L. R. A. 820, 49 Am. St. Rep. 64:

> "The foundation of the riparian proprietor's rights rests upon the universally accepted maxim adopted by the common law from the civil law: 'Aqua currit, et debet currere ut currere solebat ex jure naturæ.' These rights thus draw their support from the laws of nature, but they do not rise superior to those laws. When, by their operation, the flow is lost, the right is lost with it. The new channel itself becomes the natural channel. Otherwise a riparian proprietor would hold all lands above him in an extraordinary and perpetual servitude. If, by the forces of nature, the stream should change its course at a point miles above him, he would still be empowered to subject any and all of the intermediate territory to operations requisite to enable him to turn the water back upon his own premises, and this power would be his to the very fountainhead of the stream. Such a doctrine could not be tolerated."

The doctrine thus declared is so obviously the product of sound principle and sound sense that it would be wholly supererogatory to multiply authorities expounding and upholding it, although, for the convenience of the profession, we may with no impropriety refer to the following authorities in this connection: Hale's (Sir Matthew) De Juro Maris, c. 1; Kent's Commentaries, 428; Blackstone's Commentaries, 262; Angell on Water Courses, § 57; Gould on Waters, § 159, and cases mentioned thereunder; 1 Wiel on Water Rights, § 862.

[3, 4] Without doubt a riparian owner, having lost his rights as such by avulsion, may ditch the water back to its original channel, if he does not delay doing so beyond a reasonable time. 1 Wiel on Water Rights, § 862; Morton v. Oregon Short Line Ry. Co., 48 Or. 444, 87 Pac. 151, 152, 153, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) 344, 120 Am. St. Rep. 827; Mathewson v. Hoffman, 77 Mich. 420, 43 N. W. 879, 6 L. R. A. 349; Farnharm, Waters, § 491. But in restoring the water to its original channel he will not be permitted to disturb the rights of appropriators, nor has he the right to go upon the lands of others, without their consent or acquiescence, and build thereon dams and ditches, or either, whereby he may restore the lost waters to their original bed. The defendant in this case entered upon the lands of the plaintiff and constructed the ditch complained of without the consent of the latter, and, as in no other way can he bring back to the portion of the channel of Secret creek passing over and across a corner of his lands the waters which had theretofore flowed therein, he stands as one who has lost his riparian rights with respect to the creek in question.

[5] The result of the foregoing considerations is, as above stated, that the finding that defendant's lands are riparian to Secret creek is wholly out of place in the judgment roll and is to be disregarded. The judgment is amply supported by the other findings.

[6] It is next contended that there is no evidence supporting the finding of "an ancient channel heading upon the lands of plaintiff, lying on said stream above the lands of defendant and into which flowed the waste waters from plaintiff's lands," and that defendant's grantor, Tregaski, maintained a ditch from said "ancient channel to and upon defendant's said lands," by means whereof he utilized for the benefit of said lands the waste waters from plaintiff's lands. The specific objection to said finding is that there is no evidence of the existence of an "ancient channel." The witness Enyart testified that "Alsaga takes the water out in a ditch above the deep channel in the upper field; his ditch runs into an old slough; that is, the waste water from the irrigation of the upper meadow, and that was all of the water that was used on the Tregaski place at that time"—referring to the time intervening between the years 1896 and 1900.

It is doubtless true that the "ancient channel" found by the court to exist is the "old slough" mentioned by the witness Enyart. Counsel for defendant undertake to differentiate an "old slough" from an "ancient channel," declaring that, while a slough is "an inlet from a river or a wet and marshy place" (Webster's Dict.), "an ancient channel no longer holds or carries water." The distinction is verbal rather than real. The word "channel" is, as we understand it, a generic term, and applies to any water course, whether a river, a creek, a slough, or a canal. If the phrase "an ancient channel" means an abandoned water course, we can see no reason why the phrase "old slough" should not imply the same thing, if it be true that water once flowing in it has ceased permanently so to flow. But the discussion is academic and without importance, since the finding that the defendant had never used any but the waste waters flowing from the plaintiff's lands after the irrigation thereof from Secret creek is alone sufficient; it being immaterial in what manner such waters reached the defendant's lands, whether by means of an "old slough," an "ancient channel," or an artificial waterway.

There is no just reason presented for disturbing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

VOORHEIS v. TIDEWATER SOUTHERN RY. CO. et al. (Civ. 1973.)

1. RAILROADS ⟹222(3) — OPERATION — NUISANCE—TRAINS IN STREET.

Allowing long freight trains to stand a long time on a street held to constitute a public nuisance, and an obstruction to the free use of abutting business property, resulting in an unlawful obstruction of a highway.

2. RAILROADS ⟹222(3)—PUBLIC NUISANCE—RAILROAD IN HIGHWAY.

A public nuisance is created by construction of a railroad in a highway without legal authority.

3. RAILROADS ⟹222(5)—OPERATION—ACTION TO ENJOIN NUISANCE—COMPLAINT.

Unnecessary allegations in an abutting owner's complaint against a company operating a railroad in a street, as to violation of its franchise may be disregarded, and the complaint treated as one for restraint of a public nuisance so far as injurious to plaintiff; it being enough to show the acts or facts constituting the nuisance, and the resulting injury, and for defendant to show justification.

4. NUISANCE ⟹72—ENJOINING—ACTION BY PRIVATE CITIZEN.

For a private citizen to be entitled to an injunction for a public nuisance, it is only necessary to show he has suffered an injury peculiar to himself, and not suffered by the public in general.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; W. H. Langdon, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Voorheis against the Tidewater Southern Railway Company and another. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Brown & Hindman, of Modesto, for appellant.

Arthur L. Levinsky, of Stockton, and Arthur J. Carlson, of Modesto, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brought the action to have the defendant railroad corporation restrained from performing certain acts in connection with the operation of its railroad. Defendants filed general and special demurrers to the complaint, which were sustained. Plaintiff elected to stand upon her complaint, and judgment was entered against her for costs, from which judgment she prosecutes this appeal.

The complaint alleged: That plaintiff was and is a citizen, householder, freeholder, and taxpayer of the city of Modesto, in Stanislaus county; that the defendant Tidewater Southern Railway Company is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of California, "and the direct successor in interest of the Tidewater & Southern Railroad Company"; that the city of Modesto is a municipal corporation; that on or about May 17, 1911, the city of Modesto granted to said railroad company a franchise whereby it was granted the right and privilege of constructing, maintaining, and operating a railroad over certain streets and alleys in said city. A copy of said franchise is attached to and made a part of the complaint. It was then alleged that said railroad was to be constructed of standard gauge and to run between Stockton and Turlock; that cars were to be operated thereon "by electricity, gasoline, or any other lawful motive power, except steam, horses, and mules." The route of said railroad through the city of Modesto was then set forth. It was then alleged that among the provisions of said franchise were the following:

> "All freight and express matter shall be hauled and transported in closed cars having the same general appearance as passenger cars, but omitting the windows in the sides and ends thereof, and said cars shall be painted the same general color as the passenger cars, and shall have a generally neat appearance, save and except, however, that between the hours of 10:30 p. m. and 6 a. m. freight matter may be transported in cars such as may generally be used upon steam railroads for the transportation of freight, and save and except, further, that during any hour of the day or night perishable freight only may be transported in such freight cars as may be used by steam railroads for the transportation of freight in trains of not more than five cars."

And also the following:

> "That said grantee, its successors and assigns, shall not permit nor suffer nor allow any freight or express cars to be side-tracked, or to stop on said Virginia avenue or N street or Ninth street for more than five minutes in any one block."

It was then alleged that Virginia avenue and Ninth street are in a residence portion of the city of Modesto, and that Ninth street is a business street; that plaintiff is the owner of a business block fronting 90 feet on Ninth street, with stores on the ground floor and hotel and living apartments above. Violations of the two provisions of the franchise above set forth were alleged, as follows: That defendant railroad company was using locomotives propelled by steam "and equipped with loud and shrill steam whistles," bells, valves for blowing off surplus steam, and smokestacks; that said company was engaged in hauling freight of every character, at every hour of day or night, by freight trains composed of from 10 to 30 cars of various kinds, including box cars, flat cars, stock cars, and refrigerator cars, hauled by means of steam locomotives; that freight cars have been permitted to stand and remain on Virginia avenue, and Ninth streets for more than five minutes in one block, and for more than half an hour at a time, "thereby obstructing and impeding travel and traffic on said streets to the great detriment, annoyance, and inconvenience of the citizens of said city and of the public"; that large quantities of smoke and steam are emitted from the locomotives and carried into the faces of those in the vicinity and into the homes and business places in the vicinity of said streets so traversed by said railroad. Noises from the steam valves, steam whistles, bells, and by the rumbling and screeching of wheels, both day and night, were set forth, whereby "patronage is driven away from the business houses located on said streets, guests are turned away from hotels and rooming houses, homes in the vicinity are rendered uncomfortable and undesirable," and "the value of property and its rental value are greatly lessened and reduced, to the great injury, damage, and detriment of all persons living along or engaged in business in the vicinity of said streets so traversed by said railroad, and of all persons who own property abutting upon any of said streets, including the plaintiff herein." It was then stated that defendant railroad company had many times been requested to desist from violations of its said franchise, to which it had given no heed; that at a meeting of citizens to protest against further violations of said franchise the president of said defendant railroad company declared "it to be the intent and purpose of said defendant to continue to ignore and disregard the provisions of said franchise." Plaintiff avered that she made the city of Modesto a defendant because the officers and governing body of said city, though implored by plaintiff and other citizens to enforce said franchise, have failed, refused, and neglected so to do.

The complaint prayed that defendant railroad company, its servants, agents, etc., be enjoined from violating any of the terms of said franchise, particularly in five particulars, appearing in the provisions of the franchise above set out, and for general relief.

Separate demurrers by the defendants were filed. In ruling upon the demurrers the court said:

> "I have come to the conclusion that a citizen cannot maintain an action to restrain the violation of a franchise. He is not without remedy, however. If the facts warrant, he may proceed against the company for maintaining a nuisance, provided he can show that his injury is different in kind from that of his neighbors, not merely different in degree. He may also, through the Attorney General of the state, bring an action to forfeit the company franchise for the violation thereof."

Section 3479 of the Civil Code defines a nuisance as follows:

> "Anything which is injurious to health, * * * or offensive to the senses, or an obstruction to the free use of property, so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property, or unlawfully obstructs the free passage or use, in the customary manner of any * * * highway is a nuisance." "A public nuisance is one which affects at the same time an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons, although the extent of the annoyance or damage inflicted upon individuals may be unequal." Civ. Code, § 3480.

Section 3493 of the Civil Code provides as follows:

> "A private person may maintain an action for a public nuisance, if it is specially injurious to himself, but not otherwise."

[1, 2] That the acts complained of constituted not only a nuisance, but also a public nuisance, very clearly appears; and that they were an obstruction to the free use of plaintiff's property and resulted in an unlawful obstruction of a highway is equally clear. Admitting the facts to be true, as does the demurrer, a case for abatement of the nuisance or for relief through the restraining power of the equity court is, we think, satisfactorily shown. A public nuisance is created by the construction of a railroad in a highway without legal authorization. The quasi public character of railroads does not relieve them of liability; and if they have done acts which result in a nuisance, they are in no different situation than an individual proprietor. 20 R. C. L. p. 454.

[3] The demurrer seems to have been sustained on the ground that plaintiff was seeking to restrain the violation of a franchise which apparently the learned trial judge thought he could not do in this action. The court, however, added that plaintiff was not without remedy. "If the facts warrant," said the court, "he may proceed against the company for maintaining a nuisance, provided he can show that his injury is different in kind from that of his neighbors, not merely different in degree." And this brings us to what we regard as the only question to be decided. It is true that plaintiff in her prayer asks that defendant be "enjoined from violating any and all of the terms, provisions, or conditions of said franchise," and "particularly from violating said franchise in these particulars [there follows an enumeration of the various provisions of the franchise which it is claimed had been and were being violated]; that the plaintiff have all of the relief which to the court may seem meet and proper in the premises, and which may to equity appertain."

From our view of the case we do not think it was necessary that plaintiff should have pleaded the franchise and its violation. The acts and conduct of defendant were such as to constitute a nuisance. If the franchise furnished justification, it was for defendant to plead it or otherwise meet the effect of the acts charged in the complaint. Plaintiff chose to show by what right defendant was using the streets and its violation of that right. But this was immaterial. If defendant was maintaining a nuisance injurious to plaintiff which the law affords a remedy to have abated, it was only necessary to show the acts or facts constituting the nuisance, that defendant was the author of them, and the resulting injury to plaintiff. Disregarding, therefore, the matters set forth relating to defendant company's franchise and its violation and considering the acts alleged to have been committed and the threat to continue them unless restrained and the prayer for such relief as the facts set forth would warrant, we think the complaint sufficient to constitute a cause of action to restrain defendant company from further committing such acts, at least, as may be shown to be injurious to plaintiff's property which defendant is unauthorized to commit in the operation of its cars.

[4] The rule is stated as follows:

> "A private citizen is entitled to an injunction for a public wrong if he suffers an injury peculiar to himself, and not sustained by the general public in general, and the rule applies to nuisances as well as other wrongs. But unless the complainant has suffered special damages equity will not enjoin a public nuisance on the application of an individual, either in his own behalf or in behalf of himself, and others of like interest who either do or do not join in the application." 20 R. C. L. p. 477.

The question to be determined in this class of cases is whether in the particular instance in hand the plaintiff has suffered or is suffering an injury peculiar to himself and not sustained by the public in general.

Plaintiff is the owner of business block of buildings fronting on one of the streets of the city of Modesto over which defendant operates its cars. The injury complained of consists of an unwarranted interference with the free, unobstructed, and comfortable use of this property caused by the unlawful obstruction of the street by defendant company and the use of the street in a manner to injuriously affect the enjoyment of said buildings. The appellate courts of this state have had occasion to deal with such a situation in many cases, to some of which we will call attention.

Under section 249 of the Practice Act provisions relating to nuisance similar to those in the Codes are found. In Blanc v. Klumpke, 29 Cal. 156, it was held that, if a nuisance in a highway affects the plaintiff in common with the public at large in the use of the highway, he cannot have his private action; but, if the free use of his private property is interfered with by such nuisance, he may have his private action to abate the same. The principle was applied in Gardner v. Storrer, 89 Cal. 26, 26 Pac. 618.

The question was carefully considered in McLean v. Llewellyn, 2 Cal. App. 346, 83 Pac. 1082, 1085. The case was reheard in the appellate court, and hearing in the Supreme Court denied. It was the case of an obstruction in a street placed by defendant; the alleged injury being to the lot fronting on the street owned by plaintiff. Said the court:

> "It is a familiar and well-established rule that the owner of a lot abutting on a street has an easement or right of way over it, which in the strictest sense of the word is property [citing cases]. And though this right is one that he holds in common with the public, yet in so far as it affects the value * * * of his property it is a right peculiar to himself, and any interference with it constitutes a private as well as a public nuisance. * * * The test is, not the greater or less number of persons who are affected by the nuisance, but whether the particular right of a landowner is affected."

It was claimed by appellant when the streets became public, private rights of the kind claimed by appellant (obstructing the streets) are merged in the public right, and that interference with them cannot be the subject of a private action. Said the court:

> "But we can conceive of no principle upon which this contention can be allowed. The circumstances alleged in support of it is that a multiplicity of suits might be brought; but under the authorities last cited this is immaterial. To what extent such suits might be brought is to be determined by the simple consideration whether the land of plaintiff has been injuriously affected."

Williams v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 592, 89 Pac. 332, is an instructive case, in which plaintiff sought injunctive relief against defendant company for obstructing the public streets of the city of Los Angeles. Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court, said:

> "Every lot fronting upon a street has, as appurtenances thereto, certain private easements in the street, in front of and adjacent to the lot, which easements are a part of the lot, and are private property as fully as the lot itself, though exercised in the street and extending into and over the street. Any obstruction to the use of the street which impairs or destroys these easements is a private injury, special and peculiar to the owner of the lot, and different and distinct from the injury to the general public and from that which the owner suffers as a part of the general public. * * * As an abutting owner, he has the right to the private easements in question, and for an injury thereto he may sue for damages or to enjoin the continuance of the injury, regardless of the fact that the same obstruction also constitutes an injury to his public right of travel and regardless of the number of persons who may suffer a similar injury to similar private easements appurtenant to other lots fronting on the street."

See, also, Cushing-Wetmore Co. v. Gray, 152 Cal. 118, 92 Pac. 70, 125 Am. St. Rep. 47.

In the very recent case of Strong v. Sullivan, 181 Pac. 59, the question was again before the Supreme Court, and it was there said, Mr. Justice Melvin writing the opinion:

> "The finding that defendant's wagon obstructed the ingress and egress of plaintiff and his tenants to and from his * * * building was equivalent to a holding that defendant was maintaining a public nuisance which was especially injurious to plaintiff, and which, therefore, might be enjoined at his suit, because any injury to the use of the street which impairs plaintiff's private easements in the street in front of and adjacent to his lot amounts to an injury giving plaintiff, as an abutting owner, the right to maintain an action for damages or for an injunction."

It would have strengthened the complaint had plaintiff been more specific in showing in what way the railroad company's acts caused injury to his property in particular and bestowing less attention to its acts in affecting the public in general or other private property. But we think enough is shown to entitle her to such relief as the facts proven may warrant.

The judgment is reversed.

FRAUD ⚷58(2)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—MARKET VALUE.

In an action for damages for fraudulent misrepresentations as to the market value of the land taken by plaintiff in exchange, testimony for plaintiff that defendant stated that land was worth a certain sum, and defendant's testimony that the only values represented were trading values, held sufficient to sustain a finding that there were no false representations as to the market value.

Dean and Hogan for their costs, the action having been dismissed as to Burns. The plaintiff appeals.

It appears from the record that the plaintiff was the owner of a house and lot in the city of Alameda, upon which there existed a mortgage of $2,000, when she was approached by the defendant Burns, with whom she had a business acquaintanceship, with a proposal that she should exchange said property for country lands. Burns had a working agreement with Hogan, a real estate dealer and broker who was engaged in selling farm lands in San Joaquin county, including a tract of 25 acres belonging to his codefendant Dean, by which Burns introduced to Hogan prospective purchasers, and received, as compensation for such introduction and any further services rendered in assisting subsequent negotiations, a part of Hogan's commission. Burns having reported to Hogan the possibility of selling land to the plaintiff if her Alameda property were taken in whole or part payment therefor, Hogan examined her property, and a few days later with Burns accompanied her to San Joaquin county, and there showed her various tracts of land that he had for sale, including the 25 acres above mentioned. After some negotiations, a contract was entered into between plaintiff and Dean, through the agency of Hogan, by which plaintiff agreed to buy said acreage for the price of $6,250, being at the rate of $250 per acre, payment to be made by transferring to Dean said Alameda property, subject to the mortgage thereon, and paying $2,000 in two years, with interest. The plaintiff had expected to be able to sell this acreage in a comparatively short time at an advanced price, and for that purpose listed it with Hogan, but no sale having been effected at the time the said balance became due, she visited the locality of the land, and there made inquiries as to its value, and learned that it could not be sold for any sum approaching the price at which she had agreed to buy it. The defendant Dean having in the meantime disposed of the Alameda property, the plaintiff commenced this action for damages, alleging that the contract entered into by her was obtained by the false representations of Dean's said agents.

The alleged false representation, and the only one upon which she bases her action, is that Dean's agents represented to her, in order to induce her to enter into the contract, that the market value of the acreage property was $250 per acre—the price at which it was valued in the transaction. The making of this representation was denied by the defendants' answer, and the court found that such representation was not made. The court also found that Hogan was not the agent of Dean in the transaction, and it also made findings as to the value of the two parcels of property involved. These findings are attacked by the appellant as not supported by the evidence.

The findings as to the agency of Hogan and the market value of the respective pieces of property may be disregarded, for it is clearly apparent from the record that the court was fully justified in its finding that the alleged false representation was not in fact made. Hogan, who is charged in the complaint with having made this representation as to the market value, categorically denies it, his testimony being that the values placed upon both the plaintiff's and the defendant Dean's land were trading values, and that the question of market value was never mentioned. Even the testimony of the plaintiff herself falls short of substantiating her charge. She testified:

> "I asked him the price of it and he said it was $250 an acre. He said * * * the land was worth $250 an acre."

The plaintiff's husband was the only other witness on the subject of Hogan's representations as to value, and he testified:

> "He said the land would produce almost anything; it was a very fine piece of land, and I asked him if he was selling land around that price, and he said Yes, and he said land there was worth $250, $275, and $300 an acre right around there."

Even if we regard this testimony as relating to market value, it at most produces a conflict of evidence, upon which a reversal of the finding of the trial court cannot be predicated. The finding is fortified by the trial court's further finding that the figure at which the plaintiff's own property was taken in the transaction was far in excess of its market value. Under these circumstances, we think the finding of the trial court that the representation complained of was not made is amply sustained by the evidence.

The plaintiff having thus failed in the proof of her cause of action, the remaining questions discussed in her brief are of no practical interest.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOODY v. PACIFIC SURETY CO.
(Civ. 2762.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚿537(8)—ACTION ON ADMINISTRATOR'S BOND—COMPLAINT—"ACCOUNT FOR."

A complaint alleging that the administrator had never accounted for the money, that the court had found the sum to be due, but that the surety had refused to pay it, sufficiently alleges the administrator's failure to pay the money; since "to account for" includes not only the filing of an exhibit required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1622, but also paying over the money as required by sections 1613, 1697.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account For.]

2. PLEADING ⚿403(2)—ACTION ON ADMINISTRATOR'S BOND — COMPLAINT — CURE BY ANSWER.

The insufficiency of a complaint against the surety on an administrator's bond, which failed to allege refusal by the administrator to pay over the amount due, is cured by allegations in the answer that he had properly paid out all moneys received by him, which clearly put in issue the material fact insufficiently stated in the complaint.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚿537(9)—ACTION ON ADMINISTRATOR'S BOND—EVIDENCE—FAILURE TO PAY.

Evidence that an administrator in his account charged himself with the sum sued for, that he was removed for failure to account for the money received by him, that he still failed to pay over the money, three years later refusing to answer citation, is sufficient to sustain finding, in an action against the surety on his bond, that he had failed to pay over the amount received by him.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Action by E. A. Moody, as administrator of the estate of A. E. Moody, deceased, against the Pacific Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Louis Oneal and Wm. F. James, both of San José, for appellant.

R. C. McComish and D. M. Burnett, both of San José, for respondent.

NOURSE, Judge pro tem. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the surety on the bond of W. M. Smith, as administrator of the estate of A. E. Moody, deceased.

The conceded facts are that in January, 1905, Smith was appointed administrator of the estate. In February, 1911 he filed his account as such administrator, showing $2,577.66 in his hands belonging to said estate. In January, 1914, the probate court removed Smith as administrator and appointed respondent in his stead. In February, 1917, a citation was issued to, and personally served on, Smith, requiring him to render an account; upon his failure to appear the respondent, by order of the court, rendered an account for him, showing $2,577.66 in Smith's hands owing to the estate; this account was settled, and in April, 1917, a written demand for the payment to respondent of this sum was made on appellant before the commencement of this action. Respondent in this action sued the surety for the amount shown by this account to be due from Smith to the estate, and recovered judgment for that amount.

[1] Appellant insists that the complaint failed to state a cause of action, in that, it failed to allege nonpayment by Smith to the respondent, but merely alleges that "said W. M. Smith * * * has never accounted to the plaintiff or to the heirs of said A. E. Moody * * * for said sum," and that "defendant has failed, neglected, and refused to pay the same or any part thereof."

Of course, the allegation that the defendant has failed to pay, standing alone, is not a sufficient allegation of nonpayment, because payment might have been made by another. But the complaint alleges that neither the administrator nor any one in his behalf has accounted for said sum or any part thereof. This is followed by the allegation that the administrator charged himself with the exact amount sued for; that upon his failure to appear in answer to the citation to account, the court found that same amount to be still due; and that the defendant after demand refused to make payment.

The bond, which is made a part of the complaint, contained the condition that the administrator would "faithfully execute the duties of the trust according to law." An administrator is chargeable with the whole of the estate coming into his possession. Code Civ. Proc. § 1613. One of the duties of an administrator is to pay over all sums of money due from him to the distributees in accordance with the decree of distribution, and this he must do before he may be discharged. Code Civ. Proc. § 1697. Another duty is to "render an exhibit under oath showing the amount of money received and expended by him, * * * and all other matters necessary to show the condition of its [the estate's] affairs." Code Civ. Proc. § 1622.

The phrase "to account for" means more than the mere filing of a paper statement of account which is referred to as an exhibit in the preceding section. In State v. Williams, 77 Mo. 463, the contention was made that the condition of a guardian's bond "that he would well and truly account for" the moneys received by him, was satisfied when the guardian charged himself with the ward's money in the annual settlement. And, as in the instant case, the breach assigned in the petition was the failure "to account for" the moneys of the estate. But the court (77 Mo. page 471) said:

> "This is not all that is embraced in this term 'account for.' It is a condition not satisfied short of paying over the trust fund to the cestui que trust."

To a like effect is Cushman v. Richards, 100 Mass. 232. Thus the allegation of failure to account for the funds of the estate sufficiently raises the issue of failure to pay over the funds of the estate to respondent. Though the complaint is by no means a model, it contains a sufficient statement of facts which, taken with the inferences which may be properly drawn from the facts stated, is sufficient to sustain it as against a general demurrer. Jones v. Int. Indemnity Co., 179 Pac. 692.

[2] But even if the complaint were defective in this respect, it is cured by the allegations of the answer, which read:

> "That said W. M. Smith, as such administrator, has properly paid out and disbursed in the course of said administration all moneys received by him as such administrator except such moneys as were delivered into the hands of said plaintiff herein, and that all moneys not so paid out and disbursed by said W. M. Smith were received and retained by said plaintiff."

When a pleading is defective on account of an insufficient statement of material facts rather than on account of a statement of insufficient facts, the defect in such a pleading may be cured by the filing of a controverting pleading which clearly and unequivocally places in issue the material facts which have not before been put in issue on account of the insufficient statement of the former pleading. Lugiani v. Landau Economic Syphon Co., 175 Pac. 648.

[3] Appellant further insists that the finding of the trial court that Smith had not paid the amounts sued for is not supported by any evidence. The evidence is that in February, 1911, Smith filed his account as administrator, charging himself with the exact sum here sued for; that in January, 1914, after the probate court found his continued failure to account for the moneys in his hands, he was removed as such administrator. It became his duty at that time to pay over to his successor all of the funds of the estate then in his possession. This he failed to do, and three years later refused to answer the citation requiring him to account. There is ample evidence of a most flagrant breach of trust on his part as such administrator, shown by the record. The settlement of respondent's account in April, 1917, taken with the administrator's own admissions, was sufficient to fix the amount.

This evidence of the liability of the administrator was sufficient to support the finding of nonpayment as against the appellant. In a similar case the Supreme Court, in holding that the settlement of the account of the administrator was conclusive against his sureties, said:

> "When the liability of the principal thus became fixed, that of the surety also attached, and upon the failure of the principal to pay the money an action could have been maintained against the surety. In such case the decree of the probate court would have been conclusive upon the status of the account as respects the sureties as well as the administrator." Chaquette v. Ortet, 60 Cal. 594, 599.

To the same effect is Evans v. Gerken, 105 Cal. 311, 313, 38 Pac. 725.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KHAN. (Cr. 646.)

1. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑14 — ISSUANCE OF CHECKS IN EXCESS OF DEPOSIT.

Under Pen. Code, § 476a, making it a felony for any person with intent to defraud to draw or deliver to another a check or a draft on a bank, knowing at the time that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet the check, it is not necessary that it be shown, in order to establish the fraudulent intent, that the recipient of the check was actually defrauded, and where defendant gave the check in payment of a debt due the payee, representing thereby that it was good and valid, it is immaterial that the debt was past due and the payee parted with no new consideration.

2. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑22 — DRAWING CHECKS IN EXCESS OF DEPOSIT—CREDITS.

In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 476a, making it a felony for a person with intent to defraud to draw or deliver to another a check or draft on a bank, knowing at the time that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet the check, it is no defense that defendant, the drawer of the check, had a credit with the bank for checks given to garages for gasoline, where payment on all other checks had been stopped and checks as the one in question not bearing the word "gas" on them were not cashed, unless defendant came to the bank and requested that they be cashed.

3. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑42—DRAWING CHECK IN EXCESS OF DEPOSIT—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution, under Pen. Code, § 476a, for drawing a check in excess of his deposit and which he had no credit with the bank to meet, evidence, that when defendant was informed the check had been dishonored he laughed and said he would sometime pay it is admissible on the question of defendant's knowledge and guilty intent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

R. Khan was convicted, under Penal Code, § 476a, of passing a check without having sufficient funds on deposit in the drawee bank to pay the same, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. W. Glassford, of El Centro (Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Joseph L. Lewinsohn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Having been convicted of the crime of passing a check without having sufficient funds on deposit in the drawee bank to pay the same, defendant appeals from a judgment of imprisonment entered against him.

The crime charged was that described in section 476a, Penal Code, which makes it a felony for a person, "with intent to defraud," to draw or deliver to another a check or draft on a bank, knowing at the time that he has not sufficient funds in or credit with the bank to meet the check. The concluding portion of the section reads as follows:

> "The word 'credit' as used herein shall be construed to be an arrangement or understanding with the bank or depositary for the payment of such check or draft."

The appellant owed the complainant money on account of work done, and, the debt being due and payment being demanded, he issued his check to the complainant in payment of the same. The bank refused to cash the check on the ground that there were not sufficient funds available to the credit of appellant for that purpose. Appellant presents two main contentions, to wit: (1) That the check being issued in payment of an antecedent debt which had matured prior to the giving of the check, no crime was shown to have been committed. (2) That under the evidence in the case the conviction was improper, because it was shown that there was on deposit in the drawee bank at the time of the making and delivery of the check more than sufficient money to the credit of appellant to cover the same. Some other errors are assigned which will be later noticed.

[1] Under the first contention appellant insists that, in order for an intent to defraud to exist within the meaning of the section, the probability must appear that damage may result to the person to whom the check is delivered, and that, where such check is given for a debt past due and the recipient parts with no new consideration, it is impossible that he may be damaged. We do not think that the words of the section as requiring that an intent to defraud shall exist should be so narrowly construed; we do not think that it is necessary that it be shown, in order to establish such intent, that the recipient of the check as the result of the passing thereof may be actually defrauded. To our minds, the fraudulent intent here was shown when it was made to appear that the appellant gave the check, representing thereby that it was good and valid, and that it was given and received with the intent that it should pay appellant's debt. It seems to us immaterial as to whether the acceptance of the worthless check actually had the effect of extinguishing the debt. The language of the court in People v. Wilbur, 33 Cal. App. 511, 165 Pac. 729, while not fitting the facts here presented, supports our view of the law, where it is said:

> "And the fact that the check may be 'a worthless piece of paper' in the hands of the person to whom it was delivered, because it has not been properly indorsed, does not enter as an element into the crime defined by the section upon which the information is based."

The argument there was that because the check was not in form sufficient to authorize its payment, assuming that the defendant had funds to meet it at the bank, there could be no intent to defraud. The contrary was held in that case.

[2] Under the second point made, the evidence is pointed to which shows that, at the time of the making and delivery of the check in question, defendant did actually have a credit at the bank of a sum of money in excess of that called for by the check. However, prior to the making of this check, the defendant had delivered to the bank a writing in the following words:

> "This is to authorize the American State Bank to honor all checks I write to garages for gasoline. However, payment is stopped on all other checks."

The president of the bank testified that by this order it was understood between appellant and the bank that no checks drawn by appellant should be honored except those having the word "gas" on them. On cross-examination, when it was shown that other checks had been cashed without having the word indicated upon them, he testified that the bank did pay other checks than those bearing the prescribed word where the appellant personally came into the bank with the holder of the check and requested the bank to pay. In other words, that the instructions to the bank were partially oral and partially in writing. Clearly under this state of facts, the arrangement and understanding with the bank was that the appellant had no credit within the meaning of section 476a, Penal Code, to meet a check drawn as the one in question here was drawn.

[3] As to other points argued: We think the court properly admitted the testimony of the prosecutor who told how, after the check had been dishonored at the bank, he accosted appellant and informed him of the situation, and that appellant laughed and responded "Sometime I pay him." This testimony was entitled to be considered by the jury as indicating the guilty knowledge of appellant and as affecting the question of his good intent in passing the check. In the view we take of the case, appellant was not entitled to the instructions offered advising the jury that there could be no conviction unless the defendant, at the time of passing the check, obtained something of value from the complainant. The evident unintentional omission of the word "not," in one instruction given by the court, we think was without prejudice, because upon the whole instruction the jury could not reasonably have been misled, and if they had misinterpreted the instruction we cannot conclude, considering the text thereof, how it might have operated to prejudice the case of appellant. The court omitted the word "not" which we show in parenthesis in the instruction which we quote:

> "It is (not) for you to consider the penalty prescribed for the punishment of the offense, and if you are aware of the penalty prescribed by law it is your duty to disregard that knowledge. In other words, your sole duty is to decide whether defendant is guilty or not guilty of what he is charged with. The question of punishment is left wholly to the court except as the law circumscribes its power."

We find no errors in this record which would justify an order of reversal.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

ARNOLD et al. v. SAN FRANCISCO-OAKLAND TERMINAL RYS. (Civ. 2828.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 9, 1919. Rehearing Denied July 9, 1919; Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 7, 1919.)

Appeal and Error ⚷1213—Reversal—Directed Verdict on Retrial.

In action for death, where there was no material difference in the evidence from that which, on former appeal, the Supreme Court had declared showed such contributory negligence of deceased as precluded recovery, a directed verdict for defendant was proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by Elsa U. Arnold and others against the San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways. From judgment for defendants and order denying new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Jay Monroe Latimer and J. E. Pemberton, both of San Francisco, and J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, for appellants.

W. H. Smith, of Oakland, Geo. W. Mordecai, of Madera, A. L. Whittle, of San Francisco, M. C. Chapman and E. Trefethen, both of Oakland, W. S. Tinning, of Martinez, and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment entered upon a verdict rendered by a jury pursuant to direction of the trial judge, and from an order denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial.

The same case was before the Supreme Court upon a previous appeal, and the law of the case upon that appeal is declared in the opinion of Mr. Justice Shaw, rendered in Arnold v. San Francisco-Oakland Terminal Railways, 175 Cal. 1, 164 Pac. 798. That action was, and it is here, one to recover damages for death from a collision between an automobile which plaintiff's deceased husband was driving, and an electric street car, and it was there held that the contributory negligence of the deceased was such as to prevent recovery, it being shown that he was mentally and physically sound and in possession of his usual faculties, familiar with the conditions of the crossing where the accident happened, and that he saw the car coming when he was within 45 or 50 feet of the tracks, and that instead of turning aside or stopping so as to avoid danger, he first turned to the left, then to the right, and finally attempted to cross the tracks in front of the car.

The only question presented by appellants for a reversal of the judgment is the action of the trial judge in directing the verdict herein. The trial judge, in granting the motion for a directed verdict, acted upon the theory that the evidence was the same in both trials, and that he was bound by the law of the case. Appellants contend, however, that their evidence upon the second trial upon the issue of contributory negligence, and upon elements of fact constituting the basis of reversal on the former appeal, was materially different, and that the trial judge committed error in concluding that the evidence was the same in both trials. Mr. Justice Shaw, the writer of the opinion in this case upon the first appeal, succinctly outlined the controlling facts on the question of contributory negligence as matter of law, and from a careful review of the record we fail to see how the testimony herein is materially different from or additional to that given on the former trial, which the Supreme Court declared conclusively showed that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence which precluded a recovery by plaintiffs. The issues are identical upon both trials, consisting of the negligence of the defendant and the contributory negligence of deceased; and, while there were new witnesses, there is no change in the testimony under these issues such as might be considered to have created a material difference in the evidence.

In both trials the testimony as to the physical conditions surrounding the accident is identical, as is also that relating to the mental and physical condition of deceased and to his acts and omissions, both prior to and immediately preceding the collision.

The Supreme Court, in discussing the evidence given at the former trial, indicated that the deceased was at a given distance from the railroad track when he saw the car; and it is here contended that the evidence on the second trial is at variance with such declared distance, which constitutes a material difference, thereby destroying the efficiency of the rule of law of the case, and, further, that the evidence relative to the ability or lack of ability of deceased to stop or turn the machine is likewise materially different.

Without reviewing in detail the testimony it is sufficient to say that it does not present a material difference upon these questions from that given at the former trial. It is only upon the theory that deceased did not see the car until within a certain distance that the testimony has any value at all, and no new evidence permits of this assumption, nor has it any bearing upon the issue of contributory negligence on the part of deceased, nor does it establish a material difference as to the negligence of defendant. One of the new witnesses testified as to distance within which automobiles operating at various speeds could be stopped, but when analyzed this testimony does not result in any material difference from that given upon the subject at the former trial. Other witnesses gave testimony concerning the distance of deceased from the track when they first observed him. No new testimony, however, was presented upon the question as to when deceased first saw the car or when it was first possible for him to do so. The testimony of the occupants of the automobile which compelled the conclusion on the appeal in the first trial that deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, preventing a recovery by plaintiffs, was the same upon all the material and essential facts, except that one of them did not testify at the second trial, and whatever variance appeared therefrom was admitted by them to be due to that clearer and better recollection of the facts at the time of the first trial than at the time of the second, and that their former testimony was probably correct.

Tested by the standard of the evidence given at the former trial as recited by the Supreme Court, the evidence here is without material difference or addition, and presents, in substance, the identical case which has been declared by the Supreme Court to be without legal merit; and, as no verdict other than one for defendant could have been rendered under the evidence, the trial court was justified, and it was its duty, to direct a verdict in favor of defendant.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are affirmed.

THIELEN v. THIELEN. (Civ. 2656.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 28, 1919.)

1. Deeds ⟾208(5)—Delivery—Sufficiency of Evidence.

Conflicting evidence held to sustain a special verdict finding that deceased grantor handed deed to son for unconditional delivery to his sister, and that such delivery was not to be dependent upon grantor's death.

2. Deeds ⟾194(2) — Delivery — Presumption.

The grantee's possession of a deed constitutes prima facie showing of delivery.

3. Deeds ⟾200—Delivery—Evidence.

Testimony that deceased grantor expressed her intention of giving the property to her daughter and, after the deed's execution, stated that she had conveyed it to her, is competent to show the deed's delivery.

4. Appeal and Error ⟾1011(1) — Question of Fact.

Whether a grantor intended to divest herself of title by parting with deed is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court, and its finding, based upon a special jury verdict and conflicting evidence, will be accepted as conclusive.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Ralph A. Thielen, administrator of the estate of Regina May Thielen, deceased, against Lillian R. Thielen. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

D. H. Laubersheimer, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gurney E. Newlin, of Los Angeles (W. W. Hyams, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. In this action, plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of his deceased mother, Regina May Thielen, sued to quiet title to certain real estate described in the complaint, and to have a deed made by said decedent to Lillian R. Thielen, and under which she claimed title to the property, canceled and annulled.

An appeal is prosecuted from the judgment entered in favor of defendant.

As alleged in the complaint, the grounds upon which plaintiff sought the relief asked for were that at the time when deceased made and executed the deed she was of unsound mind and mentally incompetent to transfer the property, and that no legal delivery of the deed was ever at any time made.

As to both of these allegations, denied in the answer, the court, in accordance with the special verdict of the jury to which the issues were submitted, found adversely to plaintiff. Appellant challenges the findings, claiming the evidence is insufficient to support them.

As to whether at the time of the execution thereof the grantor in said deed was of sound mind and in mental condition to execute a valid conveyance of the property, there is a sharp conflict of evidence, in the consideration of which the determination of the jury is conclusive. There is abundant evidence to support the conclusion reached; indeed, the extent of appellant's contention with respect to this point is limited to the claim that, while conceding the existence of such conflict in the testimony, the preponderance of the evidence adduced thereon was in favor of plaintiff.

[1-4] As to the other question, namely, that the deed was never delivered to defendant, it appears from plaintiff's testimony that he, on June 20, 1912, at the request of deceased, who was then confined to her bed by illness, prepared the deed, in the form of a grant, and called in a notary, who at the trial testified that he fully explained to her the nature and purport of the instrument, stating that it was a conveyance of the property made by her to Lillian R. Thielen; that thereupon she signed and acknowledged the same, which the notary left with the plaintiff, whose testimony is that his mother told him to keep it in his possession and that if she got well to hand it back to her, otherwise to deliver it to Lillian, who should distribute the property between himself, Lillian, and his brother George; that some two weeks thereafter, but several months prior to the death of deceased, which occurred on December 10, 1912, he delivered the deed to Lillian, telling her that he "at last had mother's affairs in shape and had a deed made to her," and telling her further "that in the event mother got well to hand it back to her, but in the event anything happened to her she was to distribute the property according to mother's wishes, as it was to be held in trust"—all of which, other than the delivery of the deed, is flatly denied by Lillian.

It is apparent that neither the court nor the jury believed that plaintiff betrayed the confidence in him reposed by the grantor when she intrusted him with the deed, but that in giving it to Lillian he acted in accordance with her instructions. This conclusion finds ample support not only in the fact that Lillian's possession of the deed as grantee therein constituted a prima facie showing of its delivery (Ward v. Dougherty, 75 Cal. 240, 17 Pac. 193, 7 Am. St. Rep. 151; Devlin on Deeds, § 294), but there was much testimony, both from Lillian and disinterested witnesses, to the effect that deceased, prior to the execution of the deed, expressed her intention of giving the property to her daughter, and that after its execution she stated that she had conveyed the same to Lillian. This evidence was not only competent (Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703), but the inferences fairly deducible therefrom and from the acts of plaintiff, among which was the fact that after giving the deed to his sister he asked her to mortgage the property for his benefit, strongly tended to prove that plaintiff, in delivering the deed to Lillian, acted in accordance with instructions given him by the grantor, who intended that it should be at once delivered for the purpose of divesting herself of the title and transferring it to her daughter. "It is essential to the validity of a transfer of real property that there be a delivery of the conveyance with intent to transfer the title, and the true test under which delivery is to be determined is in ascertaining whether in parting with the possession of the conveyance the grantor intended thereby to divest himself of title." Williams v. Kidd, supra. This question of intention is one of fact to be determined by the trial court from a consideration of all the evidence in a given case; and, conceding in the instant case a conflict of evidence touching the issue, the finding of the jury, adopted by the trial court, must be accepted as conclusive thereon.

The judgment is affirmed.

Evidence regarding circumstances under which defendant's taxicab overtook and ran down a minor riding a bicycle in a city street, etc., held to sustain a verdict finding defendant negligent.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑706(5)—AUTOMOBILE ACCIDENT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Evidence regarding circumstances under which defendant's taxicab overtook and ran down a minor riding a bicycle in a city street, held to sustain a verdict that minor was not guilty of contributory negligence.

3. DEATH 🔑99(3)—DAMAGES—EXCESSIVENESS—DEATH OF CHILD.

Three thousand five hundred dollars damages for the death of a 15 year old boy earning $45 or $50 a month, which he gave to his father, who had a life expectancy of 25 years, held not excessive.

4. TRIAL 🔑256(1)—INCOMPLETE INSTRUCTIONS—FAILURE TO MAKE REQUESTS.

Appellant cannot complain of an incomplete instruction, which did not misdirect the jury, where he did not ask for a more specific instruction.

5. TRIAL 🔑256(10)—INSTRUCTIONS—OMISSIONS—REQUESTS.

An instruction in action for death which did not caution the jury not to allow for plaintiff father's sorrow over his son's death, nor state that future benefits father might have received from son should be discounted to present value, etc., held omissions not constituting reversible error, in absence of requests for more explicit instructions.

6. EVIDENCE 🔑14—JUDICIAL NOTICE—EXPECTATION OF LIFE.

Judicial notice will be taken as to expectation of life.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1068(5)—REVERSIBLE ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a father's action to recover for the death of his minor son, failure to instruct that the father had a life expectancy of 25 years held not prejudicial error, where the verdict was moderate.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑882(4)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—DISMISSAL.

In action for death against a taxicab company, plaintiff's action in joining stockholders as codefendants and later dismissing as to them, after taxicab company had demurred on ground of improper joinder of defendants, did not prejudice defendant taxicab company.

9. CORPORATIONS 🔑215—STOCKHOLDERS—LIABILITY.

While the stockholders of a taxicab corporation may eventually have to share a personal injury claim against the corporation, yet primary liability is against the corporation.

10. PLEADING 🔑364(6)—STRIKING OUT MATTER.

A personal injury complaint alleging that defendant taxicab company "carelessly and negligently" drove an automobile, etc., held not subject to motion to strike the words quoted.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1042(4)—PREJUDICIAL ERROR—PLEADING.

Conceding that words "carelessly and negligently," in complaint for wrongful death, were surplusage, the court's refusal to strike them does not constitute reversible error, where it is apparent that defendant was not injured by the ruling.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Pasquale Peluso against the City Taxi Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. A. Gett, of San Francisco, for appellant.

A. M. Seymour, Sheridan Downey, and Hyman W. Zagoren, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. This action was brought to recover damages for the death of a minor son, and the verdict and judgment were in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $3,500.

[1, 2] The evidence abundantly supports the finding that appellant's negligence was the proximate cause of the death of the minor. Indeed, we rarely have a case wherein such affirmation can be made with equal assurance. The overwhelming weight of the evidence shows that the minor was riding slowly on a bicycle on the proper side of Eighth street, in Sacramento. A taxi driven by an employé of appellant came from behind, going in the same direction and traveling at a high rate of sped. No signal was given by the driver to warn the boy of the approach of the taxi, and when the machine was within a few feet of the bicycle the driver swung it to the wrong side, trying to pass to the right of the bicycle, thereby causing a collision, which resulted in the almost instant death of the minor. Several disinterested witnesses testified substantially to the foregoing facts. Of these we may quote Mrs. Mary Silva, as follows:

> "Well, as we was going down Eighth street, my attention was directed to a boy on a bicycle, and he was just coming along, and all of a sudden I heard a terrible noise, just a buzz, and I noticed it was a taxicab, and I noticed them about the—just a little ways past the car track in the intersection on P street line, just 4 or 5 feet maybe, something like that, and the taxi was just coming at such speed that it swerved between the boy on the bicycle and the curbing, and the left of the automobile struck the hind end of the bicycle and threw the boy some distance from the bike and he landed on his head."

She further testified that the automobile was traveling "at least 30 miles per hour," the boy on the bicycle not more than "7 or 8 miles per hour," and that she did not hear any signal given and that the deceased "was coming straight." The testimony of the witnesses for the plaintiff, it may be added, shows that the boy was exercising ordinary care, that he was where he had a right to be, and he had no opportunity to escape the danger, if he really had any apprehension of it. The principles of law applicable to such a situation are plain, have often been stated by this and other courts, and they need no repetition. As we are required to view the facts, it must be said that appellant was palpably negligent, that there was no contributory negligence on the part of said minor, and that appellant is legally responsible for the accident.

[3] It can be said with equal confidence that the verdict is not so large as to be properly characterized as excessive. In fact, under the circumstances the amount seems to be quite reasonable, and it can be properly said that the jury manifested a degree of moderation and justice that is not always shown in such cases. To set the verdict aside upon this ground, the excess must appear as a matter of law, or "the facts must be such as to suggest at first blush passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury." Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687 Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50; Slaughter v. Goldberg, Bowen & Co., 26 Cal. App. 318, 147 Pac. 90. Nothing of this kind appears in the case at bar. The boy was 15 years of age, strong and healthy, was working regularly in the boiler-making shop of the Southern Pacific Company; he was receiving $45 or $50 a month, was the eldest of six children, and gave all of his earnings to his parents, for the support of the family. Regarding the question from a financial standpoint, which the law demands, and keeping in view the probabilities of the future if his life had run its natural course, it is reasonable to suppose that he was worth more to his parents than the sum of $3,500. The recovery was not limited, of course, to the earning capacity of the son during his minority, but it included the present value of the reasonable benefit which the parents would probably have received after his majority and during the period of their common expectancy of life. Bond v. United Railroads, supra. The boy's expectancy was about 45 years and the father's 25; the common expectancy being therefore the latter period. We think we have stated sufficient facts to indicate the moderation of the award in view of the probable deprivation of the father of the services, earnings, society, comfort, and protection of his son for so many years. In the Bond Case, supra, the minor was of the age of 20 years and the award was for the sum of $4,500; and in the Slaughter Case the verdict was for $10,000, the deceased being of the age of 23 years at the time of the fatal accident. In neither of these cases was the verdict held to be excessive. The facts of this case disclose even less reason for setting aside the verdict as immoderate and unconscionable.

[4, 5] Complaint is made of the action of the court as to the instructions, and particularly of the following:

> "The word 'damages' as used in the preceding instruction (section 377, Code Civ. Proc.) includes pecuniary loss of every kind, which the evidence in this case established with reasonable certainty has been suffered and will in future be suffered by this plaintiff because of the death of his son, Antonio Peluso. To arrive at the total amount of damages to be awarded you may consider not only what support plaintiff, with reasonable certainty, would have derived from the earnings and services of his son until he reaches 21, but also, with reasonable certainty, after such age, and also what pecuniary loss this plaintiff has suffered and will in future suffer, with reasonable certainty, by being deprived of the comfort, society, and protection of his said son, Antonio Peluso, not only until he reaches majority, but thereafter."

Appellant claims that there are two fatal defects in the instruction:

> First, "nothing was said to the effect that the jury should determine whether there was a reasonable probability that the conditions as to health and earning capacity of the minor son would continue 'for some time after he became of age,'" and, second, "nothing was said about the point that the damages were to include 'the present value of the benefits which it could reasonably be expected' the minor son 'would have bestowed upon his parents during' his 'expectancy of life,' though this element of the expectancy of life of the father was mentioned in the course of the proceedings."

Another contention of appellant is that the instruction failed to contain a caution against the allowance of compensation "for sorrow or distress" or for "a remote and conjectural pecuniary loss."

The defects, however, if they may be called such, constitute "sins of omission rather than of commission." The instruction did not contain a misdirection to the jury, but rather an incomplete direction. In such case, an appellant is in no position to complain, where he does not ask for a more specific and explicit instruction. Rice v. Whitmore, 74 Cal. 619, at p. 624, 16 Pac. 501, 5 Am. St. Rep. 479; Nicol v. Laumeister, 102 Cal. 658, at p. 660, 36 Pac. 925.

We think said instruction is fairly construed as meaning that in awarding damages the jury might consider the two elements, namely, the loss that might accrue to the father during the minority of the son, and also the loss that might be suffered by the former after the latter had reached his majority. In other words, an attempt was made to state the factors embraced in the question of damages as they are set forth in the decision of the Supreme Court in the Bond Case, supra.

It is to be observed that the instruction begins with the statement: "The word 'damages' as used in the preceding instruction includes," etc. It certainly does include what was thereinafter stated. The second sentence is: "To arrive at the total amount of damages to be awarded you may consider," etc. This is probably more objectionable than the first part, as possibly subject to the implication that the jury should award the future value of such services. But we must assume that the jurors were persons of intelligence, and would know that they must make allowance for the difference in value between the present and future use and enjoyment of the same sum of money. By said instruction, the jurors were not required to award the amount of the probable future benefits that would have accrued to the father from the services of the son in case the accident had not occurred, but they were instructed that in awarding damages they might consider such benefits. This it was proper for them to do, and, while the instruction is not as complete and accurate as it might be, we think it cannot be said that thereby appellant suffered any injury. In other words, a finding of the present value of said benefits as the proper verdict to award is not irreconcilable with said instructions, and under well-settled principles we must assume that the $3,500 represents the judgment of the jury as to the amount of said present value.

[6, 7] As to the expectation of life, that is a matter of which the courts take judicial notice. 20 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 886; Valente v. Sierra Railway Co., 151 Cal. 534, 91 Pac. 481. It was, though, virtually agreed by counsel that the American table of mortality should be considered as received in evidence, as shown by this colloquy:

> "Mr. Downey: * * * We wish to prove the expectancy of life of Mr. Peluso, the father, by the mortality tables. If the court takes judicial notice of that I will look it up and let the court know so that it can instruct the jury.
> "The Court: Well, I don't know that I do. I think that would probably have to be offered. I think counsel would consent that it be admitted.
> "Mr. Gett: No objection to that; but there are three or four mortality tables; which one are they going to admit?
> "Mr. Seymour: The American table.
> "Mr. Downey: They are all about the same.
> "The Court: Well, with that understanding you submit your case."

The court, no doubt, intended to call the attention of the jury to said table in reference to the expectancy of life as to one of Mr. Peluso's age, but probably overlooked it. This was excusable, since neither party requested such instruction. But, at any rate, how can it be said that appellant was prejudiced by such failure or omission? If the court had so instructed the jury, it would have been to tell them that Mr. Peluso would probably live 25 years. Is it probable that the verdict would have been reduced? It is entirely improbable that it would have affected the verdict in the least. Speaking of the probabilities, it is quite likely that the matter was fully explained, without objection, in the argument of plaintiff to the jury, and that it was carefully considered in the determination of the verdict. We cannot suppose that the able counsel would fail to elucidate the subject in the development of their view of the case, if, indeed, the jury needed any enlightenment upon that subject, concerning which information is so accessible to all. We may add that all the instructions requested by appellant were given except one which was a mere repetition of another.

[8, 9] We can see no merit in appellant's complaint because the plaintiff made the stockholders codefendants and afterwards dismissed the action as to them. Indeed, appellant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it was improperly joined with the other defendants in the action, and respondent seems to have reached the same conclusion and to have remedied the defect by said dismissal. At any rate, it is difficult to conceive how appellant has been injured by said action. The other defendants may eventually have to bear the loss, since they are stockholders, but the primary liability is against the corporation.

[10, 11] With equal zeal appellant complains because the court below refused to strike out the words "carelessly and negligently" in the complaint, wherein they appear in the sentence, "the defendant, City Taxi Company, carelessly and negligently drove an automobile," etc., and, also, "then and there so carelessly and negligently managed said automobile," etc. The action of the court was entirely proper. The significance and character of these expressions, as used in a pleading of negligence, are fully considered in Ellis v. Central California Traction Co., 174 Pac. 407. But even if we were to concede that they constitute surplusage, it would be apparent that appellant suffered no damage by the ruling of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

The driver of an automobile approaching a grade crossing from behind a station, who could see the track plainly for a quarter of a mile on arriving within 17 feet of the track on which he was struck by a train, was guilty of contributory negligence in driving on the track, although proper warnings were not given, and the headlight of the locomotive was defective.

Appeal from Superior Court, Contra Costa County; A. B. McKenzie, Judge.

Action by Lewis E. Eddlemon against the Southern Pacific Company and H. C. Bradley. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

M. R. Jones, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Theodore A. Bell and Arthur L. Shannon, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

HAVEN, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for personal injuries suffered by him, arising out of a collision between an automobile which the plaintiff was driving and a train operated by the defendants, at a grade crossing at Stege station in the city of Richmond. A verdict was rendered in the sum of $7,000, which was reduced by the judge of the trial court, upon a motion for a new trial, to $4,000. Judgment was entered against the defendants for the reduced amount, from which they prosecute this appeal.

The plaintiff was a police officer of the city of Richmond. On the night of the accident, in the discharge of his duties as such, he and another police officer of said city proceeded by automobile to the vicinity of the station of the defendant Southern Pacific Company at Stege, for the purpose of examining vacant buildings and cars for detection of undesirable persons. Plaintiff was driving the automobile, and was seated on the left side thereof. On leaving the main part of the city of Richmond, he ran along the tracks of the Southern Pacific Company north of Stege station for a distance of about a mile and a half to a point back of the railroad station at Stege, where he stopped his machine, at the south end of the station toward Oakland, in a public street. During this trip he saw an engine, headed south toward Oakland, switching cars on one of the tracks which he passed. Plaintiff and his companion alighted from the automobile, went around back of the station and inspected some empty cars and buildings, and then returned to their automobile. They stopped there and chatted from two to four minutes, and then decided to again cross the tracks to another portion of Stege and inspect other buildings. Plaintiff got into the driver's seat of the automobile; his companion cranked the car; they started the machine in low gear, and proceeded to cross the track at the grade crossing. neither plaintiff nor his companion went in front of the station building to look up the track toward the north before starting the machine. They both testified that, before starting the automobile, they listened for any train approaching from either direction, and heard no bell, whistle, or other indication of an approaching train. Plaintiff further stated that just about the time he reached the track he saw the engine right upon him. The automobile was struck by a switch engine with cars attached, proceeding southerly on the inner or "house" track, at a point slightly more than 32 feet southeasterly from the point where the automobile started, and between 17 and 18 feet distant from the front or easterly line of the station. Upon the front side of the station as a small projection or bay window, extending about 2 feet from the side of the station. From this was a slanting roof 9 or 10 feet from the ground. Plaintiff's eyes, when he was sitting in the driver's seat, were approximately 6 feet from the ground, or 3 or 4 feet below the projection of this small slanting roof. From the point of starting the view of plaintiff to the north, from which direction the train was approaching, was interrupted by the station building, so that he could see the track for a distance of only about 15 feet northerly from the point where it would have been intersected by the southerly line of the station building if extended to the track. In proceeding from the point of departure to the point of the accident, the course of the automobile was in a southeasterly direction away from the station, so that the line of vision to the north along the track was extended more rapidly than if the automobile had proceeded along the southerly line of the station or along a line exactly parallel thereto. When the automobile had proceeded a sufficient distance from its starting point toward the place of the accident so that the front wheels were in a line with the front of the station building, and the driver, who was seated 6 feet in the rear of such point, was approximately 23 or 24 feet from the point of the accident his line of vision across the southeasterly corner of the station building would have enabled him to observe the track for a distance of approximately 100 feet to the north of the point of the accident. The distance from the front wheels of the automobile before starting to the nearest rail of the track was 32 feet. The distance from the front or easterly line of the station building to the nearest track was between 17 and 18 feet, and the distance from the projecting bay window to the nearest track was approximately 15 feet. Before starting, the automobile stood approximately 15 feet westerly or behind the front line of the station building, and also the same distance to the south of that building. Plaintiff testified that he did not see the engine until he was right on the track, "practically, say a foot or two"; that when he was sitting in the automobile, prior to starting, he could see down the track in a southerly direction toward Oakland for at least a quarter of a mile; that for a space of 15 feet back from the track toward the station, and parallel to the station, there was an unobstructed view along the tracks in a northerly direction, toward Richmond, as far as he could see, at least a quarter of a mile; that when he first saw the locomotive it was within about 16 feet of him; that he immediately applied the brake, but did not stop until the front wheels of his car had crossed the first rail, and the engine had struck the front of the automobile and swung it around; that his hearing and eyesight were both normal at the time of the accident; that at the time of the accident the train was running at not to exceed 15 miles an hour, and the automobile between 8 and 10 miles an hour. Plaintiff and his companion further testified that the light on the switch engine was poor and did not shine brightly at all. In that connection plaintiff stated:

> "As I approached the track on the night of the accident I saw absolutely no reflection on the track or roadway ahead of me. After I passed the building going towards the railroad track I looked in the direction of Richmond just as quick as I passed. After seeing the engine and realizing that it was coming, I went about 4 or 5 feet before the car came to a standstill. The front wheels of the machine were about 4 feet from the rails when I first saw the engine. It was a very dark night."

The latter statement as to the darkness of the night loses its importance in view of the testimony of plaintiff that he could see along the track in both directions for a distance of a quarter of a mile. It thus appears from plaintiff's testimony that as soon as the automobile had proceeded approximately 15 feet from the point of starting, so as to enable the plaintiff to look past the station building northerly along the track, he had a space of approximately 17 feet within which to observe the approaching train and stop his machine. Instead of doing so, he did not see the engine until the automobile was within about 4 feet of the track.

Defendants moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the evidence disclosed that the accident was caused by plaintiff's contributory negligence. This motion was denied by the trial court. Appellants contend that said motion should have been granted, and that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence for the same reason. Respondent calls attention to the fact that, under the testimony, the time elapsing between the opportunity afforded plaintiff for observation of the train and the time of the accident was but a fraction of a second. He argues that reasonable men might differ as to whether or not the accident could have been avoided by the exercise on the part of plaintiff of ordinary care and prudence, and that therefore the determination of that question was properly left to the jury.

[1] The facts above set forth are remarkably similar to those involved in the case of Griffin v. San Pedro, L. A. & S. L. R. R. Co., 170 Cal. 772, 151 Pac. 282, L. R. A. 1916A, 842, even as to the distances afforded to plaintiff for observation. The only essential difference between the facts of that case and this one is that in the Griffin Case the accident happened at midday, while in the case at bar it occurred between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning. As above stated, this fact is not material, for the reason that plaintiff testified that he could see the track plainly for a quarter of a mile in either direction. The determination of each case involving contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff is dependent upon the particular set of circumstances presented by the record. This court is bound, however, to follow the law of this state as established by the Supreme Court in a similar case. In the Griffin Case above referred to, the majority of the court held that under the circumstances there presented, which cannot be distinguished in any material respect from those in the instant case, the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and reversed the judgment in favor of the plaintiff for that reason. The contrary view is forcibly presented in the dissenting opinion of the learned Chief Justice, in which Mr. Justice Sloss concurred. The numerous decisions of the Supreme Court which discuss the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence as applied to accidents at grade crossings, and which are cited by opposing parties to the case at bar, are referred to and distinguished in one or the other of the opinions in the Griffin Case. The ruling in that case is approved in Larrabee v. Western Pacific Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 749, 161 Pac. 750, 752, and the case is cited as a basis for the general rule that a person about to cross a railroad is not entitled to rely upon a performance of duty by the employés of the railroad company, "so as to relieve him from the necessity of looking if he does not hear, and of stopping if he cannot see.

[2] Applying the rule announced in the prevailing opinion in the Griffin Case to the facts of this case, we are compelled to hold that the facts contained in this record show the plaintiff to have been guilty of contributory negligence, which should have prevented his recovery.

The judgment is reversed.

HORAN et al. v. CONSOLIDATED ST. GOTHARD GOLD MINING CO.
(Civ. 1994.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 29, 1919.)

1. EQUITY 🔑39(2)—JURISDICTION—COMPLETE RELIEF.

When a court of equity acquires jurisdiction, it will proceed to do complete justice and administer full relief, even to the extent of adjudicating matters of purely legal cognizance.

2. ACCOUNT 🔑4—JURISDICTION OF COURT OF EQUITY—TRUST RELATION.

Where a contractor failed to finish work after receiving part of the contract price, and a supplemental contract was entered into by which the employer agreed to finish the work and to account to the contractor for any surplus, a trust or confidential relation was thereby created between them, and a court of equity had jurisdiction of an action for an accounting, and had the right to determine damages due the contractor by reason of the conversion by the employer of personal property turned over in connection with the work.

3. ACCOUNT 🔑17(5)—PLEADING—PROOF.

While personal property which is a part of an account between parties may have been converted by one of them, it is not necessary, in an equitable action for an accounting, to aver facts essential to the statement of a cause of action in conversion in order to recover its value.

Where plaintiff alleged that defendant had converted horses, harness, and wagon constituting an item in the transaction, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff suffered damage by reason of the converson.

Appeal from Superior Court, Nevada County; George L. Jones, Judge.

Action by Thomas Horan and others against the Consolidated St. Gothard Gold Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Searls & Searls, of Nevada City, and tum Suden & tum Suden, of San Francisco, for appellant.

J. M. Walling, of Nevada City, and E. H. Armstrong, of Grass Valley, for respondents.

HART, J. In December, 1911, plaintiffs and one Murphy contracted to build a flume in Nevada county for the defendant to furnish water to its mine, for which they were to receive $26,000. The contractors failed in their undertaking, after having drawn nearly half the contract price on account, leaving creditors to the extent of $6,213.72, with less than one-third of the flume completed. On the 18th day of November, 1912, a new agreement was entered into between the parties hereto, under which defendant agreed to complete the flume, applying so much of the unpaid balance of the contract price as was necessary for the purpose; the remainder, if any, to be applied, first, to the payment of the debts incurred by the contractors, the balance, if any, to be paid to the contractors, the defendant to use in such completion all tools, machinery, supplies, and lumber on hand provided or used by the contractors in connection with said contract. The flume was completed in September, 1913, at an expense of over $20,000, leaving nothing for the creditors or the contractors.

In June, 1914, plaintiffs brought this action, alleging a number of defaults and violations of the supplemental contract on the part of defendant, praying for an accounting; for judgment for any credits that may be found due plaintiffs on such accounting; "for such other and further relief in the premises as may seem meet and agreeable to equity"; and for costs.

The trial of the case began on June 12, 1917, before the court without a jury, and on March 25, 1918, the court made the following findings: That by virtue of said supplemental agreement of November 18, 1912, plaintiffs assigned to their creditors all rights to any money or damages that might thereafter accrue in their favor from or against defendant to the extent of $6,213.72; that plaintiffs were not entitled to recover against defendant any sum unless the amount of damage accruing in favor of plaintiffs under said contract should be found to be in excess of said sum; that no sum amounting to $6,213.72 is shown to have accrued in favor of plaintiffs; that, in accordance with the terms and conditions of said contract, "defendant received from plaintiffs two horses, harness and wagon to be used by defendant in connection with the construction and completion of said flume, which said horses and wagon were to be returned to plaintiffs after such completion; that defendant failed to return the same or any part thereof and subsequently converted the same to its own use to plaintiffs' damage in the sum of $500." It was then found that under said contract defendant received from plaintiffs a sawmill and equipments which, after defendant had completed the manufacture of lumber thereat, plaintiffs were at liberty to have taken possession of.

Judgment was entered against defendant for the sum of $500 and for costs, amounting to $263.30. The appeal is by defendant from said judgment.

It is first contended by appellant that, as the action was solely one for an accounting and there was no allegation in the complaint of conversion, there should have been rendered no judgment for conversion.

In its answer defendant denied "that it received from the plaintiff two horses, harness and wagon"; denied "that defendant has or does now retain the said horses, harness, and wagon"; denied "that the plaintiffs are damaged thereby in the sum of $500 or in any sum or at all."

[1, 2] 1. No question is here raised as to the propriety of the remedy by bill for an accounting between the parties hereto. While by the supplemental contract a sort of novation was invoked, yet under said agreement the plaintiffs were still interested in the contract and the results thereof, and a trust or confidential relation was thereby created between them.

While courts of law and equity are possessed of concurrent jurisdiction in matters of account and accounting, this is, concededly, a suit in equity for an accounting, and it is the settled rule that—

> "When a court of equity once acquires jurisdiction upon equitable grounds, it will proceed to do complete justice and administer full relief to this end, will order an accounting, and will settle the whole controversy, even to the extent of adjudicating matters of purely legal cognizance." Ency. of Law & Proc. p. 418.

See, also, Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. § 255; Smith v. 49 & 56 Quartz M. Co., 14 Cal. 242, 248; Cal. Raisin Growers' Ass'n v. Abbott et al., 160 Cal. 601, 607, 117 Pac. 767.

The obvious object of the rule as it is so stated is to prevent a multiplicity of suits in those cases where, as to the same parties or parties united in interest by a common tie (although one may sue on behalf of himself and others), there are several different actions, even though different in nature, depending upon similar facts and circumstances, and involving the same legal questions, so that the decision of one would virtually be a decision of all the others. 1 Pomeroy's Eq. Juris. §§ 254, 255. Here the allegations in the complaint charging the retention by the defendant of certain horses, harness, and wagon delivered by the plaintiffs to the corporation to be used by it in fulfilling the terms of the contract, merely involve the statement or setting forth of certain items in the account between the parties as to which an accounting is asked. While the complaint in effect charges a conversion of the property, the action is obviously not one in conversion. The allegation is, as to those items of the account, as will be observed, that the defendant received from plaintiffs said property "to be used by said defendant in connection with the construction and completion of said flume," and that defendant still retains said horses, etc., to the damage of plaintiffs, etc. This allegation in this action must be construed simply to mean that there is certain property which belongs to the account between the plaintiffs and the defendant which, among other items, should be accounted for by the defendant in the proceeding. We cannot perceive that the allegation would be any different if the subject thereof were money received by the defendant as compensation for executing and completing the terms of the contract or if it were money wrongfully paid out or retained by the defendant. The allegation as to the damage which the plaintiffs therein assert that they have sustained by reason of the retention of the property mentioned involves merely the statement of the value of the property, which is not only a proper but a necessary fact to be stated in an action for an accounting to meet the possible contingency that the party charged with having possession of the assets of which the accounting is asked has disposed of or in some way divested himself of such possession, and is therefore in no position to account for the property in kind. The horses, wagon, and harness constituted a part of the account between the parties as to which an accounting is sought, and, this being a suit in equity for an accounting, it was, as above indicated, proper herein to allow damages as an essential element of the accounting, if it was made to appear that the property itself could not be accounted for. 1 Cyc. p. 408, and cases cited in footnote.

[3] It is obviously true that, while property which is a part of the account between the parties may have been converted by one of the parties, it is not necessary in such case in an equitable action for an accounting to aver facts essential to the statement of a cause of action in conversion, and therefore the cases cited by counsel for defendant, among which are Triscony v. Orr, 49 Cal. 612, and Edwards v. Sonoma V. Bank, 59 Cal. 136, are not in point here. Those cases did not involve an accounting, but were strictly actions in trover for the conversion of certain property, and the complaints were held to be wanting in facts sufficient to state such a cause of action.

2. It is next contended that there is no evidence which supports the finding that the defendant converted the horses, harness, and wagons. This contention cannot be sustained.

Emphasis is also put upon the testimony of the defendant's witnesses that, after the completion of the contract, the possession of the horses, wagon, harness, and other equipments was available to the plaintiffs, and that all the said property would have been delivered to them if they had called for it. But the fact remains that the property was not turned over to the plaintiffs and no explanation was given why it was not, other than that above indicated, viz., that the plaintiffs did not themselves take possession of it. There is no satisfactory showing that the plaintiffs knew when the work of construction was completed and the further use of the property by the defendant became unnecessary.

Counsel for appellant also emphasize the fact that there is no testimony showing or tending to show that the harness and the wagon were sold or converted by the defendant. The company's president testified that, as far as he knew, the harness and the wagon "were still at the mine." But it is immaterial, in our opinion, whether the harness and the wagon in question were or were not sold by the defendant. It was not denied by the president of the company or any other witness connected with the defendant that they were either in the possession of the defendant or had been disposed of by it. It was therefore the duty of the defendant to account for said property in this action, and, it having failed to do so, it was within the right and power of the court to make an allowance for their reasonable value as damages. It was undoubtedly the duty of defendant, upon completion of the contract, to return the horses, the harness, and the wagon to the plaintiffs, and its failure to do so, under the circumstances of this case, amounted in legal effect to a conversion of said property, whether the cause of such failure was that defendant had sold the property or itself wrongfully retained possession of it.

We have discovered no substantial reason for disturbing the judgment, and it is therefore affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

41 Cal. App. 487

GILL v. PEPPIN et al. (Civ. 2786.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 9, 1919.)

1. Mortgages 🔑559(3)—Foreclosure—Presumption—Deficiency Judgment.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 5, 20, 28, in the absence of any showing in record of mortgage foreclosure to the contrary, it is presumed that the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property satisfied the judgment and that there was no deficiency judgment.

2. Judgment 🔑345—Setting Aside—Effect of Previous Satisfaction.

Subject to the power of a court of equity to set aside a judgment in a separate suit for fraud or mistake, or, within the period limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for the trial court to vacate the judgment on motion under that section, the satisfaction of the judgment renders it conclusive, and even within the period limited by that section the court may not vacate the judgment ex parte and without a showing of equitable considerations.

3. Mortgages 🔑496—Foreclosure—Judgment—Vacating.

A mortgage foreclosure judgment, satisfied by sale of the mortgaged property, which judgment determined in favor of defendants the amount of the mortgage debt and eliminated in their favor an onerous mortgage provision for quarterly compounding of interest and further determined that certain premises only were subject to the mortgage lien, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1908, as effectually bound the court and plaintiff as the defendants, and could not be vacated without notice to defendants, upon plaintiff's motion, even within the period limited by section 473.

4. MORTGAGES 🔑496—FORECLOSURE—VACATING DECREE.

Where order, vacating on plaintiff's motion a mortgage foreclosure decree, in terms stated that good cause therefor appeared "by the annexed affidavit," and such affidavit was made by plaintiff's attorney, and did not state why it was not made by plaintiff, nor that the attorney was familiar with the facts and he believed or had advised plaintiff that he had a meritorious cause of action or grounds for setting aside decree and the sale made under it, and the only averment concerning mistake was that after the sale "it came to the knowledge of plaintiff that by mutual mistake of all the parties * * * said mortgage did not cover and describe the property intended to be covered and described therein," etc., and there was no statement to explain why the mistake was not previously discovered, nor how intervening rights might be affected, the affidavit was insufficient to support the order.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑935(1)—PRESUMPTION.

Where the trial court's order vacating its decree foreclosing a mortgage recited that the order was based on the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney, which was insufficient, it could not be presumed that the court acted on the allegations of the proposed amended complaint.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. J. Gill against Eva E. Peppin and others. Decree for plaintiff, and from an order vacating the decree, and an order refusing to set aside the first order, Jennie F. Stone and certain other defendants appeal. Order vacating judgment reversed.

Raymond Perry, of San Francisco, for appellants.

A. A. Rogers, of San Leandro, and Walter J. Burpee and T. P. Wittschen, both of Oakland, for respondents.

BRITTAIN, J. After the sale of mortgaged property under a decree of foreclosure, the plaintiff ex parte procured an order vacating the decree, annulling the sale and permitting the filing of an amended complaint to reform the mortgage for mistake. Subsequently on notice, separate motions to set aside the ex parte order were made by new defendants brought into the suit under a summons issued on the amended complaint, and by those of the original defendants who were directly affected by the decree of foreclosure. Both motions were denied. The new parties appeal from the second order only, and the original defendants appeal from the ex parte order and from the order refusing to set it aside. Under stipulation the appeals are presented on one record and are determined together.

On behalf of the respondent, it is contended that neither appeal from the second order may be considered because the order vacating the decree was appealable. The case appears to be within recognized exceptions to the rule in that the order was made on an ex parte application and it was adverse to the new defendants who claimed under the original defendants. Pignaz v. Burnett, 119 Cal. 157, 163, 51 Pac. 48; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. California, etc., Co., 159 Cal. 484, 114 Pac. 838. It is unnecessary, however, to base the decision on the appeals from the second order, because the order vacating the decree must be reversed, upon the grounds stated in this opinion.

[1] The plaintiff and respondent, as the assignee of the original mortgagee, sued in the ordinary form to foreclose a mortgage made on April 19, 1913, to secure the payment of a debt evidenced by a note of even date with the mortgage, for $1,400, payable one year after date, with interest at 7 per cent. compounded every three months. The assignment of the note and mortgage to the plaintiff was in August, 1914, after the maturity of the note. The mortgage, which was recorded three days after its execution, accurately described by metes and bounds a lot in the city of Oakland, designated for convenience as lot 1. The plaintiff sued Eva E. Peppin, and J. B. Peppin, Jr., her husband, the original mortgagors, together with Jennie F. Stone and E. B. & A. L. Stone Company, a corporation, and certain fictitiously named defendants, who it was alleged claimed an interest in the mortgaged property, subject to the lien of the mortgage. The suit was commenced November 1, 1917, and, after service and return of the summons, on January 8, 1918, the plaintiff showed the default of the named defendants had been entered, dismissed the action as to the fictitiously named defendants, and proved his mortgage and debt, including interest, attorneys' fees, and costs, of $1,631.88. The court thereupon made a decree in accordance with the allegations and prayer of the complaint, and the mortgage, a copy of which was appended to the complaint as an exhibit, and ordered a sale of the mortgaged property by a commissioner named in the decree, which contained a provision for the docketing of a deficiency judgment. The court therefore had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the parties, and the judgment followed the complaint, the allegations of which were admitted by the defaults. The judgment was entered January 11, 1918, and was executed on February 12, 1918, by the sale of lot 1, as described in both the mortgage and the decree. No deficiency judgment was entered, or at least the record fails to disclose anything from which the contrary might be inferred. In the absence of any showing in the record upon the subject, the presumption is that the proceeds from the sale of the mortgaged property satisfied the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 5, 20, and 28.

[2] Subject to the power of a court of equity to set aside the judgment in a separate suit for fraud or mistake, or within the period limited by the section, for the trial court to vacate the judgment on motion under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the satisfaction of the judgment rendered it conclusive. "By section 1049 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the cause had then ceased to be pending in the court, and the court was without any jurisdiction to render any further judgment therein. * * * The safety and tranquillity of parties require that their interest should not be constantly suspended, and their repose liable to be disturbed at any moment by the discretion of the court. * * *" Brackett v. Banegas, 99 Cal. 623, 627, 34 Pac. 344, 345; Carpentier v. Hart, 5 Cal. 406. In Brackett v. Banegas, the facts were substantially the same as those recited above, except that the application was made after the time limited by section 473. That the reasoning of the court concerning the considerations moving the Legislature to limit the time of the application is directly applicable to considerations which should control any court upon an ex parte motion made within the time limit is apparent from the following quotation:

> "By the judgment as originally entered herein, the obligation of the mortgagor to the plaintiff had become fixed at a certain amount, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. If, however, the court could at any time thereafter vacate this judgment after it had been satisfied, without any notice to the mortgagor, and re-establish the original obligation against him, bearing interest at the rate of 18 per cent. per annum" (or, in the present case compounded quarterly), "its judgment would not have been a 'final determination of the rights of the parties,' and the parties to the action could never feel secure in any action of the court. For the reason that the law does not sanction such injustice, it has been wisely determined by the Legislature that the court shall have no power upon mere motion to vacate its judgment after the lapse of six months from its entry." Brackett v. Banegas, 99 Cal. 627, 34 Pac. 345.

[3] While the court within the six months upon mere motion may vacate the judgment, the injustice of setting aside a judgment beneficial to the judgment debtor without notice is not sanctioned by the Code. Section 473 limits the time beyond which a motion cannot be entertained, even though notice be given and a showing of equitable considerations is made. It does not dispense either with the showing required or the necessity of notice to adverse parties. The court and the plaintiff were as effectually bound by the satisfied judgment as were the defendants. It determined in favor of the defendants the amount of the mortgage debt and eliminated in their favor the onerous provision for quarterly compounding of interest. It further determined that lot 1 was subject to the lien, and therefore that no other lot was affected by either the mortgage or the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908; Hutchings v. Ebeler, 46 Cal. 557; Spaulding v. Howard, 121 Cal. 194, 53 Pac. 563. The rule of res judicata rests on the two maxims that "a man should not be twice vexed for the same cause," and that "it is for the public good that there be an end of litigation." Where the judgment is sought to be set aside, the question is not whether the judgment was right or wrong, but whether it was a valid and final judgment. Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 95, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66.

It was sought by the amended complaint to substitute for the mortgaged lot another lot, designated as lot 2, owned by the E. B. & A. L. Stone Company, and to effect this purpose the former adjudication was set aside ex parte. Where, under a provision of the Practice Act, the court made an order directing the adverse party to a judgment to appear at a time fixed to show cause why it should not be vacated, the Supreme Court, solely for the reason that it did not affirmatively appear that a copy of the order was served on him or that he had notice of the time when the motion would be heard, reversed the order vacating the judgment. Vallejo v. Green, 16 Cal. 160; Reilly v. Ruddock, 41 Cal. 312. In determining the effect of section 473, the application of the rule of Vallejo v. Green to that section is recognized. "Section 473 provides, in effect, that the relief therein specified may not be given until after notice to the adverse party, but it does not provide that no application for relief can be made to the court until after such notice has been given." Brownell v. Superior Court, 157 Cal. 709, 109 Pac. 94. The only cases, where an order vacating an ex parte application has been sustained, accentuate the rule that vested rights may not be taken without notice and an opportunity of hearing. They are cases where the court vacated former improvident ex parte orders by which such rights were disturbed. Whitney v. Superior Court, 147 Cal. 536, 82 Pac. 37; Robson v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 588, 154 Pac. 8. In such cases the second order was sustained, not as an ex parte adjudication of vested rights, but because no rights were vested by the first order made without the court having gained jurisdiction of the parties affected. "The objection that the lower court has improperly vacated its final order is one that goes to the jurisdiction of the court." Lang v. Superior Court, 71 Cal. 491, 12 Pac. 306, 416; Carpenter v. Superior Court, 75 Cal. 596, 19 Pac. 174; Holtum v. Greif, 144 Cal. 521, 78 Pac. 11. The judgment was valid on its face, and, unless it was set aside in reliance upon section 473, the court was without power to vacate it. Jacks v. Baldez, 97 Cal. 91, 31 Pac. 899. It is no answer to say that the parties may litigate their substantial rights under the mortgage after their substantial rights under the judgment have been taken from them without notice. "The validity of every judgment depends on the jurisdiction of the court before it was rendered, not upon what may occur subsequently." Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 728, 24 L. Ed. 565.

The decision might rest on the jurisdictional ground of lack of notice; but, so anxious are appellate courts to sustain the actions of trial courts, it is considered proper briefly to state other reasons why the order vacating the judgment must be reversed. While section 473 is to be liberally construed, and much is left to the discretion of the lower court in regard to the granting of relief under it, when it appears that the lower court has been led into error and substantial rights of parties have been taken from them without notice and upon an insufficient showing, the appellate court cannot evade its clear duty to cause parties to be restored to their original positions in regard to the judgment. The discretion "is not a mental discretion to be exercised ex gratia, but a legal discretion, to be exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve and not to impede or defeat the ends of substantial justice. In a plain case, this discretion has no office to perform, and its exercise is limited to doubtful cases, where an impartial mind hesitates." Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 424; Miller v. Carr, 116 Cal. 378, 48 Pac. 324, 58 Am. St. Rep. 180.

[4, 5] Whether a valid judgment is attacked in a separate suit or by motion, the considerations which should move the court are substantially the same, because the same remedy is sought, and, if given, awarded for the same reasons. Estudillo v. Security Loan, etc., Co., 149 Cal. 565, 87 Pac. 19. The order vacating the decree in terms stated that good cause therefor appeared "by the annexed affidavit." The affidavit annexed to the order was by the attorney for the plaintiff. It did not state why it was not made by the plaintiff, nor that the attorney was familiar with the facts and he believed or had advised his client that he had either a meritorious cause of action or grounds for setting aside the decree and the sale made under it. The only averment concerning mistake was that after the commissioner's sale "it came to the knowledge of the plaintiff that by mutual mistake of all the parties to this action said mortgage did not cover and describe the property intended to be covered and described therein, and by reason thereof it is necessary that said mortgage be revised and reformed so as to express the true intent of the parties hereto before the same be foreclosed."

There was no statement to explain why the mistake was not discovered before the plaintiff commenced the suit in which he proved the mortgage of the lot described in it, and sold under the decree, none to show that the judgment was not fully satisfied from the proceeds of the sale of the lot which was mortgaged, and none concerning what other property was sought to be subjected to the lien of the five year old mortgage, nor what new parties and intervening rights might be affected. Where the judgment is regular on its face, an affidavit of merits is indispensable as a basis of the motion. Nevada Bank v. Dresbach, 63 Cal. 324; Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 422; Parkside Realty Co. v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 342, 139 Pac. 805. It is argued that, despite the recital by which the court bound its action to the wholly insufficient affidavit of the attorney, it had before it the proposed amended complaint, and that it supplied the defects in the attorney's affidavit. While every reasonable inference should be drawn to support the action of the trial court, when the record shows the order was made upon specific evidence, the appellate court cannot indulge in presumptions to falsify the record. As early as 1874, the Supreme Court said that rule had been repeated so often that it had become trite. Abbey Homestead Ass'n v. Willard, 48 Cal. 619.

Even though it could be assumed the court acted on the allegations contained in the proposed amended complaint with the averments of the attorney's affidavit, the order vacating the judgment could not be sustained. In the amended complaint it was alleged, in substance, that in 1913 the original mortgagors owned adjoining lots 1 and 2; that they agreed with McDonald, the original mortgagee, that, if he would lend them $1,400 to be secured by a mortgage of lot 2, they would build on that lot a house according to plans then before the parties, to cost not less than the $1,400 to be loaned; that by a mutual mistake lot 1 was described in the mortgage instead of lot 2; that the $1,400 was loaned and the house built on lot 2 with the $1,400; that a month after the making of the mortgage the mortgagors by grant deed conveyed both lots to Jennie F. Stone and E. B. & A. L. Stone Company; that on September 1, 1917, E. B. & A. L. Stone Company by grant deed conveyed the mortgaged lot 1 to Jennie F. Stone, and on October 1, 1917, the Stone company contracted to sell the unmortgaged lot 2, with the house, to John Sloss and Margaret Sloss for $3,500, of which $175 had been paid; that Mr. and Mrs. Sloss had entered into possession of the house, and, inferentially at least, were living there when the suit to foreclose the mortgage on lot 1 was commenced, and continuously thereafter, as appears from the attorney's affidavit and the order vacating the decree, until the plaintiff upon his first visit to them, after the commissioner's sale, learned that the mortgage did not cover their home. It further appears from the amended complaint that the plaintiff bought the mortgage after the maturity of the note secured by it. It is alleged that both the Stone deeds were without consideration, and the bald statement is made, as to each of the changes of ownership of the mortgage and the property, that the parties engaged in the particular transaction knew of the original agreement that the mortgage should cover the lot it did not cover, and that at the time of each transaction the parties to it believed the mortgage described the property on which the house was built. There was no suggestion of fraudulent concealment, and no fact was stated to explain why the information so readily gained after the foreclosure sale was not discovered before the suit was commenced or within the period of nearly three months which elapsed between the commencement of the suit and the date of the decree. The mortgage, its assignment, and each of the deeds, were recorded, and the most careless observer would have been able to distinguish the difference between 187½ feet and 225 feet, the distance from the corner of the block respectively to the nearest line of the mortgaged and the unmortgaged property. No fact is stated which in any way explains why the successive owners of the lots and the mortgage dealt as they did for a period of five years with matters of public record without any of them discovering that none of them had taken the trouble to find out with what he was dealing. If the owners of the lots were negligent in this regard, the owner of the mortgage was not thereby excused from ascertaining what an ordinarily prudent man buying the mortgage might have learned at the time of the purchase, and what he ought to have learned before commencing suit. "The reasons, and the causes, and the excuses for the inadvertence, are matters which concern the court, and these are not stated. Inadvertence in the abstract is no plea upon which to set aside a default. The court must be made acquainted with the reasons for the inadvertence, and, if satisfactory, will act upon them and relieve from burdens caused by them; but, if the inadvertence is wholly inexcusable, as if it arises from gross negligence, the court will not look upon it kindly, and will have none of it." Shearman v. Jorgensen, 106 Cal. 485, 39 Pac. 864. There is no showing that the judgment debt was not fully satisfied by the sale of lot 1. If it was sold to a stranger, the affidavit should have shown how much was paid and what became of the money. If it was bought in by the plaintiff for the debt of a trifle over $1,600, did he not get all he was entitled to have? The lot with the $1,400 house is under contract of sale for $3,500. In the absence of any statement to the contrary, it would seem that the adjoining lot without the $1,400 house is worth $2,100, or at least as much as the debt. Equity will not overturn a judgment valid on its face unless it is an unjust judgment. It must appear that a like result would not follow in the new litigation. Harnish v. Bramer, 71 Cal. 155–159, 11 Pac. 888. If the plaintiff has a cause of action for relief from the judgment, that right may be established in a new suit, where the other parties to the judgment may resist the reformation of the mortgage not only, but, after the court has jurisdiction of them, they may defend against the setting aside of the judgment under which they claim vested and beneficial rights.

The order vacating the judgment is reversed.

PEMBERTON v. ARNY. (L. A. 4923.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑706(5)—COLLISION IN STREET—EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENT OPERATION OF AUTOMOBILE.

In an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by defendant's automobile, evidence held sufficient to sustain the court's finding that the defendant was negligent in giving no warning, failing to watch for pedestrians and turning onto the left-hand side of the street.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1052(7)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—CURE BY FINDING.

If a municipal ordinance requiring vehicles turning a corner to right to turn as near the curb as possible was superseded by the Motor Vehicle Act, requiring them only to keep to the right of the center of the street, error in admitting the ordinance was harmless, where the court found that defendant made the turns onto the left-hand side of the street.

3. WITNESSES 🔑281—CROSS-EXAMINATION—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

In cross-examining defendant's wife, where there was evidence that defendant in turning a corner to the right with his automobile turned onto the left side of the street, though such evidence was contradicted by defendant and other witnesses, a question, assuming that he made such turn, was not objectionable as assuming a state of facts not in evidence.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1048(5)—HARMLESS ERROR—OBJECTION TO QUESTION.

Where the court had a question, objected to as assuming defendant turned onto the left side of the street, re-read, and then stated that witness might answer whether there was anything interfering with defendant's turning, an answer that there was nothing was an answer to the court's question, and error cannot be predicated on the original question; it being unanswered.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1048(3)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—ANSWER TO IMPROPER QUESTIONS.

Error in permitting a witness to answer a question which assumed facts was not prejudicial, where other witnesses had testified without contradiction to the same effect, and appellant made no claim to the contrary.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Perle C. Pemberton against Edward Arny. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Roland G. Swaffield, Phil. M. Swaffield, and Chris Wilson, all of Long Beach, for appellant.

Ingle Carpenter and Chas. W. Fourl, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. Action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover damages for injuries sustained by his wife, Amy Pemberton, through the alleged negligence of the defendant in the operation of his automobile. The cause was tried before the court sitting without a jury. The court found for the plaintiff in the sum of $2,000, with costs amounting to $59.45, and judgment was entered accordingly. The appeal is from the judgment on the grounds of the insufficiency of the evidence and errors in law occurring at the trial.

[1] Mrs. Pemberton was struck and run over by appellant's automobile. The accident occurred on January 22, 1915, between 7 and 7:30 p. m. at the intersection of Third street and Atlantic avenue, in the city of Long Beach. Third street, which runs east and west, is crossed at right angles by Atlantic avenue, a street 60 feet wide from curb to curb. Third street, along which a double street car track runs, is paved and is 50 feet wide from curb to curb. Atlantic avenue is not paved, but the pavement of Third street extends north into this street 2 feet beyond the north line of the sidewalk if extended across Atlantic avenue. This pavement comes up flush with the sidewalk and curb on both sides of Atlantic avenue, so that there is no drop from the sidewalk to the pavement at this crossing.

On the evening of the accident Mrs. Pemberton, with her 12 year old son Lorwin, left their home with the intention of attending the revival services which were being held in the tabernacle, a temporary structure, situated on the northeast corner of Atlantic avenue and Third street. They had alighted from a street car at American avenue and Third street, three blocks west of Atlantic avenue, and were proceeding east on the sidewalk along the north side of Third street, and had reached a point on the crosswalk on Atlantic avenue when Mrs. Pemberton was struck by defendant's machine, which had come down Third street in a westerly direction and was making the turn into Atlantic avenue, going north.

As to the nature and extent of the injuries sustained there was no conflict in the evidence. It was established by the testimony of the plaintiff and Mrs. Pemberton, as well as by that of the physicians who treated her, that she had sustained bruises about the head and chest and arms; that three ribs had been broken on the left side, and that at least one of these had punctured the lung on that side. It was further established that two major operations had been necessary as the result of the accident; that one of these operations was for the purpose of removing the spleen, which had been ruptured; the removal of which the doctor who performed the operation testified was absolutely necessary in order to save the patient's life. The other operation was for the purpose of removing certain abscesses from the lung. It was also established that a rupture had developed as a result of the first operation, which could be cured only by a further operation. It was the opinion of the physicians who testified as to Mrs. Pemberton's condition that her health would never be normal again.

As to how the accident actually happened the evidence is in sharp conflict. Mrs. Pemberton testified that as she approached Atlantic avenue her son Lorwin was on her right, that is, on the side next to the street; that when they reached the west side of Atlantic avenue they stopped on the curb and looked both ways before proceeding to cross, that is to say, she looked north along Atlantic avenue and south along Atlantic avenue and east along Third street; that in doing so she saw defendant's automobile approaching as it came down Third street, going west; that it was moving moderately fast near the center of the street; that at the time she stepped from the west curb of Atlantic avenue onto the crosswalk the defendant's machine was about 50 feet east of the sidewalk line of the east side of Atlantic avenue; that from the time she stepped into Atlantic avenue she paid no further attention to the machine, because it did not appear to be in her way; that she had proceeded about 10 or 15 feet, less than halfway across the street, when she was struck in the back and side by the defendant's automobile; that she heard no horn sounded or any other warning given; that she did not know that the defendant's machine had made the turn until it struck her; and that she did not remember whether or not the lights on the machine were lighted. This statement was corroborated by her son Lorwin, who testified that he had watched the automobile out of the corner of his eye from the time that he and his mother started on the crosswalk until he thought it had passed them; that he did not see any evidence of an intention on the part of the defendant to turn up Atlantic avenue; that the first he knew that the machine had turned was when it loomed up on his right, not more than 2 feet away; that he jumped forward and yelled as the machine touched his right leg. He escaped injury.

Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Haag, witnesses called for the plaintiff, testified that they also were on their way to attend the revival services at the tabernacle at the time the accident occurred; that they were proceeding along the crosswalk on Atlantic avenue, just ahead of Mrs. Pemberton and her son; that they saw the defendant's automobile coming down Third street; that all of the lights were lighted, and that the machine appeared to be moving at about 10 or 15 miles an hour; that they both watched to see whether or not it was going to make the turn into Atlantic avenue; that at the time the machine reached the sidewalk line on the east side of Atlantic avenue, the point where an automobile would ordinarily begin to make the turn, it showed no signs of slackening speed, nor gave other evidence of turning; that they watched particularly, because when the machine had reached that point they were about 12 or 15 feet from the east curb of Atlantic avenue, and would have been directly in the machine's way if it had made the turn. Both of these witnesses testified that they did not see the automobile make the turn; that the first they knew that it had turned into Atlantic avenue was when they heard Lorwin Pemberton scream. At this they both turned and saw the machine just as it was coming to a stop. It was then headed in a northwesterly direction, and was on the west side of the center line of Atlantic avenue, on the crosswalk. Mr. Haag testified that he rushed back and was among the first to reach the injured woman. She was under the machine, and he found, when he attempted to pull her out, that she was held fast by the right rear wheel, which was resting either on her body or on her clothes; that in order to release her it was necessary to push the machine back about a foot. Both Mr. and Mrs. Haag testified that they heard no horn sounded or other alarm given.

Witness Willie E. Hale, called by the plaintiff, testified that he arrived on the scene with an ambulance shortly after the accident happened; that he drove the ambulance south down Atlantic avenue and stopped on the east side of where Mrs. Pemberton was being supported in a sitting position on the ground. His ambulance was west of the center line of Atlantic avenue. William M. Galbraith, also called on behalf of the plaintiff, testified that he reached the scene shortly after the accident occurred; that he found the plaintiff sitting on the ground a little west of the center of the street; and that the automobile was standing almost exactly in the center of the street. E. B. Hill, called on behalf of the plaintiff, testified that he, too, was on his way to the tabernacle; that he was proceeding along the crosswalk just ahead of Mr. and Mrs. Haag; that he observed the defendant's machine as it came down Third street, and that he did not see any indications of it making the turn into Atlantic avenue; that he watched the automobile until it passed the point where a vehicle would usually begin to turn, that is to say, the sidewalk line of the east side of Atlantic avenue; that he had reached the east curb when he heard Lorwin Pemberton scream; that he turned and saw that the machine had turned, and that Mrs. Pemberton had been run down on the crosswalk. He rushed to the automobile and assisted Mr. Haag in removing Mrs. Pemberton from underneath the machine. According to this witness the automobile was entirely on the east side of the center line of Atlantic avenue, but he testified that the west or left-hand side of the machine was right on the center line. None of these witnesses saw the machine make the turn. All of them, however, except the last two, as we have shown, gave the position of the machine when it was brought to a stop as being on the left-hand side of the center of the street.

It is the contention of the appellant that he made the turn from Third street into Atlantic avenue, as near the right-hand curb as was possible, and that the injury to Mrs. Pemberton was the result of her own negligence in hurrying across Atlantic avenue without looking for approaching automobiles. The appellant was driving the machine himself, sitting alone on the front seat. In the rear seat were his wife and his two daughters. In his own behalf the appellant testified that as he came down Third street he was on the right-hand side of the north car track; that he was traveling about 10 miles an hour; that he had all the lights burning on the machine; that when he reached the east line of Atlantic avenue he sounded his horn and began to make a gradual turn to the right; that he passed within 6 or 8 feet of the northeast corner, but that in order to avoid striking an automobile which was parked on Atlantic avenue at right angles to the curb from 15 to 20 feet north of the corner, he bore a little to the left; that there was a street car passing going east, just before he reached the east line of Atlantic avenue; that Atlantic avenue was very dark at the time; and that there were no lights except those on his machine and some of the machines that were parked, and a small incandescent light at the door of the tabernacle; that he did not see Mrs. Pemberton until she was within about a foot or a foot and a half of the right front fender; that just before he saw her he had been blinded for an instant by a light from some source which flashed across his wind shield; that as soon as he saw Mrs. Pemberton he cramped his front wheels hard to the left, threw out his clutch, jammed on the foot brake, and at the same time set the emergency, bringing his machine to a stop within its own length, and on the right-hand side of Atlantic avenue. Appellant's testimony was corroborated throughout by that of his wife and his two daughters.

Witnesses Mrs. Minnie Haskins, Rev. A. R. Moore, W. E. Brown, and J. C. Hoffman, called on behalf of appellant, all testified that they arrived on the scene after the accident had happened, and that they found the machine standing on the east side of the center line of Atlantic avenue, or, in other words, on the right-hand side of the street. C. H. Stevenson, also called for the appellant, testified, however, that the machine was standing at about the center of the street.

The court found that the defendant Edward Arny, "at the time and place hereinabove referred to, suddenly and without warning or signal of any kind turned his automobile to the right and to the north into Atlantic avenue, and violently struck Amy Pemberton with his said automobile, and knocked her to the pavement and ran over her and dragged her beneath same; that the defendant in turning to the right from said Third street north into Atlantic avenue caused his automobile to be turned so suddenly in front of Amy Pemberton that the said Amy Pemberton did not have time to get out of the way of defendant's automobile before the collision occurred; * * * that the defendant * * * carelessly and negligently drove and operated his automobile upon said crossing in a careless manner without due or any regard to the safety and convenience of pedestrians and the said Amy Pemberton, in that he neglected and failed to keep a sharp, diligent, and careful watch or any lookout or watch whatsoever for pedestrians, and by reason of said negligence defendant's automobile struck Amy Pemberton and threw her to the ground and injured her as herein more fully set forth; that the defendant negligently and carelessly gave no reasonable, or any warning, by horn or otherwise, to said Amy Pemberton that defendant was turning from Third street north into Atlantic avenue, and intended to cross said sidewalk or crossing, which was being used by the said Amy Pemberton, in order to allow the said Amy Pemberton to escape from in front of, and get out of the way of defendant's automobile; that by reason of the carelessness and negligence of the defendant as hereinabove alleged the said Amy Pemberton while upon said crossing referred to was struck by defendant's automobile as aforesaid, was knocked down and dragged, thrown to the pavement," and suffered the injuries as hereinbefore set out; "and that she will be an invalid for the remainder of her life and unable to perform her usual duties." "As a conclusion of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds and decides: That the defendant Edward Arny was guilty of negligence in running and colliding with and running over the said Amy Pemberton, the wife of the plaintiff herein, and that said negligence was the proximate cause of the said injuries; that the said Amy Pemberton was not guilty of any contributory negligence whatsoever."

We have thus reviewed the testimony at length in order to show that there is sufficient evidence to support the findings of the court resolving the conflict on the side of the plaintiff.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting in evidence over the appellant's objection section 8 of Ordinance 598, known as the "Traffic Ordinance" of the city of Long Beach, which section reads as follows:

"Sec. 8. The driver of any vehicle in turning to the right from one street into another shall turn the corner as near the right-hand curb as possible."

It is urged that the section was irrelevant, immaterial, and not pertinent to any issue in the case, and had been superseded by the Motor Vehicle Act of the state of California (Stats. 1913, p. 639), which provides that the driver of any vehicle in turning to the right from one street into another shall keep to the right of the center thereof. On this point the court found:

> "That at the time of said injury to the said Amy Pemberton * * * there was in full force and effect in the city of Long Beach, state of California, an ordinance No. 598 (N. S.), which provided that 'the driver of any vehicle in turning to the right from one street into another shall turn the corner as near the right-hand curb as possible;' * * * that the defendant in turning to the right and north into Atlantic avenue from said Third street in the city of Long Beach did not keep as near the right-hand curb as possible; that at the time of the accident herein complained of there was nothing to prevent the defendant in turning to the right from said Third street north into Atlantic avenue, from turning close to the curb at the northeast of said Third street and Atlantic avenue as required by the ordinance hereinabove referred to; that the defendant in turning to the right from said Third street north into Atlantic avenue in said city of Long Beach, did not keep to the right of the center of the street intersection of said Third street and Atlantic avenue; that the negligence of the defendant was the sole and proximate cause of the injuries."

In view of this finding it is not necessary to consider whether the admission of the section 8 above referred to was superseded by the Motor Vehicle Act. It is to be noted that the court not only found that at the time of the accident the defendant was violating the said city ordinance, but, also, that he was violating the Motor Vehicle Act itself, in that "he did not keep to the right of the center of the street intersection of said Third street and Atlantic avenue." For this reason, the admission of the ordinance, even if erroneous, would not be prejudicial.

[3] It is further urged by the appellant that the court erred in admitting into evidence the following testimony on cross-examination of Mrs. Kittie Arny, wife of defendant, and a witness called in his behalf:

> "Q. So, then, there was nothing, so far as you could see, on the east side of Atlantic avenue, which would at all have interfered with your turning closer to the curb than the turn which brought you at or near the center of the street?
> "Mr. Swaffield: We object to that on the ground that it assumes a state of facts not in evidence. It assumes that the turn they made would have brought them to the center. She testified there was a swing apparently to the west at the time of this accident; she has not testified that the turn brought them to the center; irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial.
> "The Court: Read the question. (Question read.)
> "The Court: She may answer if anything was there that interfered with your turning.
> "A. There was nothing there that I saw; we turned as close as we could."

The objection that the question assumed a state of facts not in evidence is without merit. As we have heretofore pointed out, there was evidence before the court tending to show that the turn which the defendant made did bring his automobile to the center of the street intersection and beyond that line. And this is not affected by the fact that there was evidence to the contrary.

[4, 5] Moreover, the question to which counsel objected as assuming facts not in evidence was not answered. After having the question read the court said: "She may answer if anything was there that interfered with your turning." The answer was directly responsive to the question of the court. In any event, the answer could not be held to be prejudicial for the reason that other witnesses had testified to the same effect, and there was no testimony to the contrary. Nor was any claim made by appellant that there was any obstruction at the northeast corner of the street.

Judgment affirmed.

41 Cal. App. 358

FISCHER v. LUKENS et al. (Civ. 2583.)

1. EVIDENCE 🔑83(6)—PRESUMPTIONS — OFFICIAL ACTION.

Where the record contains no evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed that the clerk of the Supreme Court promptly transmitted a remittitur after its issuance, that it was duly received, that the clerk of the trial court duly received it, and thereafter that he did promptly attach the certificate to the judgment roll and enter a minute of the judgment of the Supreme Court on a docket, against the original entry, under Code Civ. Proc. § 958, and section 1963, subds. 15, 20, and 24; the statute not calling for a separate filing mark on the remittitur.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1217—REMITTITUR —TRANSFER OF JURISDICTION.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court ceases when a remittitur is issued, and instantly the jurisdiction of the superior court attaches.

3. EVIDENCE 🔑383(7) — DEEDS — RECITALS.

A recitation in a copy of deed by a corporation, as recorded, that the grantor "has hereunto set its name and caused its common seal to be affixed by its president, thereunto duly authorized by resolution of its board of directors," is not evidence that the president who signed the deed did in fact affix the seal of the corporation; it being the duty of the recorder, under Pol. Code, § 4137, to note on the copy made by him the certificates and proofs appearing on the face of the instrument.

4. EVIDENCE ⚿370(5) — CORPORATE DEEDS —NECESSITY FOR SEAL.

Unless a deed of a corporation bears the corporate seal, it is inadmissible in evidence, without a showing of the authority of the officers executing the same to execute it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Xavier Fischer against E. G. Lukens and the Pacific Investments, Incorporated, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 178 Pac. 302.

Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Stanley Moore, of San Francisco, and Reed, Nusbaumer & Bingaman, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action to quiet title. The plaintiff had judgment in the trial court. Pacific Investments, Incorporated (a corporation), one of the defendants, has appealed and has brought up all the evidence in a bill of exceptions. The evidence of the parties consists of written instruments. No witnesses were called by either party. Both parties claim to deraign title from Western Fuse & Explosives Company. On December 22, 1904, the plaintiff obtained a judgment against the Western Fuse & Explosives Company, and later took out execution and caused the property involved in this action to be sold at execution sale. The plaintiff purchased at the sale, and if his purchase vested in him a legal title the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed.

[1, 2] Appellant's first objection is that the execution sale was invalid, on the ground that at the time the clerk of the trial court issued the writ the jurisdiction of the trial court had been divested by virtue of an appeal duly perfected. This point was discussed and determined adversely to the contentions of the defendant and appellant in the opinion of division 1 of this court upon the former hearing of this matter (178 Pac. 302). We agree with the conclusion reached in that opinion. As stated therein, the facts regarding the appeal in the action against the Western Fuse & Explosives Company, and pertinent to this appeal, are few, and they are all admitted. The first appeal was taken regularly and the execution was duly stayed. Later that appeal was disposed of and a remittitur was sent down. The remittitur was dated May 9, 1910. It was filed September 13, 1916, nunc pro tunc, May 11, 1910, pursuant to an order of the trial court made on that date. The record is silent as to when, if at all, the clerk of the trial court did "attach the certificate to the judgment roll, and enter a minute of the judgment of the Supreme Court on the docket against the original entry." The writ of execution was taken out August 1, 1913, and the sale was had September 8, 1913. As the record contains no evidence to the contrary, we must presume that the clerk of the Supreme Court promptly transmitted the remittitur after its issuance; that it was duly received; that the clerk of the trial court duly received it; and thereafter that he did promptly "attach the certificate to the judgment roll, and enter a minute of the judgment of the Supreme Court on the docket, against the original entry." Code Civ. Proc. § 958; section 1963, subds. 15, 20 and 24. These matters fill all the calls of the statute. It will be noted that the statute does not call for a separate filing mark on the remittitur. Code Civ. Proc. § 958. When the provisions of the last-mentioned section have been complied with, it is clear that jurisdiction revests in the trial court. Granger v. Sheriff, 140 Cal. 190, 73 Pac. 816. There is not, however, any express statement on that subject in our statutes. But there is settled authority to the effect that all jurisdiction of the appellate court is divested on the instant the remittitur goes down. Herrlich v. McDonald, 83 Cal. 505, 23 Pac. 710; Adams v. Dorhmann, 63 Cal. 417; Granger v. Sheriff, supra. But it needs no citation of authority to the effect that jurisdiction of a pending case rests in some court. In this case the jurisdicion of the Supreme Court and the jurisdiction of the superior court only are involved. It being settled by the above authorities that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court ceased when the remittitur issued, it seems clear that instantly the jurisdiction of the superior court attached. It follows that the attack on the title of the respondent is without merit.

This leaves for our consideration only the one question of whether or not the trial court erred in refusing to admit in evidence the record of a deed from the Western Fuse & Explosives Company to E. G. Lukens, through which deed appellant claimed to deraign title to the property in question. The objections urged against the admission of the record of the deed are that from said record it does not appear that a corporate seal was attached to the deed; that there was no proof by the defendant of delivery of the deed to the grantee; and, further, that the deed was void because it purported to have been executed on behalf of the corporation by E. G. Lukens, as president thereof, to himself personally; and that the consideration recited in the deed being a mere nominal consideration, and said defendant having failed to show that an adequate consideration was paid by said Lukens to said corporation, the deed was prima facie void.

The original deed having been lost, appellant offered in evidence the record of this deed in the office of the county recorder of Alameda county. Under our conclusion, it will only be necessary for us to discuss the first objection made to the deed, which obviates the consideration of the contention of appellant that the remaining objections made by plaintiff and respondent were not raised in time.

[3, 4] The defendant, in attempting to introduce the record of this deed from the corporation to Lukens, introduced no proof of the authority of the officer executing the instrument to execute the same, but relied upon the presumption raised by a seal of the corporation to furnish the prima facie proof necessary to its admission in evidence. The record of the deed contained no statement or other evidence by the recorder that a corporate seal was affixed to the original deed, but the deed itself, as recorded, recited that the grantor "has hereunto set its name and caused its common seal to be affixed by its president, thereunto duly authorized by resolution of its board of directors." We think this recital is not evidence of the existence of the fact which it recites. Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11, 17, 91 Am. Dec. 607.

Section 4137, Political Code, declares:

> "When any instrument, * * * is deposited * * * for record, the recorder must indorse upon the same the time when it was received * * * and must record the same without delay, together with the acknowledgments, proofs, certificates, written upon or annexed to the same. * * *"

It was the duty of the recorder, therefore to note on the copy made by him the certificates and proofs appearing on the face of the instrument. If there had been a seal upon the original deed, the record of which was sought to be introduced by the defendant, it would have been the duty of the recorder to have made some appropriate record of that fact. We will presume that official duty has been regularly done, and, in the absence of a seal upon the copy, we must presume that the original deed bore no seal. If the original deed had been produced without the corporate seal, it would have been inadmissible, without a showing of the authority of the officers executing the same to execute it. Barney v. Pforr, 117 Cal. 56, 48 Pac. 987; Miners' Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 545, at pages 596, 597, and 598, 99 Am. Dec. 300. Appellant is in no better position by reason of having offered the record instead of the original. The defendant made no showing whatever of due and regular execution by the officers of the corporation, and we think the deed was properly excluded.

The case of Smith v. Dall, 13 Cal. 510, relied upon by appellant, merely presented the question of whether the defendant, who claimed under a deed subsequent to the one under which plaintiff deraigned title, had notice of the first conveyance, which had been imperfectly recorded. This case was decided in 1859, before the distinction between sealed and unsealed instruments had been abolished in this state, and at that time it was necessary for a deed to be under seal. It was held in that case, however, that so far as the record of the deed was concerned, a recital in the notarial certificate that the deed contained a seal was sufficient to give the notice contemplated by the statute to a subsequent purchaser. There was no question involved in that case of the validity of the deed to pass title. In fact, it is stated by the court that the deed was actually under seal and had been duly acknowledged, and the court stated that the question was: "Does the fact that the recorder failed to make some mark upon his books to indicate that there was a seal to the conveyance vitiate the record?"

In the present case, the record was not offered to prove notice, but as an actual step in the chain of title claimed by the defendant.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Railroads 🔑385—Persons on Track—Contributory Negligence.

The contributory negligence of one injured while crossing a track along which he is walking is to be determined without reference to any negligence of the railroad.

2. Railroads 🔑400(12)—Injuries on Track—Questions for Jury—Contributory Negligence.

A pedestrian on a street occupied by an unfinished spur track, who started to cross the track without looking for cars, the gravel on each side commanding his attention, held not guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

3. Negligence 🔑136(9) — Contributory Negligence—Question for Jury.

Contributory negligence is a question of fact for the jury, and not one of law for court, when reasonable minds may draw different conclusions from the facts.

Action by Jacob Wing against the Western Pacific Railroad Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

M. H. Wascerwitz and G. C. Ringolsky, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Snook & Church, of San Francisco (Guy V. Shoup, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HAVEN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit rendered against him in an action to recover damages for personal injuries. In granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit, the learned judge of the trial court stated the reasons therefor in the following language:

> "The motion for a nonsuit has been made in this case, on the ground of contributory negligence of the plaintiff, and this motion, in the court's judgment, must be granted. There is no question in my mind that the plaintiff was grossly negligent in his actions that night. His testimony shows that he came down from the synagogue, went straight down Harrison street, leaving two streets in which he had a clear right of way; that he crossed these railroad tracks and went into a place of danger; that he saw, as he turned into Third street, this car standing on the track in front of his house, nearly 600 feet away; that he walked then 75 to 100 feet, and then crossed the spur track; and that he either did not look or he walked directly into the car that was coming, looking directly at it, and there can be no recovery in a case of that kind. The court finds, as a question of law, that there was contributory negligence, and the motion for nonsuit will be granted."

Appellant contends that the question of his contributory negligence should have been left to the jury. Between 6 and 6:30 o'clock in the evening of October 7, 1917, plaintiff, who was then 71 years of age, was walking towards his home in the city of Oakland. He proceeded upon Harrison street to its intersection with Third street, where he crossed the two main tracks of the railroad owned and operated by the defendant, and, after turning easterly towards Alice street, partially crossed a spur track, then in course of construction, when he was struck by a car operated by the defendant and seriously injured. The spur track left the main track at Alice street, curved southwesterly towards the sidewalk on the south side of Third street, and finally straightened out and ran upon the sidewalk in front of a building, the easterly end of which was 75 or 100 feet east of Harrison street. The ties and rails of the spur track had been laid during the two or three weeks prior to the time of the accident, but the track was not ballasted, the gravel for that purpose lying in piles alongside of the track. The car which struck the plaintiff was loaded with ties, and was being backed from the main track to the spur track by an engine attached to the end of the car away from plaintiff. Plaintiff resided upon the south side of Third street, between Alice and Jackson streets. He testified that it had been his custom for many years, when going to and from his home to his place of business, to proceed along Harrison street to the south side of Third street and then turn down Third street; that he had been crossing the two main line tracks since they were laid, 9 years previous to the accident; that on the evening of the accident, he turned east towards Alice street after crossing the main tracks and, because of the uncompleted condition of the spur track, walked in the space between it and the main tracks until he reached the point where the spur track left the sidewalk at the easterly end of the building above referred to, at which point he attempted to cross the spur track to the sidewalk; that, when crossing the main tracks at Third and Harrison streets, he saw a train standing on one of them between Alice and Jackson streets, about opposite his home: that he did not see the engine; that although there was sufficient light to see the train, at a distance of less than two blocks, it was too dark to tell what kind of a train it was. Plaintiff was thoroughly familiar with the location. He knew that the spur track was unfinished, and that no cars had been running upon it when he crossed it two or three days prior to the accident. A photograph of the scene of the accident was introduced in evidence and is contained in the record. From an inspection of this exhibit it is apparent that it was necessary for plaintiff to walk over the gravel which had been piled along the track for the purpose of ballasting before stepping upon the track, and that his attention would necessarily be centered upon his footsteps. Plaintiff had just reached the second rail of this unfinished track when a gondola car, loaded with ties, was backed upon the spur track and struck him. He testified that his sight and hearing were very good, but that he neither heard any noise nor saw any lights or men with lighted lanterns. The evidence also showed that there were no lighted lanterns along the track where the gravel was piled; that there was a light on the front of the engine, which was pointed away from plaintiff, but that plaintiff saw no light on the car. Plaintiff was the only witness who testified to the facts of the accident. His description of the accident was as follows:

> "I was crossing one half the new track, the other half I see nothing. I start in to cross. There was no light, and afterwards come the car, and the car gave me a push, and I fell down and broke my leg, and after I take hold the leg with my left hand it cut my hand off, because I am left-handed. I don't hear nothing, and I see nothing. Q. Did you look to see anything? A. Of course, I look around when I got to cross that track. I look around to see anything is in my way, and I don't see nothing. Q. Did you see a train? A. I didn't see no train. I see the train in the middle track, and I was over this track. Q. Where did you see the train? A. On the main track, in the middle of the street, and this I passed."

In reply to a question whether he saw a car on the main track between Alice and Harrison streets, he said:

> "I tell you I didn't take no notice to look back. I look only in front. I don't see nothing because I don't look around because I was to the track past."

Questioned as to which main track the train which he saw was on he said:

> "That I can't tell you. I take care of myself, not for the track, because I see I pass through the two tracks. I didn't take no more notice."

He testified in answer to a question regarding where he had crossed the tracks on an occasion two or three days previous to the accident:

> "I crossed anywheres. I always taken care by the main tracks; I crossed on the main tracks, and this track wasn't working, no cars going there or nothing at all. It was laying nothing but the rails."

[1, 2] If plaintiff had been injured by a train or car running on either of the main tracks of the defendant's railroad, we should have no hesitancy in agreeing with the views of the learned judge of the trial court as expressed in his order granting the motion for a nonsuit. The condition of the spur track, as disclosed by the evidence above referred to, presents a very different question. A railroad track is in itself a sign of danger. Persons crossing it are charged with the duty to look and listen, because they are presumed to know that the track exists as a means for the passage of trains which may inflict injuries. The failure to take the required precautions before crossing a track which is being used for such purposes is "the omission to do something which a reasonable man guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs would do," and is therefore negligence as a matter of law. It is manifest, however, that a reasonable man, guided by the considerations above referred to, would not feel called upon to exercise as great a degree of watchfulness for danger from passing trains in crossing a track, which he knew was in the process of construction and upon which no trains had been operated except for construction purposes, as when crossing a completed track in full operation. The gravel piled beside the track was a sign of the danger of falling into the unfilled excavation, rather than a sign of the possibility of approaching trains. If plaintiff had concentrated his attention upon the train which he had observed in the next block, and thus stumbled over the gravel pile into the ditch, it might well have been claimed that he had been guilty of negligence in so doing.

The contributory negligence of plaintiff is to be determined without reference to any negligence of the defendant. Hutson v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 701, 703, 89 Pac. 1093. While, therefore, the negligent maintenance of the spur track or negligent operation of the train which caused plaintiff's injuries cannot be relied upon as absolving plaintiff from the duty of exercising the usual precautions required of a reasonable man under the circumstances, all the facts disclosed by plaintiff's evidence are material in determining the nature of the danger to which it is claimed plaintiff negligently exposed himself. Antonian v. Southern Pacific Co., 9 Cal. App. 718, 728, 100 Pac. 877. These facts were: The existence of an uncompleted track; knowledge by plaintiff of the fact that such track was in process of construction; want of knowledge on his part of any use of such track for transportation purposes; the existence of the gravel pile, which necessarily diverted and commanded his attention; exercise of care in crossing the main tracks upon which he had been accustomed to note the passage of trains; relaxation of such care after he had passed such tracks; and injury inflicted by a construction car being backed upon the spur track, upon which plaintiff saw no lights or employé of the defendant on what became the front of the train by reason of its method of operation.

The reasonable construction of plaintiff's entire testimony is that, while he looked for danger when crossing the main tracks and saw the car standing on the main tracks about 600 feet from the crossing, he, nevertheless, considered all danger was passed when the main tracks had been crossed, and took no more notice. "I take care of myself, not for the track, because I see I pass through the two tracks. I didn't take no more notice." In other words, he neither regarded the spur track in its then condition as a sign of danger, nor took the precautions which the law would have required of him if it had been such. Did his failure to do so constitute contributory negligence as a matter of law, or was that a question of fact to be determined by the jury? In our opinion, it was the latter.

[3] Plaintiff's contributory negligence is ordinarily a question of fact for the jury, to be decided by it from the circumstances of each particular case. It is very rare that the court is enabled to say, as a matter of law, that negligence has been shown; and only when reasonable minds might not draw different conclusions from the facts presented. Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 271, 72 Pac. 1006. In the case of Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 240, 116 Pac. 513, 515, the facts of which were somewhat similar to those of the instant case, the Supreme Court said that—

> Contributory negligence "is a question of law only when the evidence is of such a character that it will support no other legitimate inference than that in the one case the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. * * * But even in such cases, while the question is said, and properly said, to be one of law, it is never a question of pure law. The real decision of the question by the court is a decision of fact. When the evidence is such that the court is impelled to say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from those facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the plaintiff contributing to his own injury, then, and only then, does the law step in and forbid plaintiff a recovery. * * * Even where the facts are undisputed, if reasonable minds might draw different conclusions upon the question of negligence, the question is one of fact for the jury."

In this case the condition of the spur track, with its contiguous gravel piles, plaintiff's knowledge thereof, and the fact that the car which struck him was being backed upon the track without lights or warning, are elements which might cause reasonable minds to differ as to plaintiff's negligence. In Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 476, it is said that the failure to look and listen becomes negligence as a matter of law only "where there are no excusing circumstances, as where * * * he is misled by appearances or conditions that would have deceived a person of ordinary prudence." The same authors, in section 471, refer to the peculiarly dangerous character of trains running backwards, and state:

> "The rationale of the rule requiring special precautions in backing trains over crossings or other places where persons are likely to be is in the increased danger to which they are subjected."

In the cases of Klotz v. Winona St. P. R. Co., 68 Minn. 341, 71 N. W. 257, and White v. Southern Pacific Co., 122 Cal. 305, 54 Pac. 956, the injuries were inflicted by trains running backwards and the question of the contributory negligence of the persons injured was held to be one for the jury. In so determining, the court in each instance referred to the running of the train backwards as a circumstance tending to rebut the charge of plaintiff's negligence. In the latter case plaintiff was injured by a freight train backing into him. He looked and listened, but neither saw nor heard the train. The court said:

> "The ringing of a bell, or the blowing of a whistle, upon a train that is traveling backward, is calculated to deceive a traveler upon the highway. The distance of the alarm from the real point of danger well serves the purpose of lulling the traveler into a false sense of security. * * * His view toward the south was obstructed, but, if a train with an engine at its head had been coming from that direction, he would have seen at least the smokestack of the engine. * * * Upon these facts the case was one eminently proper to go to the jury. As a matter of law, we cannot say this evidence discloses contributory negligence upon the part of the person injured."

In the Minnesota case above cited the concurrence of one of the justices is placed upon grounds which are peculiarly apposite to the facts disclosed by this record. It is there said:

> "I concur on the ground that it is not, as a question of law, negligence to fail to look or listen before attempting to cross such a spur track, leading to a private industry, and used only two or three times a day by a switching train which runs slowly, such track being used only for the purpose of making connections with such private industry; that it was a question of fact for the jury whether or not plaintiff's intestate was guilty of negligence in failing to look and listen before attempting to cross this spur track."

The conclusion here reached finds further support in the case of Southern Pacific Co. v. Harada, 109 Fed. 379, 381, 48 C. C. A. 423.

The judgment is reversed.

McCRAY v. WOTKYNS et ux. (Civ. 2882.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS ⟹61—NECESSITY OF CONTRACT—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, providing that any person who at the "request" of the owner of any lot grades or improves the same has a lien thereon, a person who has graded a lot without the proposal to do so having been unconditionally accepted by the owner, so that no binding contract was ever made, cannot have a lien upon such lot for the work performed.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS ⟹75(4)—NECESSITY OF CONTRACT —ACQUIESCENCE IN THE WORK PERFORMED—ESTOPPEL.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1191, providing that any person who at the request of the owner of any lot grades or otherwise improves the same has a lien thereon, one who grades such a lot without a contract therefor held, under the evidence, to have no right to a lien on the theory that the owner knew of the performance of the work and assented thereto; notice to the owner's husband not being notice to the owner.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚿150—PERFORMANCE OF LABOR—PERSONAL LIABILITY—ESTOPPEL OR RATIFICATION.

Where plaintiff graded a lot belonging to defendant and her husband without formal request or contract, and defendant had no knowledge of the work until after its completion, defendant was not personally liable to plaintiff in the absence of estoppel or ratification.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Suit by A. L. McCray against Walter B. Wotkyns and Kate B. Wotkyns, his wife. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Elliot Gibbs, of Pasadena, for appellants.
J. Ira Courtney and A. E. Hamilton, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff seeks to enforce a mechanic's lien on a lot in Los Angeles belonging to defendant Kate B. Wotkyns, for work done in grading and leveling the lot. The defendant Kate is the wife of her codefendant Walter, and the land is her separate property. From a judgment decreeing that plaintiff has a lien on the lot, directing its sale by the sheriff, and adjudging that plaintiff have a deficiency judgment against both defendants if the lot shall not sell for enough to satisfy plaintiff's claim, defendants appeal.

The appeal was taken under the alternative method. Notwithstanding that where the appeal is so taken the statute requires the parties to print in their briefs, or in a supplement appended thereto, such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court (section 953c, Code Civ. Proc.), and the typewritten transcript of the evidence in the case covers some 80 pages, there is not printed in any of the briefs, or in any supplement thereto, more than the merest modicum of the evidence. However, from a consideration of such of the evidence as is printed, we think the judgment must be reversed, for the reason that it appears therefrom that neither defendant ever made any contract with plaintiff to grade the lot, and that Kate B. Wotkyns, the owner of the lot, had no knowledge, actual or constructive, that plaintiff had done any work thereon until some time after the lot had been graded.

[1] From the meager evidence printed in appellants' brief, which is not controverted by any printed in respondent's brief, it appears that before he did any work plaintiff proposed to defendants that he would grade and level the lot for $1,000. This proposal was not accepted. Instead, as plaintiff himself testified, defendants told him, in effect, that they would allow him to do the work provided they could borrow the necessary money, and asked him to telephone them the next day, telling him that they would then let him know if they could get the money. The next day plaintiff did telephone defendants, but was informed that they were still negotiating for the loan. There is no evidence that the loan ever was effected. From this it is obvious that plaintiff's proposal was not unconditionally accepted, or squarely assented to, and that therefore there never was a binding contract between plaintiff and defendants, or either of them.

Section 1191 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that—

> "Any person who, at the request of the owner of any lot * * * grades * * * or otherwise improves the same, * * * has a lien upon said lot."

As there was no unqualified acceptance of plaintiff's proposal, it cannot be said that he graded or improved the lot at the "request" of the owner or of either of the defendants.

[2] Nor is there any evidence that at any time during the progress of the work the owner of the lot, Kate B. Wotkyns, had any knowledge, actual or constructive, that her lot was being graded, so as to entitle plaintiff to a lien, under section 1192, by reason of the owner's failure to post a notice disclaiming liability. Upon this aspect of the case, substantially the only evidence presented for our consideration in the briefs of either party is that which respondent himself has printed in his brief. From this it appears that neither defendant visited the lot while the work was being done, but that shortly before plaintiff completed the work, and while there still remained some slight amount to be done in order to finish the grading and leveling he telephoned to the husband, Walter B. Wotkyns, and asked him if there was any little thing he wanted done to finish the job the way he wanted it. While this may have given notice to the husband that work was then being done upon his wife's lot, it was not notice to the wife—the owner of the lot. There is no evidence that the husband was the wife's agent to receive such, or any, notice; and she, it seems, testified that she did not know that any work had been done upon the lot until after the grading was completed.

[3] Since neither defendant "requested" plaintiff to do the work, and the owner of the lot had no knowledge of the work until after its completion, plaintiff was not entitled to a lien. Nor is either defendant personally liable. First, because, there being no unqualified acceptance of plaintiff's offer to grade the lot for $1,000, neither defendant contracted for the work; secondly, because there is no showing that either defendant has become personally liable by reason of estoppel or ratification, or otherwise.

Judgment reversed.

MUZIO et al. v. ERICKSON et al.
(Civ. 2904.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1919.)

1. Easements 🔑42—Right to Use Building — Grant of Proprietary Interest in Land.

Where a mere right to use a part of a building is granted, no proprietary interest in the land is conveyed.

2. Easements 🔑26(4) — Destruction of Servient Tenement—Easements in Building.

An easement is an interest in real estate and survives the destruction of a part of the servient tenement when there is anything remaining upon which it may operate, but a right in the nature of "an easement in a building" is extinguished by the destruction of the building or the part thereof upon which the easement is imposed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Easement.]

3. Easements 🔑26(4), 42 — Stairways — Interest in Realty.

Where an owner of land conveyed part thereof by a deed which provided that "there should be perpetually kept open a stairway to be kept as the same now is and to be used in common by the parties thereto," the deed did not create an easement in the land, nor any right other than the right of access by the stairway, which did not survive the destruction of the stairway by fire.

4. Easements 🔑1—Manner of Creation.

Every easement, being an interest in land, can be created only by grant either express or implied from necessity; estoppel or long enjoyment amounting to prescription presupposing a grant.

5. Deeds 🔑100 — Ambiguous Instruments—Construction.

If the language of an instrument be uncertain and ambiguous, it is to be taken by its four corners and read in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution and the situation of the parties.

6. Easements 🔑42 — Creation — Construction.

If an ambiguous instrument be one which it is claimed creates an easement, its language is to be interpreted according to the apparent purpose of protection or advantage to the several estates concerned.

7. Costs 🔑32(2)—Effect of Judgment for Part of Relief Demanded.

Where the petition in a suit to quiet title to an easement did not present as separate and distinct issue, the title to the dominant estate and the title to the easement in the servient estate, an adjudication that plaintiffs were the owners of the dominant estate did not entitle them to costs as a matter of right under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, but defendants were entitled to costs under section 1024; the only material issue being as to the existence of the easement.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Action by David Muzio and others against Meta J. Erickson, executrix of the will of Charles Erickson, deceased, and others, to quiet title to an easement. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. Shipsey, of San Luis Obispo, for appellants.

F. G. Athearn and Haven & Athearn, all of San Francisco, and Albert Nelson, of San Luis Obispo, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment in favor of defendants in an action to quiet title to an alleged easement. Plaintiffs claim that the servient tenement is a parcel of land now owned by the estate of Charles Erickson, deceased, and which adjoins plaintiffs' land.

The essential facts, as shown by the findings, which are not attacked, are as follows: Nathan and Isaac Goldtree were the owners of a parcel of land in block 14 of the city of San Luis Obispo fronting on Monterey street. On August 21, 1882, the Goldtrees, by grant deed, conveyed to one Oaks the westerly part of this tract, retaining the easterly part. For convenience, the part so conveyed to Oaks will be designated as the "Oaks lot," and the part retained by the Goldtrees as the "Goldtree lot." By mesne conveyance, plaintiffs have become, and are, the owners of the Oaks lot, and Charles Erickson, since deceased, became the owner of the Goldtree lot. Defendant Meta Erickson is the executrix of the last will of Charles Erickson, deceased. The other defendants are lessees of the Goldtree lot. At the time of the conveyance to Oaks, there was a two-story frame building on the Oaks lot. This building fronted on Monterey street, and was built up to the property line between the two lots. At that time there was also a two-story frame building on the Goldtree lot. This building also fronted on Monterey street. On the Goldtree lot, and between these two buildings, was a little alley—a space about five or seven feet wide. Occupying a portion of the width of the alley, and entirely on the Goldtree lot, was a stairway, 4 or 5 feet wide, built against the wall of the Oaks building. This stairway began at a platform, a step or two high, about 5 feet back from the front of the building. It ran back some 20 or 25 feet to more steps, which extended on back towards the rear of the buildings some 12 feet farther, and arose to another platform about 8 feet high, whence steps led to the right and left, respectively, into the second story of each building.

In the deed from the Goldtrees to Oaks was the following clause:

> "Also, there shall be perpetually kept open, as a perpetual easement to the above-described land, a stairway leading from Monterey street, at the southern corner of the above-described lot, over the lands of the party of the first part; said stairway to be kept as the same now is; that is to say, the right given herein shall embrace no more land than is now used for the stairway now there; said stairway to be used in common by the parties hereto." (The italics are ours.)

All the parties hereto claim under the Goldtrees as their common source of title. Appellants' claim rests upon the contention that the above-quoted provision of the deed from the Goldtrees to Oaks vested in Oaks, and in themselves as the successors of Oaks, a perpetual easement in the soil of the Goldtree lot. Respondents contend that the right or interest created by this provision of the Oaks deed was not an easement, which is an interest in land, but was an interest in the stairway, a right to the use of the stairway, a right which, for want of a better designation, may be called an easement in the stairway on the Goldtree lot. The true construction of this clause in the deed is the crux of the case, both buildings, including the stairway, having been entirely destroyed by fire years before the action was commenced—the Oaks building in or about 1900, and the Goldtree building on February 13, 1903.

In 1909, which was some years after fire had destroyed both of the former buildings, defendant Northrup and one Gallagher, tenants of Erickson, erected on the Goldtree lot a double, one-story, corrugated iron building, fronting on Monterey street. Though this building was not built right up to the dividing line between the two lots, it was, at its front end, but 14 inches from the division line, and, as it extended back from Monterey street, it receded farther from the line between the two lots, so that, at a distance of about 100 feet back from its front, this new building on the Goldtree lot was about 5 feet 4 inches easterly of the line between the two lots. In 1912 appellants, having in that year acquired the Oaks lot, built thereon a two-story brick building that covered their entire lot from its front to a depth of about 100 feet. While they were constructing this building, appellants demanded of respondents that they be permitted to erect on the Goldtree lot, in the space formerly occupied by the alley between the two lots, a new stairway, reaching from Monterey street to the second story of their new brick building. Upon respondents' refusal to comply with their request, appellants brought this action.

[1, 2] It is the established doctrine that where a mere right to use a part of a building is granted, no proprietary interest in the land is conveyed. Upon this principle it has been held that a grant of the right to use the stairway of a building gives no interest in the soil which will survive the destruction of the building, and the right ceases whenever the building is destroyed without the fault of the owner of the servient tenement, and the owner of the right to use the stairway will not acquire any right in any new building which may be erected in the place of the one destroyed. An easement, in the true sense of the word, is an interest in real estate, and survives the destruction of a part of the servient tenement when there is anything remaining upon which the easement may operate. But a right in the nature of "an easement in a building," as it is sometimes called, is extinguished by the destruction of the building, or the part thereof upon which the easement is imposed, so that there is nothing upon which it can operate. Cohen v. Kutner Co., 177 Cal. 592, 171 Pac. 424, L. R. A. 1918D, p. 410; Brechet v. Johnson Hardware Co., 139 Minn. 436, 166 N. W. 1070, L. R. A. 1918D, p. 691; Shirley v. Crabb, 138 Ind. 200, 37 N. E. 130, 46 Am. St. Rep. 376; 14 Cyc. 1194.

Appellants insist that by the language of the deed from the Goldtrees to Oaks an easement in the soil was created, and not merely a right to use the stairway, and that, therefore, the easement was not lost by the destruction of the buildings and stairway. We think, however, that Oaks was given no easement in the land of the Goldtree lot—the land now occupied by respondents—nor any right other than the right of access to the second floor of the building on the Oaks lot by the use of the stairway—a right that would naturally terminate by the destruction of the buildings and stairway.

[3, 4] In the above-quoted excerpt from the deed to Oaks, we have italicized the words upon which appellants mainly rely to sustain their claim that there was thereby created an easement in the soil of the Goldtree lot. Without these italicized words—words which appellants claim indicate an intention to create an easement in the soil—the deed to Oaks unquestionably would be insufficient to create an easement in the land.

The language of the deed with the italicized words omitted is:

> "There shall be perpetually kept open * * * a stairway leading from Monterey street, at the southern corner of the above-described lot, over the lands of the party of the first part; said stairway to be kept as the same now is; * * * said stairway to be used in common by the parties hereto."

This language is wholly insufficient to create an easement in the soil of the Goldtree lot. It is not the language of a grant. Every easement being an interest in land, can be created only by grant, either express or implied from necessity, estoppel, or long enjoyment amounting to prescription presupposing a grant. McDaniel v. Cummings, 83 Cal. 515, 518, 23 Pac. 795, 8 L. R. A. 575; Pinheiro v. Bettencourt, 17 Cal. App. 111, 119, 118 Pac. 941; 14 Cyc. 1159; 9 R. C. L. 745. The language of the deed, without the italicized words, is no more than a covenant to keep open a stairway for convenient access to the second story of the building on the Oaks lot. The italicized words—the words upon which appellants principally rely—while they may render some aid to the construction for which appellants contend, serve only to make the intention of the parties uncertain. For they are not such explicit words of grant as to indicate an unmistakable intention to grant an interest in land.

[5] The rule is that if the language of an instrument be uncertain and ambiguous, it is to be taken by its four corners and read in the light of the circumstances surrounding its execution and the situation of the parties.

[6] If the instrument be one which, it is claimed, creates an easement, the language is to be interpreted according to the apparent purpose of protection or advantage to the several estates concerned. If we consider the situation of the parties, their surroundings, and their apparent purpose to afford any tenant of the second story of the building on the Oaks lot the advantage of the use of the stairway upon the Goldtree lot, we think it clear that the parties did not intend to convey any interest beyond that which was necessary to the use and maintenance of the stairway during the existence of the two buildings. No provision in the deed obligated the grantors, the Goldtrees, or their successors to build a new stairway in case of the loss of the old one. The deed does provide that there "shall be *perpetually kept open * *  a stairway"; but it is hardly permissible to construe this language as an agreement to rebuild in case of the destruction of the stairway. Brechet v. Johnson Hardware Co., supra. The words "easement" and "perpetually " do not add any particular strength to appellants' position. The words "easement" and "license" are used indiscriminately even by the courts; and in interpreting documents of this kind courts look to the intent of the parties, as gathered from the circumstances confronting them, rather than to the mere choice of words. Cohen v. Kutner Co., supra. The word "perpetually," like the word "forever," does not assist appellants' contention. Cohen v. Kutner Co., supra. By whatever name we call the right granted by the instrument in question, it is clear that it did not grant Oaks or his successors an easement in the land, but that the intent of the parties was that the easement over the stairway, or the right thereto, by whatever name we call it, should be enjoyed only while the buildings and the stairway existed in their then form.

[7] The judgment provides that plaintiffs recover no costs, and that defendants have judgment for their costs, taxed at $40. The point is made by appellants that, inasmuch as they were adjudged to be the owners in fee of the Oaks lot, they were entitled to costs as a matter of right, under the authority of Sierra Union, etc., Co. v. Wolff, 144 Cal. 430, 77 Pac. 1038, and Gibson v. Hammang, 145 Cal. 454, 78 Pac. 953, wherein it is held that, under section 1022 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a plaintiff is entitled to his costs in an action to quiet title if he have judgment in his favor for only a part of the property, and the answer has put in issue the title to the whole property. We do not think that these cases are applicable. Appellants' complaint, which was not verified, did not present, as separate and distinct issues, the title to the Oaks lot and the title to the alleged easement in the Goldtree lot. The allegations of the complaint are:

> "Plaintiffs * * * acquired from said Oaks the said Oaks lot with its appurtenances. including the aforesaid easement;" also that "Charles Erickson acquired from said Goldtrees the said Goldtree lot, but subject to said easement;" also that "defendants, and each of them, claim some right, title or interest in or to said Oaks lot with its appurtenances, including said easement over said Goldtree lot, * * * but said claim * * * is without right."

The cases relied upon by appellants would have been applicable if respondents, in their answer had denied that appellants had title to any part of the estate of which they alleged themselves to be owners. Instead, respondents' answer was a general denial, coupled with the affirmative defense that plaintiffs are estopped for the reason that they made no objection to the construction of the new building "upon the land over which plaintiffs now claim to have an easement," i. e., the Goldtree lot. The complaint being unverified, defendants were entitled to make a general denial. The denial, though general, was no more than a denial that plaintiffs are the owners of the Oaks lot with the easement, and a denial that defendants claim any interest in or to the Oaks lot with the easement. Each of these denials accords with the actual facts of the case.

Construing the answer as a whole, we think that the only material issue was as to the existence of the alleged easement, and as to this the judgment was in favor of respondents, who, therefore, under section 1024 of the Code of Civil Procedure, were entitled to their costs. A like conclusion was reached in Weller v. Brown, 25 Cal. App. 216, 221, 222, 143 Pac. 251, under a somewhat similar situation.

Judgment affirmed.

VERDIER v. TITLE GUARANTY & SURETY CO. (Civ. 2912.)

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY ⚷155—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

An owner's complaint against a building contractor's surety held fatally defective for failure to allege that plaintiff owner had performed her part of the contract with the building contractor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Mrs. M. Verdier against the Title Guaranty & Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

W. W. Kaye, of Bakersfield, for appellant.
E. L. Foster and Chas A. Barnhart, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff against defendant surety company upon an indemnity bond given by the latter to the former to secure the performance by the Aiken Reinforced Concrete Company of a contract for the construction of a three-story brick building. The bond was for $6,746.50. The case was tried by the court without a jury. Judgment went for plaintiff in the sum of $3,200.

The amended complaint is in two counts, in the first of which appears what purports to be a copy of the indemnifying bond and a copy of the contract between the plaintiff and said Aiken Reinforced Concrete Company, set out in extenso, and the second realleging these same alleged facts which were set forth and referred to in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the first cause of action. Without quoting said instruments or any portion of the complaint, suffice it to say that the plaintiff prays for judgment against defendant for the sum of $6,700, and for her costs.

There was a demurrer to the complaint as amended. This demurrer was both general and special.

Appellant specifies 14 errors at law occurring during the trial, and 15 specifications of insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the court. In view of the fact that we are of the opinion that the first specification of error—the court's overruling the said demurrer—referred to in the transcript and appellant's opening brief is well taken, we do not consider that for the present any other point urged needs to be discussed.

Nowhere in the amended complaint is it alleged, nor does the record contain any evidence, that the plaintiff herein performed any, much less all, of the covenants or conditions required to be performed by her under her contract with the contractor, the Aiken Reinforced Concrete Company. Notwithstanding this fact, the court, in finding 7, found:

> "That the plaintiff performed all the conditions and terms and agreements on her part to be performed with the Aiken Reinforced Concrete Company under said contract, provided to be by her kept and performed."

The point is not urged by appellant, but we fail to find any evidence in the record to justify the finding, even had the pleadings been such as to permit the reception of the same. We think that this failure to so allege is fatal to the present appeal.

The contract by its terms required the plaintiff to pay to said contractor the full sum of $27,000 in six installments, as follows: The sum of $4,050 "when the foundations is in ready for the first floor joists"; the second installment of $4,050 "when the walls are up one story, and the second-story joists are in place"; the third installment of $4,050 "when the roof is on"; the fourth installment of $4,050 "when the plastering is completed"; the fifth installment of $4,038.50 "when the building is completed and accepted"; and the sixth, and final, payment of $6,761.50 "thirty-five days after the acceptance of the building." Nowhere in the amended complaint is there an allegation that plaintiff has paid any of these installments to the said contractor as provided for in said contract, or otherwise or at all; and for aught that appears in the said amended complaint, the failure on the part of plaintiff to comply with any or all of said provisions may have been the reason for the failure and neglect of the contractor to complete the contract or agreement referred to, if, indeed, any such failure or neglect occurred. The demurer should have been sustained.

⚷For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

We consider the citation of authorities unnecessary to support our conclusion.

The judgment is reversed, and the lower court ordered to reverse its ruling overruling, and to sustain defendant's demurrer to the amended complaint herein, granting plaintiff leave to amend.

The rule that street cars, which run upon rigid rails, have the better right to the space the rails occupy, to which pedestrians must give way, has no application where the doctrine of last clear chance is invoked.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Frederic G. Badger and others, by their guardian, etc., against the City and County of San Francisco and Michael J. Ryan. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George Lull, City Atty., and R. T. Ainsworth and Chas. S. Peery, Asst. City Attys., all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Franklin T. Poore, of San Francisco, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiffs' favor in an action for damages for the death of George H. Badger, the husband of plaintiff Anna B. Badger, through the alleged negligence of the corporation defendant's employés in the operation of its municipal railway, and is taken by said corporation.

The appellant contends that its motion for nonsuit should have been granted; and, this having been denied, that the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court should have been in its favor by reason of the absence of any evidence showing negligence on the part of its employés, and also by reason of the contributory negligence of the decedent.

On the threshold of an examination into the merit of these contentions the language of Mr. Justice Shaw in the case of Scott v. San Bernardino Valley, etc., Co., 152 Cal. 606, 93 Pac. 677, may be aptly referred to as indicating the scope of inquiry of this court upon appeal in like cases:

> "A street car operated by defendant collided with a buggy in which the plaintiffs were driving, whereby the plaintiff, Jennie R. Scott, was thrown out and injured. It is contended that the plaintiff, George H. Scott, was negligent in driving upon and across the track in front of the car, and that this negligence contributed to the injury.
> "In considering this proposition, it is necessary always to bear in mind that the jury has found to the contrary. In this case it not only returned a general verdict to that effect, but, in answer to a specific question, it declared that George H. Scott did not negligently drive upon the track. If there was any substantial evidence in support of this fact the verdict must stand, although the preponderance of the evidence may be against it. The question whether or not upon a given occasion the conduct of a person is negligent is always comparative and relative. The conduct must be compared to that of an assumed person of ordinary prudence, and must be considered with relation to all the circumstances attending the occasion which might reasonably be taken into consideration by a person of ordinary prudence in determining what his conduct should be. The circumstances to be considered are those which the evidence shows may reasonably be supposed to have been known to such person and to have influenced his mind and actions at the time. These are not, necessarily, the circumstances which afterwards, in the light of the event, it can be seen should have been known to him and should have influenced his conduct. Nor is his wisdom in determining what to do to be judged by the event. We must, as nearly as possible, put ourselves in his place, he being compelled to act without foreknowledge and with only ordinary prudence and wisdom to guide him. In some particular cases of frequent occurrence it has been established by a long course of judicial decision that certain precautions are presumptively necessary to constitute due care, and that, if one of these precautions is omitted, negligence will be presumed as matter of law. For example, one who, in traveling a public road, crosses the track of an ordinary steam railroad, must before going upon the track look and listen for an approaching train, and must generally stop for that purpose. If it does not appear that he did these things he will be considered guilty of negligence unless he shows some extraordinary and unusual conditions which render it unnecessary. But, in general, negligence is a question of fact for the jury, and the law has fixed no exact standard of care other than the general one that it must be such as a reasonably prudent man would exercise in the particular circumstances. Hence in ordinary cases it is peculiarly a question for the jury or court trying the cause to decide as a matter of fact whether or not the person was culpably negligent. Judged by these rules, we think the verdict in this case is supported by sufficient evidence."

With the foregoing instructive views as our guide we will address ourselves to the evidence in the case.

On the morning of the 15th day of October, 1915, George H. Badger, a man of 59 years of age residing with his family on Johnson avenue, near its junction with Geary street, in the city of San Francisco, left his said home about half past 6 o'clock on his way to his work, which was that of a porter for a downtown furniture store. He came along the west side of Johnson avenue to its junction with Geary street, and there left the curb with the intention apparently of crossing Geary street to Commonwealth avenue, which has its junction with the north side of Geary street nearly opposite Johnson avenue. Mr. Badger was rather hard of hearing, and also did not see well at a distance, although he wore glasses and could see fairly well near at hand. As he stepped from the curb and proceeded to cross Geary street he was seen by the motorman operating the car by which he was later struck as said car was proceeding westward on Geary street, and while it was somewhat more than 150 feet away from the place where the deceased was when he was thus seen. The motorman states that the deceased while thus walking slowly across Geary street was facing partially toward the direction from which his car was coming and was looking straight ahead. The decedent walked to or upon the southerly rails of the defendant's double track and there hesitated or stopped, according to the testimony of the witness, Martin Lambert. In the meantime the car had proceeded westward upon the northerly track to a point 15 or 20 feet from the place where the decedent was, slowing down as it approached the junction of these streets and sounding the gong occasionally. As the car reached this point it had slowed down almost to a standstill. At this moment the decedent, who had stopped or was hesitating at or upon the defendant's southerly line of tracks, started to cross over when the car also started to go ahead. The motorman, seeing that the decedent had started to cross ahead of his car, rang the bell vigorously and then undertook to stop the car, but was unable to do so, and the decedent was struck and thrown upon the fender of the car, receiving injuries from which he died shortly thereafter. The testimony of the witness, Martin Lambert, who was a passenger upon the car and who was standing near the motorman and in full view of the scene, was as follows:

> "A man stepped off of Johnson avenue walking slow * * * walking very slow, and stopped on the other side, on this side of the railroad tracks, kind of hesitating whether he would go or not; it looked that way. He slowed down the car, and as he started the man started to walk, and the fender went down and the man was on the fender."

And again he says:

> "He almost had the car to a standstill when he started it off again, this man started from the other side of the railroad track. We were on the right-hand track going to the beach, and this man come to a dead standstill on the other side of the track, because he crossed the other side of the track as this man started the car and he fell on the fender."

And again, speaking of the car, he testifies:

> "We had checked the car almost to a standstill and started off again, and as we started off again the accident happened."

It is true that this witness, in a written but unsworn statement given to the defendant's employés a day or two after the accident, gave it as his conclusion that the motorman was not at fault, and that the decedent was entirely to blame, but with this conclusion the jury apparently did not agree. Nor, it may be said, did the trial court, since it denied the defendant's motion for a new trial. The testimony of the motorman does not very materially disagree with that of the witness Lambert, and these two were practically the only living eyewitnesses to the casualty.

[1, 2] Upon this state of the evidence we are asked to conclude upon appeal that the defendant, through its employés, was not negligent, and that the decedent was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law. We are unable to arrive at either of these conclusions, since, in our opinion, to reach either or both of them would be to invade the province of the jury which sat upon the case, saw and heard the witnesses, and had submitted to its discretion and judgment the close question whether the decedent, seeing the defendant's car slow down to practically a standstill at or near a street crossing, was justified in concluding that it had done so in order to permit pedestrians to pass over, and hence was not negligent in attempting so to do; while, on the other hand, the motorman, having thus brought his car to practically a standstill within a few feet of a pedestrian apparently about to cross over, should have stayed its progress until the pedestrian had a fair opportunity to pass, and whether he was or was not negligent in going ahead under such circumstances at a rate of speed which made it impossible to stop his car when he discovered the pedestrian had put himself in a place of danger. The jury resolved these matters against the appellant, and with their conclusion in the premises we cannot feel that it is our province to interfere.

[3, 4] In reaching this conclusion we are not unaware of the rules laid down in Bailey v. Market Street, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 320, 42 Pac. 914, and the cases which follow its decision relative to the rights and duties of railways and pedestrians in respect to the use of the public streets. We agree with the general doctrine announced in those cases, that ordinarily street cars which run upon rigid rails have the better right to the space the rails occupy to which pedestrians must give way; but we do not find that either the law or the facts of these cases fit the case at bar, where the question is one of fact as between the pedestrian and the motorman, which of these two was negligent in advancing at the particular moment just before the collision took place. Of this we think the jury was the sole judge, and with its conclusion we will not interfere. In respect also to the doctrine of "last clear chance" we see no room for its application to the instant case under the facts as above set forth.

Judgment affirmed.

PENCE v. DENNIE. (Civ. 2895.)

1. DAMAGES ⚿123—BUILDING CONTRACT—BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where a building contractor violated the contract in furnishing defective stone work and in replacing it with brick without the written consent of the owner, the measure of damages was the cost of replacing the work with the material called for by the contract.

2. ESTOPPEL ⚿90(2)—BUILDING CONTRACT—CHANGE WITHOUT OWNER'S CONSENT.

Where a building contract provided that no change should be made without the owner's consent in writing, the owner was not estopped from relying on such contract, where he did not know of changes until the work was completed, notwithstanding that he then made no particular protest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by James H. Pence against Fred L. Dennie, with counterclaim by defendant. Judgment for defendant for costs, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Joslin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Percy Hight, of Long Beach, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff, a contractor and builder, brought this action to recover from the defendant an alleged balance of $1,066.84 on a building contract totaling $46,750, together with $1,282.16 for extras alleged to have been furnished at the request of defendant, and $400 claimed as a bonus under the contract, making a total for which judgment was demanded of $2,759.

The defendant, by answer and counterclaim, admitted the original contract price of $46,750, but alleges payment of all but $90.35, denies liability for $400 bonus, or any part thereof, and claims damages against plaintiff of $450 for delay in completing contract, $1,523 for items of material and labor not furnished as called for by the contract, and $1,685.15 for defective work and materials, and asks judgment on his counterclaim for $3,427.69.

On the trial of the case the court found that the original contract price due the plaintiff was $46,750 and that he was entitled to extras in the sum of $205, and no more, and disallowed his claim of $400 as a bonus. The court further found that the defendant has paid on the contract $45,969.36, thus leaving a credit due the plaintiff of $985.64. As against this credit to the plaintiff the court found for defendant on his answer and counterclaim, $450 damages for delay in completing the contract, $25 insurance due from plaintiff, $1,349.70 for labor and material omitted in the contract work, and $1,553.68 damages for defective work and materials; but in its conclusions of law the court omits the item of $450, thus leaving a balance due defendant of $1,942.74, after offsetting plaintiff's claim. The judgment, however, was that neither plaintiff nor defendant recover on the respective claims, but that defendant have judgment for costs in the sum of $39.40.

The result of the trial was that the court found, after crediting defendant's payments and allowing the $205 extras, a balance due plaintiff amounting to about $1,000, and found that the defendant was entitled to approximately $3,000 by way of offset. It is apparent, therefore, that there must on this appeal be found an enlargement of plaintiff's credits or reduction of defendant's offsets, or both, aggregating the sum of $2,000, before it will appear that the plaintiff is prejudiced by this judgment.

The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment in favor of defendant and from an order of the court denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. As the proceedings have been taken since the amendment abolishing appeal on denial of motion for new trial, the matter comes up on the appeal from judgment alone, and is presented under the alternative method on the typewritten transcript of the record in the trial court.

The only matter to be considered is the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings of the court as to the various items of claim and counterclaim. It has been no slight task to sift out the testimony, which is more voluminous than illuminating in many of the details, in order to ascertain if in each particular there is some substantial weight of evidence supporting the conclusions reached by the court as to the facts.

The basis of the action purports to be a written contract for the construction of the building in question, with plans and specifications referred to as being annexed to the contract and filed therewith in the office of the county recorder. No plans and specifications were so attached or filed in the recorder's office, but plans and specifications were produced and admitted in evidence which it was shown were accepted and acted on by the parties to the contract throughout the construction of the building. The contract itself is a matter of some uncertainty and much dispute between the parties as to some of its items. But we are satisfied that the court was justified in its findings as to the contract as actually agreed upon and executed.

The original agreement was that the building was to be constructed in accordance with plans and specifications to be prepared, for a total sum of $46,750. Work was begun, and certain excavation work and foundation completed, at a valuation of $2,000. This was either before the contract was executed, or there was a second contract made of date July 17, 1913, after the foundation work was completed. This contract recites an agreed price of $44,750, and makes no provision for the foundation work, which had already been done and paid for; the aggregate making up the $46,750. It also fixes the time in which the work was to be completed as 92 working days, as against 120 and 105 days shown by other copies of contracts relied upon by plaintiff. There is no substantial dispute as to what the terms of the contract actually were, however, excepting as to the time in which the work was to be completed, and as to which party should pay the insurance during the construction work. In these particulars the plaintiff claims the contract was changed after its execution, in the copy produced by defendant, reducing materially the period in which the building was to be finished, and obligating the contractor to pay the insurance (which amounted to only $25). The defendant testified that these alterations were agreed to and made before the contract in question was executed, and the court accepted in evidence, as the true contract, the one claimed to be correct by the defendant. As the circumstances tend to corroborate the defendant's explanation of the changes, the court was justified in its ruling.

It is this difference in the period of completion of the work that determines the question as to whether plaintiff was entitled to a bonus for completing the work ahead of time or was liable in damages for the failure to complete the work as stipulated, and it was, we think, justifiably determined in favor of defendant, thereby eliminating plaintiff's $400 claim for a bonus.

The next item of plaintiff's claim also arises on a construction of the provisions of the contract and specifications, and the law applicable thereto. The court found that the plaintiff had actually furnished in the construction of the building, as alleged in his complaint, extras of the value of $1,282.16, but that the same were unauthorized under the terms of the contract. The specifications adopted as part of the contract contain the following provisions:

> "No extras shall be allowed without written order from the architect. * * * Should any changes, additions, or omissions in the work provided for in this contract be ordered, the contractor shall not be authorized to comply with such order without previously obtaining written authority therefor from the owner, and the contract shall not be deemed altered thereby, either as to time when the work shall be completed, contract price, or work to be done, excepting as expressly stated in such authority."

There is no pretense that either the architect or the owner ordered or authorized any of these extras in writing, or authorized them expressly in any way, excepting as to the item of $205, which the defendant admitted to having orally ordered, and which he consented to allow on plaintiff's claim, and which has been allowed by the court. It is claimed, however, that a superintendent representing the defendant on the work had knowledge of most or all of these extras, and consented orally and by acquiescence to their incorporation in the building; but it is not shown that this superintendent had any authority in the premises, other than to see that the contract was carried out. Plaintiff's main contention, however, is that the defendant was aware of most of the extra work and material being furnished, and permitted it to be put into the building without objection, and that he is estopped by his conduct from taking advantage of the requirements of the contract for authorization in writing.

The defendant denies knowledge that the extras were being furnished, as to some of the items, denies that he knew they were extras in some instances, and in regard to some of the items we are inclined to the conclusion that he was aware at the time that the plaintiff was putting in extra work and material, and made no objection thereto; but conceding, as to the last-mentioned work and material, that defendant's counsel is correct in his application of the law of waiver and estoppel, it would only apply to a small proportion of the amount claimed.

With reference to the larger items of $365 for glass mirrors in the wall beds, $103 for mirrors in the dressing rooms, and $77 for extra plastering, there is nothing to show that plaintiff's attention was called to the fact, or that he was aware that these did not go in under the contract. The beds and dressers of which the mirrors formed a part were called for by the contract without specification as to their finish, and it does not follow, as a matter of law, that if the contractor furnished them with mirrors the owner was bound to know that he was not doing it as part of his contract. With regard to other charges for extras, the plaintiff either denies that they were extras or that he knew anything about them.

If there were no provision in the contract requiring an express order in writing, it would still be an open question, under the testimony, as to whether much of this extra charge could be maintained, under the conflicting evidence. But it should be borne in mind, under the conditions of this contract, that the very purpose of such provisions for written authority to make changes is to avoid just such controversies as have arisen here; and in the absence of very clear and convincing evidence of waiver or estoppel, the terms of the contract should control.

The principal item of damages allowed defendant on his counterclaim is the sum of $1,000 for the substitution of brick construction on the front of the building, where the contract called for artificial stone. When the stone work was put in, or partly so, it was found defective. The defendant was absent in the East, and the contractor, after consulting with defendant's architect and superintendent, and in order to save the delay incident to obtaining new stone material, and perhaps in uncertainty of its then coming up to the requirements, substituted brick; the details therefor having been supplied by the architect. There was no written consent by the owner to this change, and no consent or authorization by him of any kind. When he returned home the change had been made. He does not seem at the time of his return to have made any special objection to the substitution. The contractor saved nothing, apparently, by the change from stone to brick. The original estimate for this part of the work was $422. There is testimony in the record that to now make the change and complete the job as called for by the contract would cost $1,000 or more.

[1, 2] There was a violation of the contract in furnishing defective stone work and in replacing it with brick without the written consent, or the consent at all, of the owner. The owner was entitled to have this stone front, and we are not prepared to say that the court was not, under the evidence, justified in allowing him damages. The measure of damages was the cost of replacing the work with the material called for by the contract; but in view of the fact that the value of the completed building was probably not greatly reduced by the substitution of brick for the artificial stone, it seems that this measure of damages, though a lawful one, places a harsh penalty on the contractor, especially in view of the fact that the owner's architect and superintendent both acquiesced in the change. However, neither of them are shown to have had authority to authorize such change in the general character of the structure, and, in any event, the authority was not obtained from the owner nor evidenced as specified in the contract. We do not think defendant is estopped from relying upon the terms of his contract that no changes should be made without his consent in writing. Had he known of the change when it was in process, and stood by without objection, the doctrine contended for by appellant might apply. But he did not know of it until it was done, and the fact that he then made no particular protest was in no way prejudicial to the appellant.

It is not necessary to review the findings of the court as to each of the specified items of damage for uncompleted work or for defective work and materials. There was conflict in the testimony as to practically every item. While we are not satisfied that every allowance made to defendant by the court is supported by the evidence, we are satisfied that there was evidence to support a sufficient offset to more than balance the amount to which the plaintiff was entitled.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Sarah A. Roberts against A. G. Allen, as administrator of the Estate of James A. Roberts, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William A. Spill, of Pasadena, for appellant.

Hugh E. Macbeth, of Los Angeles, and C. J. Willett and A. G. Allen, both of Pasadena, for respondent.

THOMAS, J. This is an action to declare a trust and quiet title. Plaintiff claims that by her own labors, before she married defendant's intestate, she had saved and accumulated money which she invested in Arkansas real estate, all of which, under the laws of that state, was her sole and separate property; that after her marriage and both before and after her coming to this state, she had rented said property, the rentals, after coming to this state, being sent to her husband, defendant's intestate, who, because of the illiteracy of plaintiff—she being unable to read or write—conducted all of her business; and that these rents were accordingly collected, "cashed and banked" by him. According to the allegations of the complaint, these moneys were "banked in his own name, but all for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, who at all times was the real the true owner of said rentals." It is then alleged "that about two years after plaintiff and defendant's intestate came to California to live, as aforesaid, to wit, in the year 1903, defendant's intestate used part of the money accumulated from the rentals received from plaintiff's property in Arkansas for purchasing "property described in the city of Pasadena," and, "unbeknown to the plaintiff, and contrary to the belief and desires of plaintiff, caused the title to said property to be issued in his own name, and that he, the said James A. Roberts, continued to hold said property as aforesaid up to the time of his decease," and that the defendant administrator claims said property on behalf of the estate of said deceased. Plaintiff further alleges that because of her illiteracy she knew nothing of the fact that her husband had taken title "to the aforesaid real property in Pasadena, purchased as aforesaid, in his own name, but verily believed that the said title had been made in her name."

[1] In view of these facts, and the condition of the record here, we think it unnecessary to refer to the answer of defendant or to the findings of the court. So far as the evidence on behalf of defendant is concerned, almost, if not quite all, was in an attempt to establish the heirship of W. H. Roberts—an intervener herein—a matter not in issue here, hence immaterial. The plaintiff, however, must establish her position, if at all, upon the strength of her own case rather than the weakness of the defense.

Plaintiff has not traced any specific sum of money from her separate estate into the property in question. She has not pointed out to us any testimony which shows that she is entitled to have title quieted in her or a trust declared in her favor. Lest, however, this possible oversight on the part of plaintiff's counsel might cause an injustice to be done to plaintiff, we have, notwithstanding the rule which renders such labor on our part unnecessary, read the entire record, with the result stated.

[2, 3] From the record it appears that four exhibits were introduced on behalf of plaintiff. The evidence of this fact appears as follows: Plaintiff's Exhibit No. 1, blank sheet, showing bank account of deceased; No. 2, three documents attached, a deed, a contract, and a check; No. 3, a bunch of letters; and No. 4, a deed. We assume from the record before us that these, whatever they were, were actually before the trial court; but we are not given the opportunity of considering them at all. They were not read into the record. The record is silent, even as to whether they were considered read. They have not been copied into the record in any way. They, or copies thereof, are not attached to the pleadings or to the transcript. Because of these facts, we might have invoked the rule enunciated in Welk v. Sorenson (Sup.) 178 Pac. 498, and refuse to consider the briefs; but, as already stated, we have not done so.

We are, however, wholly helpless in the matter to do anything except to affirm the judgment of the trial court, because, in the absence of legal evidence to the contrary, we must presume that that court acted regularly and in the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction.

GRIFFITH v. REDDICK et al. (Civ. 2133.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1919.)

1. Bailment 🔑18(3) — Automobile — Lien and Possession of Repairer.

Where the owner of an automobile in possession of a machinist who had repaired it obtained possession by taking it from his shop without his knowledge or consent, and returned it when demanded, and later induced a driver of the machinist by trick or device, to take it into another garage, which took possession of and attempted to hold it, the machinist did not lose his constructive possession or his lien.

2. Replevin 🔑93—Findings—Alternative Relief.

When one claims a right of possession of personal property in claim and delivery by virtue of a lien, the measure of his recovery in the event his possession cannot be restored is the amount of his lien, and it is therefore necessary for court to find that amount which is not necessarily what he claims is due him, but only what is actually due.

3. Replevin 🔑103(4) — Alternative Judgment.

Where defendant claimed the right of possession of personal property in claim and delivery by virtue of a lien, the fact that the court did not make a finding as to what was due by virtue of the lien did not affect the part of his judgment giving to defendant the right to a redelivery of the property, Code Civ. Proc. §§ 627, 666, entitling the prevailing party in proceedings under claim and delivery to an alternative judgment for the value of the property in case a return can be made, being solely for the benefit of the prevailing party, the plaintiff not having the privilege of payment, if redelivery of the property is possible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith and Grant Jackson, Judges.

Action by Robert E. Griffith against J. J. Reddick and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in part and reversed in part.

Perry F. Backus, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Newmire and L. M. Fall, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. Plaintiff has appealed from a judgment in favor of defendants for the return of possession of an automobile truck, or for the sum of $1,334.31, the amount of lien claimed by defendants against the same in case a redelivery of the property cannot be had.

Alleged insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, and insufficiency of the findings to sustain the judgment, are the grounds of appeal.

Very little consideration is required in disposing of the sufficiency of the evidence and findings in support of defendant's right to a redelivery of the property. It clearly appears that defendant Reddick, an automobile machinist, was in possession of the truck by virtue of a lien for extensive repairs made thereon in his shop. Plaintiff claims that this lien was lost by a voluntary relinquishment to him of the possession of the truck. The plaintiff did obtain possession of it on one occasion, by taking it from the shop without the knowledge or consent of defendant Reddick, at a time when no other person was present than a workman, who was at times casually in the employ of said defendant, but who does not appear to have been working for him at this time, or to have had authority to permit the machine to be taken from the shop. Defendant Reddick immediately demanded and secured its return to his place of business and possession, and the plaintiff, in effect, disclaimed any intention to interfere with said defendant's lien. Later the defendant Reddick permitted the truck to be used in plaintiff's business for a few days with one of his (Reddick's) employés in charge as driver, who returned it to said defendant's place of business every night. If it was during this period at any time in the control of plaintiff in person, it was with the understanding that it was in no way a surrender of the lien. While the machine was being driven for plaintiff by defendant Reddick's employé, plaintiff, by what may be properly termed a "trick or device," induced the driver to take the truck into what was known as the Normal Garage, where he had left orders with the people in charge that they were not to allow the said driver to remove it. When he attempted to do so he was prevented. Thereupon he notified his employer, who, with several of his workmen, repaired at once to the Normal Garage and took more or less forcible possession of the truck and drove it away. Plaintiff thereafter brought this action, and obtained, through a writ of replevin, possession of the truck.

[1] By none of the transactions narrated, leading up to this suit, did defendant Reddick lose his lien, or even his constructive possession. The detention of the truck in the Normal Garage was unwarranted, and did not confer possession of any kind upon plaintiff, and if the removal of it by said defendant was forcible, it was not as against any possession on the part of plaintiff, but that of the Normal Garage.

The findings of the court that defendant Reddick was in possession of this truck under a valid lien and was entitled to its possession when it was taken in the claim and delivery proceedings, and the judgment of the court that he recover possession thereof from the plaintiff, were all properly made and given.

The only allegation of error which is open to discussion is with regard to the findings and judgment granting the alternative relief that in a case a redelivery of the property cannot be had, defendants recover from plaintiff the sum of $1,334.31, the amount of the lien claimed against said personal property.

The plaintiff disputed the amount of defendant Reddick's claim of lien, and on the trial he was not permitted to introduce his evidence in that relation. Moreover, the findings of the court are irreconcilably inconsistent in this regard. In finding 5 the court declares "that all of the admissions, denials, and allegations contained in defendants' second defense are true, except that, while the court finds that defendant Reddick claims a lien to the extent of $1,334.31 on said personal property herein mentioned, and plaintiff admits there is some undetermined amount due him for repairs thereto, the court does not find as to the amount due Reddick." In finding 6 it is declared "that all of the admissions, denials, and allegations contained in paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 of defendants' second defense are true, and sustained by the evidence." Paragraph 3 of the second defense, referred to in this finding, states that the defendant Reddick had performed and rendered services in and about said truck, and furnished materials for its reconstruction, "to the amount of $1,560.31, no part of which has been paid, except the sum of $226, leaving a balance wholly due, owing, and unpaid from said plaintiff to said defendant J. J. Reddick of $1,334.31." Either the first quoted finding, being specific in its terms, must control the more general one relating to the truth of the allegation of the answer, or the two findings must stand in irreconcilable conflict.

[2] As we undersand the procedure laid down by the Supreme Court in Wilkerson v. Thorp, 128 Cal. 221, 60 Pac. 679, and other decisions to the same effect, when one claims the right of possession of personal property in claim and delivery by virtue of a lien, the measure of his recovery, in the event his possession cannot be restored, is the amount of his lien, and it must therefore be necessary for the court to find that amount. The amount of his lien is not necessarily what he claims is due him, but what is actually due and owing. For the reasons stated, the alternative part of this judgment cannot be sustained.

[3] We see no reason, however, why this should affect the part of the judgment giving to defendant the right to a redelivery of the property. The Code provision (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 627, 667) entitling the prevailing party in proceedings under claim and delivery to an alternative judgment for the value of the property in case a return cannot be had, is solely for the benefit of the prevailing party. It does not, where the judgment is for a redelivery to the defendant, or for the value if a return of the property cannot be had, give to the plaintiff the privilege of either redelivery or payment of the value, at his option. He has to return the property if it is within his power to do so, and it is no concern of his if the defendant fails to obtain his alternative relief. It is even held, in cases where it is made to appear on the trial that a redelivery cannot be had, that the converse of this proposition is true, and that judgment can be taken for the value without a judgment for the return of the property. Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. 501, 26 Pac. 1077; Etchepare v. Aguirre, 91 Cal. 288, 27 Pac. 668, 929, 25 Am. St. Rep. 180; Burke v. Koch, 75 Cal. 356, 17 Pac. 228; Brown v. Johnson, 45 Cal. 76; Erreca v. Meyer, 142 Cal. 308, 75 Pac. 826; Faulkner v. First National Bank, 130 Cal. 258, 62 Pac. 463; Bradley v. McDonald, 169 Pac. 427; Waldman v. Broder, 10 Cal. 378; Kneebone v. Kneebone, 83 Cal. 645, 23 Pac. 1031.

In the case of Waldman v. Broder, supra, the court says:

> "The jury having found a general verdict for the defendant in this action of replevin, the property, which had, under the previous proceedings, been taken from the defendants, was properly directed by the court to be returned to the defendants. * * * Nor is there anything in the failure to give an alternative judgment for the value of the property. This omission might be complained of by the defendants if they had shown the value; but it is no ground of complaint on the part of the plaintiff."

In Kneebone v. Kneebone, supra, there was a judgment of dismissal of plaintiff's action in claim and delivery and for a return to defendant of the property taken thereunder. It was claimed on appeal "that the court erred in adjudging that 'plaintiff return the property described in plaintiff's complaint to the defendant.' It is said the judgment should have been for a return of the property (describing it), or the value thereof in case a return could not be had; in other words, in the alternative form, as prescribed by section 667, Code of Civil Procedure." The court then says:

> "It was a matter of no concern to the plaintiff whether the judgment was in the alternative form or not, as he had no option as to whether he should pay or return the property."

It has been held in general terms, and without discussion, in two or three California decisions that the provisions of the Code as to an alternative judgment must be followed (Berson v. Nunan, 63 Cal. 550; Brichman v. Ross, 67 Cal. 601, 8 Pac. 316), but these cases have been questioned, or distinguished from the facts here under consideration, by later decisions (Claudius v. Aguirre, supra), and we are satisfied do not change the doctrine as laid down in the other decisions herein cited.

If the defendant has not had or cannot obtain a redelivery of the property, he should be entitled to a new trial as to the amount of his lien.

The judgment is affirmed as to all matters excepting the alternative that plaintiff recover the sum of $1,334.31, the amount of the lien claimed against said personal property in case a redelivery of same cannot be had. That part of the judgment is reversed, and a new trial directed as to the amount of defendant's claim of lien, unless a new trial on that issue be waived by the defendants.

PEOPLE ex rel. BRADFORD, Dist. Atty., v. LAINE et al. (Civ. 1952.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 2, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1919.)

1. Action 🔑38(4) — Single Cause of Action — Redlight Abatement Act—Complaint.

A complaint to enjoin a nuisance under the Redlight Abatement Act, charging that "said premises were and now are used for purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution" states only one cause of action; the gravamen of the complaint being the nuisance.

2. Nuisance 🔑84 — Redlight Abatement Act—Complaint—Sufficiency.

A complaint in a proceeding under the Redlight Abatement Act to enjoin a nuisance was sufficient where it alleged, "Said premises were and now are used for purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution," although it contained no description of specific acts of which the lewdness consisted or the manner in which those general acts were committed and practiced.

3. Nuisance 🔑84—Injunction—Lewdness —Evidence.

In a proceeding by the state under the Redlight Abatement Act to enjoin a dance hall as a nuisance, evidence that intoxicating liquor was sold in the dance hall and was used by females as well as male frequenters was admissible to show the character of the place and that lewdness was practiced therein.

4. Evidence 🔑61—Presumption — Lewdness and Immorality—Intoxicating Liquors.

Where women shamelessly indulge in intoxicating liquors in a public place with any and all men who may chance to visit such a place, it is reasonably probable that they and their male companions in the bacchanalian revelry would indulge in conduct involving immorality.

5. Nuisance 🔑84—Injunction—Lewdness —Evidence.

Evidence of the sale and use of liquor in a public dance hall is not conclusive proof of lewdness or other immoral conduct.

6. Appeal and Error 🔑1052(8)—Harmless Error—Evidence of Independent Crime.

In a proceeding by the state under the Redlight Abatement Act to enjoin a building as a nuisance, it was not prejudicial error to permit introduction of evidence tending to show that the occupant of the premises was selling intoxicating liquor without a local license, where there was such an abundance of convincing evidence showing that acts of lewdness were committed that it would be unreasonable to hold that the court was in the slightest degree influenced thereby.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Charles O. Busick, Judge.

Proceedings by the People of the State of California, on the relation of Hugh B. Bradford, district attorney of the County of Sacramento, against the property of Laura E. Laine, occupied by Charles F. Gibney. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, the owner and occupant appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 177 Cal. 742, 171 Pac. 941.

J. W. S. Butler, B. F. Van Dyke, and White, Miller, Needham & Harber, all of Sacramento, for appellants.

Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. The district attorney of Sacramento county filed in the superior court a complaint praying that the property at No. 223 L Street, in the city of Sacramento, be enjoined as a nuisance, by virtue of the provisions of the so-called "Redlight Abatement Act." Stats. 1913, p. 20. The premises, which are owned by the defendant Laura E. Laine, are occupied by defendant Charles F. Gibney as a dance hall where approximately 35 girls are employed. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and directing that the building and premises be kept closed for one year, etc. The appeal is by defendants from said judgment.

It was charged in the amended complaint that—

> "Said premises were and now are used for purposes of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution, and upon said premises acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution were held and did occur, and said premises were and now are a nuisance under the laws of the state of California."

Defendants filed a demurrer to the amended complaint, in which, among other grounds, they specified that—

"In said amended complaint three causes of action are set forth, and no one of them is so stated as to be sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and said causes of action are mingled together, and not separately stated, to wit:" One charging lewdness, the second charging assignation, and the third charging prostitution.

The demurrer was overruled, and appellants urge that this action of the court was erroneous.

It is also contended by appellants that the demurrer to the amended complaint should have been sustained on the ground that the facts constituting the alleged acts of lewdness are not set out in the complaint.

[1] The complaint is not amenable to the objection that it states different and distinct causes of action. Mr. Bradford, the district attorney, representing the respondent here, in his brief well answers the contention of the appellants upon that point as follows:

> "The statute under which the action was brought is one for the abatement of nuisances; the thing aimed at is a nuisance. The cause of action here is the abatement of a nuisance alleged to be in existence on the premises of appellants. The action was not brought to abate acts of lewdness, and acts of assignation, and acts of prostitution, but was brought to abate a nuisance which was caused by the commission on said premises of acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution. The fact that the court found that the nuisance was caused by acts of lewdness only does not render the pleading faulty; it simply shows that more was alleged than could be proven."

In other words, there is but one cause of action stated in the complaint, to wit, a public nuisance, committed, as the complaint alleges, by the habitual practicing upon and in the premises described of acts of lewdness, assignation, and prostitution. These terms have a definite, commonly understood meaning, and are employed in the statute as they are so understood, and the statement in the complaint that the nuisance complained of consisted of the habitual practicing of either or all of those acts as they are generally designated or referred to in the statute is sufficient to set forth, in an intelligible, unambiguous, and readily understood manner, a cause of action under the statute.

That it is proper to charge that all said acts have been habitually practiced in the building complained of we have no doubt. Thus, if it happens that the evidence is sufficient to show that only one of the three general acts is practiced therein, and thus the premises have been maintained as a nuisance, then a judgment condemning the property as such and enjoining its further use for that purpose may follow, rendering unnecessary the trouble, expense, and inconvenience of a new proceeding, as might be the case if it were requisite that the complaint should be confined in its charge to one of the three several acts of which the nuisance denounced by the abatement act may consist. The defendant or the party owning the building or maintaining the nuisance can suffer no disadvantage or cannot in the slightest measure be misled where the complaint charges that the nuisance has been maintained by the habitual commission in the building or on the premises of the three general acts designated by the statute as constituting such a nuisance. He can experience no possible difficulty in as readily and fully meeting and defending against the complaint where the three general acts are charged and but one is susceptible of establishment by the proofs as though one of the acts only were relied upon in the complaint to show the existence of the nuisance. Indeed, lewdness, assignation, and prostitution are acts so similar in nature that there can be but little difference in the general character of the evidence necessary to prove their existence.

In criminal cases, even, it has repeatedly been held as to a certain class of cases that, where a specific crime is by the statute made to consist of all or one of a series of enumerated acts, the complaint or indictment may, without doing violence to good pleading or without misleading the accused, charge that the defendant committed the crime by doing all such acts. For instance, in People v. Harrold, 84 Cal. 567, 24 Pac. 106, where the accused was charged with the crime of forgery and the indictment charged that he did "make, alter, forge, and counterfeit a certain bill of sale," etc., it was held that the indictment was not faulty because it charged that the crime was committed by the doing of the several acts any one or all of which will constitute forgery. The court in that case said:

> "Where a statute enumerates a series of acts, either of which separately, or all together, may constitute the offense, all of such acts may be charged in a single count, for the reason that, notwithstanding each act may by itself constitute the offense, all of them together do no more, and likewise constitute but one and the same offense."

See, also, People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 513; Ex parte McCarthy, 72 Cal. 384, 14 Pac. 96; People v. Faust, 113 Cal. 172, 45 Pac. 261; People v. Epperson, 176 Pac. 702.

There is no conceivable reason why this rule should be held any the less applicable to a case arising under the abatement act, which is not a criminal proceeding, notwithstanding that a judgment in the nature of a penalty may be entered therein. But, as above stated, the gravamen of the complaint here is the nuisance. That is the ultimate fact to be established, and it is proper to allege and prove it by showing any or all the acts constituting it.

[2] The objection that the allegation that "lewdness, assignation, and prostitution" were practiced in the building, in the absence of a description of specific acts of which the lewdness, assignation, or prostitution consisted or of the manner in which those general acts were committed and practiced, involves mere conclusions of the pleader and of law, is answered by the foregoing considerations, and further by the following cases: House v. Meyer, 100 Cal. 592, 35 Pac. 308; Talbot v. Ginocchio, 18 Cal. App. 391, 123 Pac. 223; Ellis v. Central Traction Co., 174 Pac. 407; Doolittle v. McConnell (Sup.) 174 Pac. 305. Nothing further, therefore, need be said upon that subject herein.

The next and last assignment of error involves the action of the court in permitting the fact to appear in the record that intoxicating liquors were sold on the premises in question without a local license. This testimony resulted from the statement of the witness Grant that he purchased a bottle of liquor in the building on the occasion of his visit thereto, there being a bar maintained therein, and the denial of one of the defendants, Gibney, who conducted the place, that he ever sold or dispensed such liquors on the premises. The said defendant, in the first instance, said that there was a government (meaning federal government) license in the room where it was claimed liquor was sold. The district attorney then asked Gibney, "If you do not sell liquor, why do you have a government license?" to which the defendant replied that he was under the impression that he had seen a government license on the wall in a frame, but that he was not positive that it was such a license. The court thereupon asked the defendant if he had a city liquor license, to which he replied, "I do not know as regards to that."

[3-6] The objection to that testimony was that it involved the introduction into the case of evidence tending to show that a public crime had been committed by defendant Gibney, and that such evidence had no tendency to prove that the premises as maintained were a nuisance under the abatement act; that therefore the testimony was not only irrelevant to the issue before the court, but prejudicial in its effect upon the rights of the defendants.

It was proper to show that intoxicating liquors were dispensed or sold to frequenters of the dance hall, and that the females there present not only drank such liquors, but solicited the male visitors to purchase the same for them. In view of the fact that the testimony disclosed that both men and women frequented the place, and although, in many instances, strangers to each other indiscriminately intermingled with each other and indulged in free and easy or familiar and unbecoming conduct toward each other, evidence of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the dance hall and the use thereof by female as well as male frequenters of the place tended, in some measure, to show the character of the place and that lewdness was practiced therein. Enough is commonly known of the character of women to justify the statement that, where they have so far divested themselves of that personal pride and modesty which constitute one of the ruling characteristics of true womanhood that they will shamelessly indulge in intoxicating liquors in a public place with any and all men who may chance to visit such a place, it is reasonably probable that, under such circumstances, they and their male companions in the bacchanalian revelry would indulge in conduct involving gross acts of lewdness and immorality. Of course, evidence of the sale and use of liquor in such a place is by no means conclusive in proof of lewdness or other immoral conduct, but it is some proof, the probative force and effect of which is for the determination of the trial court and to be considered by it in connection with evidence of other relevant facts and circumstances. But it was wholly unnecessary to bring out the fact, or attempt to do so, that Gibney sold liquors at the dance hall without a municipal license authorizing him to do so. The record, though, carefully examined, does not show that Gibney positively stated that he did not have such a license. He merely said that he could not answer as to that. Assuming, though, as well we may assume, that the fact that he could not say whether he had taken out a local license or not would justify the inference that he had no such license, since it would stand to reason that, if he had such a license, he would have known of it, still we cannot say that the bringing out of that fact resulted in a miscarriage of justice. There is an abundance of evidence in the record showing that acts of lewdness were committed in the place by both male and female frequenters thereof. Indeed, the evidence is so convincing in that particular that it would be most unreasonable to hold that the court below was in the slightest degree influenced in its decision by the mere fact, if it was a fact, that the defendant Gibney sold intoxicating liquors in the building in question here without legal authority to do so.

We may add that we have carefully read the very able briefs of counsel for the appellants and examined the cases and other authorities cited and relied upon as in support of the several points urged for a reversal and that none of the cases cited is, in our opinion, strictly in point here. In them the rules of correct pleading are discussed and ably expounded, but in none is there any expression which we conceive to be at cross-purposes with the views herein expressed and the conclusion following therefrom. The judgment is affirmed.

FARRAR v. FARRAR. (Civ. 2144.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE 🔑133(1)—EVIDENCE—SEPARATE PROPERTY.

In a divorce suit, evidence held sufficient to show that real property awarded defendant as her separate property was, in fact, such.

2. DIVORCE 🔑222—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY'S FEES—TIME OF ALLOWANCE.

While ordinarily an allowance of attorney's fees in a divorce suit must be made in contemplation of services to be rendered, pending the action, where the determination of the amount of the allowance was, by express stipulation, deferred to the close of the trial, the trial court had jurisdiction to make an order allowing such fees contemporaneously with the judgment.

3. DIVORCE 🔑228—ALLOWANCE OF ATTORNEY'S FEES—ALLOWANCE IN JUDGMENT AND NOT BY SPECIAL ORDER.

Where it was stipulated in a divorce suit that the determination of the amount of attorney's fees might be deferred to the close of the trial, an allowance by the trial court of such fees in the judgment rather than by a separate order was not prejudicial to the losing party.

4. DIVORCE 🔑235—ALIMONY—AMOUNT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The amount to be allowed the wife in a divorce suit as permanent alimony, upon the rendition of a decree on her cross-bill, is a matter within the reasonable discretion of the trial court under the circumstances of each case.

5. DIVORCE 🔑240(5)—ALIMONY—AMOUNT—EXCESSIVENESS.

Allowance of $35 a month alimony held not excessive or oppressive to a man who received $75 a month, in addition to his board and lodging, notwithstanding that the wife held real estate as her separate property; such property producing no income.

6. TRIAL 🔑29(2)—PROVINCE OF JUDGE—OMISSIONS OR DEFECTS.

It is court's duty to see that as nearly as possible the issues shall be disposed of on their merits, and he may call attention to omissions in the evidence or defects in the pleadings which may result in a mistrial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Suit by Arthur L. Farrar against Matilda L. Farrar for divorce, with cross-bill. Judgment for defendant on the cross-bill, and from part of the judgment plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Thompson & Creighton, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank C. Collier, of Los Angeles, and Collier, Shelton & Schlegel, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. Plaintiff brought his action in this case for a divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The defendant, by her cross-complaint, alleged desertion and adultery. The judgment was for defendant on the ground of desertion. The appeal is taken by plaintiff and cross-defendant from the part of the judgment disposing of the property rights, and awarding to defendant alimony and attorneys' fees.

The findings, so far as material to this appeal, are, in substance, as follows: That plaintiff and defendant accumulated as community property the following property, and none other, to wit: The household furniture; the wearing apparel and personal effects of plaintiff and defendant; one automobile; and a mining interest of some kind or character in the state of Colorado. That the following is separate property of the defendant: Easterly 41 feet of westerly 48 feet of lot 28 in block B of West Los Angeles; lot 102 of Exposition Park Square, of Los Angeles; $350 in cash in possession of defendant. That defendant has no income, but that she has about $350 in money on deposit. That plaintiff is at present employed at a grocery store in Barstow, Cal., at a monthly salary of $75, in addition to his board and room. That $35 per month is a reasonable amount for permanent alimony. That $200 is reasonable attorneys' fee to be awarded defendant.

The judgment, as to the property rights, was in accordance with these findings, and divided the community property by giving to defendant the household furniture and her personal effects and wearing apparel, and to the plaintiff the automobile, the Colorado mining interest, and his personal effects and wearing apparel; the court adjudging this to be an equal division in value of the community property. The defendant also had judgment for permanent alimony at $35 per month, and $200 attorneys' fees.

[1] The main contention of appellant is that the evidence does not support the finding that the real property is the separate property of defendant. Most of appellant's argument, however, is taken up with a discussion of the relative weight and credibility of the conflicting testimony on this point. That was a matter for the trial court. It may be conceded that defendant's account of the resources from which she obtained title to this property is not very clear or convincing. She claims to have had $3,000 of which her husband was not aware at the time of their marriage, and as to the disposition of which, during the years previous to these real estate investments, she is very vague and noncommittal in her explanations. On the other hand, the only way appellant attempts to explain the purchase of these lots as community property, and which explanation is denied by respondent, is on the theory that a large proportion of the consideration paid for them was money saved by the respondent from an allowance of $50 per month, with perhaps $100 a year additional, which he paid to her for a period of several years. Incidentally it is conceded that she kept up all of the household expenses, and clothed herself out of this allowance. The consideration paid for the two properties was $2,650 for the first described lot, on which the parties resided, and $1,500 for the other lot, aggregating $4,150. It is agreed that Mrs. Farrar had at least $600 at her marriage, and from about $700 to $1,000 subsequently inherited from her parents, and she admits that she paid about $500 of the consideration of the last described lot from savings from her allowance; but this would still leave an additional sum of from $2,000 to $2,300 to be accounted for, and we are inclined to believe that respondent's claim that she had $3,000, instead of merely $600, at the time of her marriage is a more credible explanation of the purchase money than the surmise of appellant that she saved a total of some $2,500, or over $25 a month for eight years, from an allowance of $50 per month, after paying all the current expenses of the household therefrom. In addition to this, we have the presumption of separate ownership, from the fact that this property has at all times stood of record in Mrs. Farrar's name.

The defendant testified that the home place, which is all of the real estate that plaintiff in his complaint claimed as community property, "was purchased with money that was absolutely my own money. It was money that I had before I married Mr. Farrar. I had my own funds, and it was with these funds that I purchased this property." Plaintiff's complaint avers that aside from this lot, which is therein alleged to be community property, "there is no other community property, excepting household goods and wearing apparel." As to the sum approximating $500 which respondent admits went into the other lot from savings accumulated from her husband's allowance to her and the cash in her possession, the court was not without evidence to justify treating these amounts as a gift from her husband. As has already been pointed out, title to this lot was taken and held in respondent's name, and the complaint concedes that it did not belong to the community. We cannot see that the court erred in its findings regarding this property. The personal property and effects found to be community property seem to have been equally divided in point of reasonable value.

Appellant complains that there is no express finding of the trial court as to the community interest in the $200 building and loan stock, and shares of the par value of $200 in the Guaranty Building & Investment Company, of which evidence was introduced. These items, however, are covered both by the admission of plaintiff in his complaint that, aside from the alleged community interest in the home place and in the household goods and wearing apparel, there was no community property, and the general finding of the court that the property enumerated as such in said finding, and none other, constituted the community accumulations of the parties. That the items above referred to were not enumerated in the judgment as separate property of appellant is in no way to plaintiff's detriment.

Relating to the Guaranty Building & Investment shares, counsel for appellant states in his brief that—

> "There was no testimony given in regard to the matter, except the testimony of Mrs. Farrar herself, * * * which reads as follows:
> "Q. (by Mr. Thompson): How much of the Guaranty stock have you? A. I have 200 shares at $1 per share."

Counsel further states that "it is not shown anywhere in the testimony that this stock is not worth its face value." This is certainly a very misleading summary of the record. The typewritten transcript contains nearly three pages of testimony of Mrs. Farrar tending to show that this company was long since bankrupt and out of business, that she had not kept up her assessments on the stock, and that she had received notice some three years previously that her shares would be sold for delinquencies, and had abandoned the whole matter as valueless. There was no attempt on the part of plaintiff to show that they had any value.

[2, 3] The allowance of $200 as attorneys' fees is reasonable in amount. Ordinarily, as appellant contends, such an allowance must be made in contemplation of services to be rendered pending the action; but in this case the matter of fixing the amount which defendant should receive for services of her attorneys was, by express stipulation between the parties, deferred to the close of the trial; and there can be no question, under such circumstances, of the court's jurisdiction to make the order contemporaneously with the judgment. Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 614, 115 Pac. 751. That the allowance was made in the judgment rather than by a separate order can in no wise prejudice appellant. The order by itself would have the effect of, and could be enforced as, a judgment.

[4, 5] The amount to be given, if anything, as permanent alimony is a matter within the reasonable discretion of the court, under the circumstances of each case. We do not see that $35 a month is excessive or oppressive to a man who is receiving $75 per month, in addition to his board and lodging. The respondent, it is true, has the real estate as her separate property, but it affords her only a place to live, as no income is derived from it at present, and she has no other income. Plaintiff testified that he had for years contributed not less than $50 a month to his wife's support, although she then, as now, had the possession and use of this real property. Is there any reason why he should do less because he has willfully deserted her? Appellant's counsel refers to this requirement for alimony as "a mortgage on Mr. Farrar's existence for the rest of his natural life." It is the enforcement of an obligation which the appellant took upon himself when he married this woman, and from which he cannot be permitted to free himself by deserting her willfully and without legal cause. A man past middle age can usually rehabilitate himself in life in case of a break in the marriage relations. A woman of that age seldom can; and the courts may very properly safeguard her financial future where, by the fault of her husband, the marriage is dissolved.

[6] The spirit and language in the closing brief of counsel for appellant, in its reflections upon the fairness of the trial judge in the disposition of this case, is offensive and uncalled for, and would have merited an order striking the brief from the files, had the matter been earlier called to the attention of this court. Moreover, there is nothing in the record of this case to give substance to the criticism. It is time it was understood that a trial judge does not sit as a mere referee in a contest of wits between counsel in the case, but that it is not only within his province, but is his duty, to see that as nearly as possible the issues shall be disposed of on their merits; and it is not out of place for him to call attention to omissions in the evidence or defects in the pleadings which are likely to result in a mistrial.

HIRSCHBERG v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.

(L. A. 4264.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 31, 1919.)

1. Witnesses 🔑219(4)—Privileged Communications to Physicians—Waiver.

The privilege of a patient, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, of preventing physicians from testifying as to communications made by patient, is personal to the patient and may be waived by him.

2. Witnesses 🔑219(5)—Privileged Communications to Physicians — Waiver of Privilege.

Plaintiff in a personal injury action, by testifying fully and allowing a physician to testify fully as to her condition after an alleged assault, did not waive her right, given by Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, to object to the introduction in evidence of information acquired by another physician while acting as her physician several years prior to the injury complained of.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by Fannie Hirschberg against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying its motion for new trial, the defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry T. Gage, W. I. Foley, W. I. Gilbert, and C. F. Cable, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Peyton H. Moore and E. B. Drake, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of the county of Los Angeles in an action for damages for personal injuries, in which the plaintiff was awarded the sum of $3,500, with costs amounting to $524.95. The complaint alleges that the injuries were sustained by the plaintiff at the hands of an employé of the defendant company. The case was tried by jury, and judgment was given by the court for the amount of the verdict. A motion for a new trial was thereafter interposed and denied. The record contains a statement on motion for a new trial settled and allowed by the court.

It appears that the plaintiff has resided in Los Angeles since July 27, 1910. On August 5, 1910, the plaintiff, accompanied by her son, went to the station of the defendant company in Los Angeles for the purpose of securing certain baggage belonging to her and her family. The baggage agent presented a statement of excess charges for payment before releasing the baggage. Plaintiff's son questioned the correctness of a certain item of 25 cents, and an altercation ensued, during which, plaintiff alleged, the baggage agent assaulted her by seizing her right arm and throwing her violently and forcibly against the stone floor, causing her jewelry to be driven into the flesh of her chest, "bruising and lacerating the same and breaking the bones thereof." It is further alleged that she was "severely and permanently injured in the lower abdominal region, and especially plaintiff's uterus was misplaced, torn, crushed, and bruised, and her female functions were interfered with, and she has been caused to be sick, sore, and lame therefrom ever since"; and, further, that her left knee and right arm were severely sprained, her back wrenched, her face and head bruised, "and that her body became sick, sore, and disordered."

The only question presented for consideration on this appeal is whether the trial court erred in excluding the deposition of Dr. Emery Marvel of Atlantic City, N. J., which was offered by the defendant.

From the record it appears that the deposition was objected to by the plaintiff on the ground that the examination called for information acquired by Dr. Marvel while attending the plaintiff as a physician, within the meaning of subdivision 4, § 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the ruling of the court was based upon that conceded fact. It also appears that, while the deposition was taken upon the stipulation of the parties, it was taken "subject to all objections and exceptions, as if the said witness were personally present on the stand, but without objection to the time or place of taking the same. It being expressly agreed that plaintiff by this stipulation does not in any way waive the right to object to the introduction in evidence of all or any part of the testimony of Dr. Marvel on the ground that the same is privileged."

The appellant contends that the deposition of Dr. Marvel was admissible upon two grounds:

> "First. Mrs. Hirschberg, by her own testimony and by disclosures made with her consent by her physician, waived any right which she may have had to the exclusion of the testimony of the physician.
> "Second. She testified that Dr. Emery Marvel was not her physician, and that he had never treated her for any disease except that of lumbago. If he was not her physician, then certainly she could not object to his testifying in the case. In other words, if she claimed the privilege of excluding the communications between Dr. Marvel and herself from the consideration of the jury she could only do so upon the theory that he was her physician. She could not deny that the relationship existed, and in the same breath claim his testimony could not be offered because it was a privileged communication."

The plaintiff testified on direct examination that as a result of the injury she sustained a displacement of her uterus, and that "before the trouble I was a healthy woman." On cross-examination she was asked if in the years 1902, 1904, and 1907, at Atlantic City, New Jersey, she was not treated by Dr. Marvel for a displacement of her uterus. Her answer was flatly in the negative; she stated, however, that he had once treated her for lumbago.

On direct examination, Dr. Adolph Tyrola, plaintiff's personal physician, who treated her for the first time after the injury and was called in her behalf, described in minute detail the condition of the organs of the pelvic region, including a displacement of the uterus. He testified on cross-examination that—

> "She did not tell me that the entire displacement resulted from the fall. * * * My opinion in this case is that the displacement began several years ago, long prior to my first examination."

In view of the delicate nature of much of the testimony touching the physical condition of the plaintiff, and the fact that the only question reserved for appeal is that of privilege, we do not think it necessary to make a more extended reference to such testimony.

[1] Section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it was written at the time this action arose, reads as follows:

> "There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: * * * 4. A licensed physician or surgeon cannot, without the consent of his patient, be examined in a civil action as to any information acquired in attending the patient, which was necessary to enable him to prescribe or act for the patient. * * *"

The purpose of the privilege "is to facilitate and make safe full and confidential disclosures by patient to physician of all facts, circumstances, and symptoms, untrammeled by apprehension of their subsequent enforced disclosure and publication on the witness stand, to the end that the physician may form a correct opinion, and be enabled safely and efficaciously to treat his patient." In re Bruendl's Will, 102 Wis. 45, 78 N. W. 169. The privilege is personal to the patient and may be waived by him. Lissak v. Crocker Estate Co., 119 Cal. 442, 51 Pac. 688. What constitutes a waiver is stated in 40 Cyc. 2399, as follows:

> "The privilege is waived whenever the person entitled to the protection of the statute voluntarily makes public matters of which a disclosure without his consent is forbidden, and so where the client or patient voluntarily introduces evidence of communications between himself and his physician the privilege is waived, and the attorney or physician may testify in respect thereto."

It has been held that if a patient offers the testimony of one of several physicians attending the case at the same time, or who were present at a consultation, the privilege has been waived, so that the testimony of all of them will be received. Morris v. Railroad, 148 N. Y. 88, 42 N. E. 410, 51 Am. St. Rep. 675; O'Brien v. Western Implement Mfg. Co., 141 Mo. App. 331, 125 S. W. 804, and cases there cited. And likewise where different physicians have treated the patient at different times for the same injury and the patient calls one of the physicians to testify, it has been held that this constitutes a waiver as to all the physicians. Lawson v. Morning Journal, 32 App. Div. 71, 52 N. Y. Supp. 484; Lampel v. Goldstein, 167 N. Y. Supp. 576; State v. Long, 257 Mo. 199, 165 S. W. 748; Priebe v. Crandall (Mo. App.) 187 S. W. 605. However, there is authority to the contrary. Dotton v. Albion, 57 Mich. 575, 24 N. W. 786; Baxter v. Cedar Rapids, 103 Iowa, 599, 72 N. W. 790; Mellor v. R. Co. (Mo.) 14 S. W. 758; Hope v. Railroad Co., 110 N. Y. 643, 17 N. E. 873; Mays v. New Amsterdam C. Co., 40 App. D. C. 249, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1108; Slater v. Sorge, 166 Mich. 173, 131 N. W. 565.

But it is to be noted that in the foregoing cases it was sought to admit the testimony of physicians who attended the patients after the injury complained of, and who, according to the testimony of the patients themselves on direct examination, had been consulted or had given treatment for the same injury. Such is not the case here. The testimony of Dr. Marvel purported to cover information acquired by him while attending the plaintiff as her physician several years before. And in the presentation of the case for the plaintiff the treatment by Dr. Marvel was in no way referred to, but, as already stated, the fact was introduced at the trial on the cross-examination of the plaintiff. Dr. Marvel did not examine or treat the plaintiff after the assault. This question, so far as we are able to find, has never been passed upon in this state. However, the case of Missouri & N. A. R. Co. v. Daniels, 98 Ark. 352, 136 S. W. 651, decided in 1911 by the Supreme Court of Arkansas, is so clearly analogous in its facts and presents so concisely the exact point of law here involved that we will quote from it at some length.

The action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff through the negligence of a conductor of the defendant railroad company. It was alleged that the plaintiff had been thrown from the steps of a passenger coach to the floor of the station platform, and that as a result of the fall she had suffered a prolapsus of the uterus and that the injury was so severe that an operation was necessary. To prove the seriousness of her condition after the accident, she called Dr. Fowler, her attending physician, as a witness. We quote from the opinion:

> "* * * During the progress of the trial the defendant introduced two physicians who had attended on the plaintiff about two years prior to the time of the alleged injury, and offered to prove by them that she had sustained a displacement of the womb at that time, and had suffered from that trouble long prior to the date of the alleged injury. The plaintiff objected to the admission of this testimony, and her objection was sustained by the court. It is conceded by the defendant that the information which the testimony of these witnesses would have disclosed was acquired by them while attending the plaintiff as physicians; but it contends that the evidence was admissible because the plaintiff had waived her right to object to the introduction of any testimony relative to her condition by reason of having herself introduced the testimony of Dr. Fowler, above referred to.
> "It is provided by section 3098, Kirby's Digest, that 'no person authorized to practice physic or surgery, and no trained nurse, shall be compelled to disclose any information which he may have acquired from his patient while attending him in a professional character, and which information was necessary to enable him to describe as a physician or to act for him as a surgeon or a trained nurse.' * * * By virtue of the statute the patient is alone given the right to remove the ban of secrecy. The patient may be willing to waive the objection of incompetency as to a particular physician in whom he reposes confidence, and yet be unwilling to waive this objection as to another, who treated him at a different time for the trouble complained of. The statute affords him this privilege, when the testimony of the offered witness does not relate to the same occasion as that from which the patient has removed the seal of secrecy. [Citing cases.]

"Counsel for the defendant upon cross-examination of plaintiff asked her if the physicians whom defendant desired to introduce as witnesses as to her condition prior to the alleged injury had treated her in 1907 for displacement of the womb. This she denied, and it is now urged by the defendant that it was entitled to have the benefit of these physicians' testimony in order to contradict the plaintiff. But, if the defendant's position in this respect should be upheld, then the above statute in regard to privileged communications would be easily evaded. In any cause where the opposing party desired to obtain the testimony of an attending physician, it could be secured in like manner, although against the objection of the patient. The plain provisions of the statute forbidding such testimony by a physician cannot thus be abrogated. Holloway v. Kansas City, 184 Mo. 19, 82 S. W. 89; Burgess v. Sims Drug Co., 114 Iowa, 275, 86 N. W. 307, 54 L. R. A. 364, 89 Am. St. Rep. 359. We are therefore of the opinion that the plaintiff, by the introduction of the testimony of Dr. Fowler relative to his treatment of her as a physician after the injury, did not waive her privilege to object to the testimony of other physicians who had treated her prior to that time, alhough for the same alleged trouble."

See, also, Butler v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 3 Misc. Rep. 453, 23 N. Y. Supp. 163; Marx v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 56 Hun, 575, 10 N. Y. Supp. 159; Treanor v. Manhattan Ry. Co., 16 N. Y. Supp. 536; Webb v. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co., 89 Mo. App. 604; Woods v. Incorporated Town of Lisbon, 150 Iowa, 433, 130 N. W. 372.

The case of Holloway v. Kansas City, 184 Mo. 19, 82 S. W. 89, decided by the Supreme Court of Missouri, states with equal force and lucidity the law applicable to this question. Action was brought there for the recovery of damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused to the plaintiff by falling through a hole in a defective sidewalk. A point similar to the one last discussed was there raised on appeal. In the course of its opinion the court said:

"The plaintiff testified upon her examination in chief that her general health was good, and upon cross-examination she was asked if Dr. Mathias had treated her, and what for. She replied that he had treated her for headaches; nothing else. Defendant thereafter introduced Dr. Mathias to show what he had treated her for. Now, defendant contends that, because plaintiff answered its questions to the effect that Dr. Mathias treated her for nothing else than headaches, she waived the protection of the statute, and that the defendant had the right to the evidence of Dr. Mathias for the purpose of contradicting her. If defendant's position in this respect be the law, then the statute in regard to privileged communications is a failure in the purpose for which it was intended, for a party to a suit could evade it at any time where an attendant physician is introduced as an expert witness by asking him upon cross-examination, if he had treated the party in whose behalf he testifies, if he treated such party for anything else than what may be stated by such party, and, if so, by this means contradict him. The statutes of Iowa and New York with respect to privileged communications are in all essentials like the Missouri statute, and in the former state in the case of Burgess v. Sims Drug Co., 114 Iowa, 275, 86 N. W. 307, 54 L. R. A. 364, 89 Am. St. Rep. 359, the facts were similar to the facts in the case at bar. In that case defendant asked plaintiff on cross-examination if a certain physician, viz. Dr. Amos, had treated him, and what the doctor had treated him for. Plaintiff answered the questions, without objection, and then defendant offered Dr. Amos as a witness, claiming that plaintiff had waived his right under the statute by answering the questions propounded him by the defendant. The court held that plaintiff had not thereby waived his privilege under the statute, and that Dr. Amos was not competent to testify in regard to plaintiff's ailments, or his treatment of him. The court says: 'If counsel saw fit, on cross-examination, to inquire into this matter, he must be bound by the answer, and cannot afterwards claim that the witness, by answering without objection, voluntarily waived the privilege.' The same rule is announced by the Supreme Court of New York in Fox v. Union Turnpike Co., supra [59 App. Div. 363, 69 N. Y. Supp. 553]. There was no error in the ruling of the court upon this question."

[2] In our opinion the rule applicable to this case is correctly stated in the foregoing authorities. We have found no authority that supports the contention of appellant that because the plaintiff and her physician testified fully as to her condition after the assault the ban of privilege was thereby waived as to information acquired by Dr. Marvel while acting as her physician several years prior to the injury complained of.

We will next consider the further contention of appellant that the plaintiff testified that Dr. Marvel was not her physician, and that he never treated her for any disease except lumbago. Preliminarily it is proper to point out that the appellant is not accurate in stating the effect of the testimony of the plaintiff. She did not testify that Dr. Marvel was never her physician. The record plainly shows to the contrary. The purport of her cross-examination was whether in the years 1902, 1904, and 1907 Dr. Marvel did not treat her for female trouble. The questions were so framed that an affirmative answer would carry the declaration either that he had or had not been her physician for the specified purpose. She invariably answered that he had never so treated her, but that he had been called in to treat her for an attack of lumbago. This was equivalent to a direct declaration that he never had been her physician for the treatment of female trouble, but that he had been her physician for the treatment of lumbago. It was not disputed at the trial that Dr. Marvel had been the plaintiff's physician; the sole dispute was whether he had treated her for female trouble or for lumbago. Moreover, the fact of the relationship of physician and patient was admitted by counsel for the defendant at the trial, and it was upon this admission that the court based its ruling excluding the deposition, as is shown by the record:

> "Mr. Gilbert (counsel for the defendant): Let the record show that the entire deposition of Dr. Marvel was offered.
> "The Court: That is on the understanding that what he would testify to was information gained while attending her as a physician?
> "Mr. Gilbert: Yes.
> "The Court: With that understanding the objection will be sustained."

The argument of appellant, therefore, that plaintiff having denied that Dr. Marvel had been her physician could not object to his testifying in the case, is without force.

In view of this stipulation, and because we do not find that the point has been made in the briefs, it is not necessary to consider the question whether the privilege may be allowed as to information claimed by the defendant to have been acquired by Dr. Marvel in the treatment of the plaintiff for female trouble in the face of her testimony that he attended her for the treatment of lumbago only.

It is unquestionably true that the testimony of Dr. Marvel, if competent, would have been material and relevant to the inquiry whether the pelvic condition of the plaintiff as testified to by herself, Dr. Tyrola, and the other physicians at the trial, was in any degree due to the assault. No authority has been brought to our attention by counsel, and we have not been able to find any, which would support the admission of the deposition under the circumstances presented by the record.

And although the tendency of the decisions in recent years has been toward a less liberal application of the ban of privilege, and that the privilege in this state in cases of damages for personal injuries has been abrogated snice this cause of action arose (Stats. 1917, p. 954), yet to hold that the deposition was admissible would be to deny to the plaintiff a substantial right. The ruling was proper.

For the reasons stated the judgment and order are affirmed.

MUSGRAVE v. RENKIN et al. (L. A. 5244.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 6, 1919.)

1. Mortgages ⚷309(3) — Release — Delivery.

Release of a mortgage, not delivered by the mortgagee in his lifetime, did not take effect.

2. Mortgages ⚷224 — Assignment — Validity.

A mortgagee's assignment of the mortgage to a trustee in consideration of the beneficiary's agreement to care for, nurse, and support the mortgagee during the remainder of his life, which agreement the beneficiary performed, was not a gift, and was not executory, but was a present transfer of title.

3. Trusts ⚷11(1) — Purpose — Support of Assignor.

Assignment of mortgage to a trustee in consideration of the beneficiary's agreement to continue to care for, nurse, and support assignor during the remainder of his life, created a valid trust.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Hattie W. Musgrave, as executrix of the last will and testament of James Henry Caldwell, deceased, against Ida B. Renkin and E. W. Renkin and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Isidor B. Dockweiler, of Los Angeles, James C. Williams, of Kansas City, Mo., W. D. Finch and Dockweiler & Mott, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lucius K. Chase, Walter L. Mann, and George F. Renkin, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. At the time of the transactions complained of the decedent, Caldwell, held a mortgage and note, executed to him by the defendants, for the sum of $4,450. The plaintiff's complaint purports to state a cause of action to set aside a release of this mortgage and an assignment of the same mortgage, in trust for certain purposes, made by the decedent in his lifetime, on the ground that they were obtained by fraud and undue influence, and on the further ground that the transaction was an attempt to make a gift, and that it was not completed during the lifetime of the donor. The court below found that the aforesaid contracts were not obtained by fraud, that they were executed without undue influence, and with full knowledge by the donor of their terms and effect, and that at the time his mind was clear and he was fully capable of transacting business. There was evidence sufficient to support these findings. Hence they are conclusive on appeal.

[1] The release was not delivered by the deceased in his lifetime. Hence it did not take effect and need not be further considered.

[2, 3] The assignment of the mortgage was made in March, 1915, and was accompanied by a declaration of trust by the assignor and an acceptance thereof duly executed by the assignee. The effect thereof was to transfer the complete title to the mortgage and note to the trustee, and he thereafter held the same subject to the terms of the trust. The trust declaration provided that in case Caldwell, the decedent, left the home of the Renkins during his lifetime, the trustee should reassign the mortgage and note to Caldwell. That condition did not happen. Under the remaining conditions of the trust, if Caldwell remained in the home of Mrs. Renkin and was cared for by her up to the time of his death, the mortgage was then to be assigned by the trustee to Ida B. Renkin. That condition happened, and the mortgage was transferred in accordance with the declaration. The consideration for the transaction was the previous care of the decedent by Mrs. Renkin and her agreement to continue to care for, nurse, and support him during the remainder of his life. He was old and so afflicted that he required constant care and attention. The agreement of Mrs. Renkin was fully performed. The assignment to the trustee was not a gift, it was not executory, but was a present transfer of the title. Burkett v. Doty, 176 Cal. 89, 167 Pac. 518. The trust was in all respects lawful and valid. The result is that the findings and judgment of the court below in favor of the defendant must be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re GOULD'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9058.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1919. Rehearing Denied Sept. 4, 1919.)

1. Executors and Administrators ⟹188 — Allowances to Widow — Separation and Divorce.

A widow is entitled, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1464, to a reasonable allowance for support, although she has not lived in a family relation with her husband for some years prior to his decease, and has been granted an interlocutory decree of divorce.

2. Judgment ⟹524—Construction.

Words in a judgment or decree should not be construed independently, but should be considered in relation to the context in which they are found and in the light of the circumstances under which they were used.

3. Executors and Administrators ⟹188 Allowance to Widow—Effect of Award of Property on Divorce.

An interlocutory decree of divorce, requiring the husband to transfer to the wife certain property and allotting all other property of the community to the husband "free and clear of all claim of the wife," held not to defeat her statutory claim to a family allowance on his death.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Frank H. Gould, deceased. From an order allowing Nettie Gould, the widow of deceased, a sum as a family allowance, E. B. Gould, as special administrator, appeals. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman, of Willow, and Walter E. Drobisch, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph A. Brown, Elmer E. Robinson, Fabian D. Brown, and Robinson & Brown, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal by E. B. Gould, a special administrator of the estate of Frank H. Gould, deceased, from an order allowing respondent, Nettie Gould, the widow of the deceased, the sum of $75 a month as a family allowance.

On January 19, 1918, the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco granted to Nettie Gould an interlocutory decree of divorce from Frank H. Gould, upon a cross-complaint filed by her in an action instituted by the said Frank H. Gould. This decree required the plaintiff, Frank H. Gould, to transfer to the respondent herein certain property, real and personal; it being at the same time ordered that—

> "All other property of said community, real, personal, or mixed, and of every description, is hereby assigned and allotted to the plaintiff, Frank H. Gould, free and clear of all claim of the defendant [Nettie Gould]."

Frank H. Gould died on January 26, 1918. On March 1, 1918, Nettie Gould made her application to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for a family allowance. The application was resisted on the ground that Nettie Gould had not been for many years in fact a member of the family of Frank H. Gould, and moreover, that Frank H. Gould died possessed of no property save that which had formerly been the property of the community and which had been awarded to him free and clear of all claim of Nettie Gould, including, so it is contended, her claim for a family allowance. On March 12, 1918, the court made the order appealed from allowing Nettie Gould a family allowance beginning with February 1, 1918, and continuing until further orders of the court.

[1] When a person dies leaving a widow, under section 1464 of the Code of Civil Procedure, such widow is entitled to a reasonable provision for her support to be allowed by the superior court or a judge thereof. This provision is not conditioned upon her having lived in a family relation with her husband at the time of his death. It follows, therefore, that the right of Nettie Gould to a family allowance must be determined independently of the circumstance that she had not lived with Frank H. Gould for some years prior to his decease. Farris v. Battle, 80 Ga. 187, 7 S. E. 263, approved in Smith v. Smith, 112 Ga. 351, 37 S. E. 407; King v. Executor of King, 64 Mo. App. 301.

At the time of the death of the decedent, Nettie Gould was his wife. She is now entitled to such rights as the law confers upon her, under the circumstances, as his widow, including the right to a family allowance, unless the property of the community awarded to the decedent was allotted to him free and clear of all claim by her, including the claim to a family allowance. Estate of Dargie, 162 Cal. 53, 121 Pac. 320.

In the Estate of Whitney, 171 Cal. 750, 154 Pac. 855, Mr. Justice Sloss, speaking on behalf of this court, said:

> "The widow's claim to a family allowance is strongly favored in our law. * * * A will may, of course, be so drawn as to put the widow to her election between taking the benefits given her by the testator and claiming her right of family allowance. So, too, the wife may, by agreement, surrender the privilege of applying for an allowance. Whether the right to demand an allowance is inconsistent with the will, or has been surrendered, is a question of interpretation of the will or the contract. In the case of a contract, we think the right should not be held to have been surrendered by an agreement between the spouses 'except by clear and explicit language.'"

In reason, the same principle should apply in construing the decree of a court dividing the property of the community between the spouses; the additional precaution being taken to avoid construing the decree so as to make it apply to rights which the proceeding was not intended to adjudicate.

[2, 3] In the Estate of Whitney, supra, the wife "waived all claims to her share of the community property and any and all other claims that she might have upon any of the estate disposed of by the said will." The will assumed to dispose of the entire estate of the husband. After careful consideration of the authorities in this state and other jurisdictions, the court decided that the wife had not waived her right to a family allowance. In view of the similarity of the language involved in that and in the instant case, this decision is entitled to great weight. An examination of the cases wherein it has been held that the wife had waived her statutory rights as widow reveals the fact that in each case the words used clearly imported an intention to surrender the very right afterwards claimed. In the Matter of Noah, 73 Cal. 583, 15 Pac. 287, 2 Am. St. Rep. 829, the wife agreed to relinquish "all her marital claims." In Wickersham v. Comerford, 96 Cal. 433, 31 Pac. 358, the wife relinquished all rights as wife in law or equity or by descent. In the Matter of Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 Pac. 999, the language was even more explicit. It is true that the Estate of Lufkin, 131 Cal. 291, 63 Pac. 469, stands for the proposition that the word "claim" is sufficiently broad to include the statutory claim for a family allowance. But that case merely supports the conclusion that the words "free and clear of all claim of the defendant" contained in the decree here in question, would, standing alone, cover a claim for family allowance. We are bound, however, to construe these words not independently but in relation with the context in which they are found and in the light of the circumstances under which they were used. The preceding portions of the decree clearly and unmistakably indicate the subject-matter of the adjudication as the presently existing rights of the spouses in the property of the community. The first five clauses of the decree, which thus identify the rights to be determined, are followed by the general terms of the clause in question. "The general language of this clause must be held to relate to rights and interests of the same nature and description with those that have been already mentioned. The clause is in the nature of a 'sweeping clause,' and its use and object was to guard against accidental omissions; and the rule of construction in such cases is that the 'general words are restrained by the subject-matter.'" Mahaffy v. Mahaffy, 63 Iowa, 55, 18 N. W. 685. Construing, then, the general words "free and clear of all claim of the defendant" as restrained by the subject-matter, that is to say, the presently existing rights of the spouses in the property of the community, we are constrained to hold that they were not intended to and do not cover a claim for family allowance. It follows that the court did not err in granting the respondent's application for a family allowance.

The view which we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary for us to consider the question whether or not Frank H. Gould died possessed of any property save that which had formerly been the property of the community.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

LEMLE v. BARRY et al. (Sac. 2676.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1919.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑144(2) — DEFECTS IN TITLE.

Where there has been no fraudulent misrepresentation as to the vendor's title, the fact that he has an imperfect title or no title at all at time of execution of a contract of sale does not invalidate the contract of sale; it being sufficient if vendor has good title at time he is called upon to perform.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑148 — DEFAULT—TENDER OF DEED.

Where, under a contract of sale of land, the making of the deed and the payment of a certain part of the purchase price were dependent and concurrent conditions, and time was of the essence of the contract, vendor could not put the vendee in default until he tendered his deed.

3. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑86, 334(1) — CONTRACTS OF SALE—ABANDONMENT.

Under a contract of sale of land, wherein the payment of a certain part of the purchase price within a specified time and the delivery of the deed were dependent and concurrent conditions, the vendee after the expiration of the time within which he was to make such payment could consider the contract abandoned, where the vendor after such time and without tendering a deed gave notice of termination of the contract and forfeiture on the theory that the vendee was in default, and the vendee was entitled to a return of installments of the purchase price theretofore paid.

4. VENDOR AND PURCHASER 🔑336 — CONTRACT—ABANDONMENT BY VENDOR—DEMAND BY VENDEE FOR REIMBURSEMENT.

Where, under a contract of sale of land, payment of a certain part of the purchase price and delivery of the deed were dependent and concurrent conditions, and vendor, after termination of the time within which vendee should make such payment, gave notice of forfeiture of installments theretofore paid without tendering the deed, thus giving vendee the right to treat the contract as abandoned, a demand of the vendee for reimbursement as to installments theretofore paid, although long delayed, had the legal effect of an immediate demand, where the vendor requested delay, but made no effort to correct a defective title or tender a deed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Julius Lemle against Mary M. Barry and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank Freeman, of Willow, and Frank L. Hatch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This action is brought by the vendee to recover from the vendor the initial payment of $5,000 made by the vendee at the time of the execution of the written contract for the sale of land. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered upon sustaining a general demurrer. The contract, which is set out as an exhibit to the complaint, was entered into July 31, 1912, for the sale of the "Barry ranch," containing 9,400 acres of land, at the price of $15 per acre. The terms of payment were thus stated:

> "$5,000 to be paid on the execution of this agreement; one-half of the full purchase price to be paid on or before 60 days after the execution of this agreement; balance to be secured by note and mortgage payable on or before 3 years after date; said note and mortgage to be of approved form and with the usual covenants and conditions found in mortgages of real property. The same to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually," etc.

It also provided:

> "It is expressly understood between the parties hereto that the said party of the second part shall at the expiration of 60 days from and after the second payment herein stipulated and agreed to be paid, and provided further that said second party shall have made said first payment as herein agreed and otherwise conformed to said stipulation and agreement, be entitled to enter upon and take possession of said premises and farm the same in a manner pursued for like land; but said party of the second part hereby and herein agrees not to sell, convey, or otherwise incumber the whole or any portion of said land until said deed and mortgage has been executed according to the terms herein and heretofore contained."

The agreement also contained the usual provision that time is of the essence of the agreement, including the following provision, to wit:

> "And the said parties of the first part, on receiving such payments at the time and in the manner above mentioned, agree to execute and deliver to the party of the second part, his administrators or assigns, a good and sufficient deed to the property above described."

Apparently the parties contemplated that upon the making of the 60-day payment, the vendor would execute a deed and the vendee execute a note and mortgage for one-half of the balance of the purchase money. This construction of the contract seems to accord with the conduct of the parties, for, within 60 days from the date of the contract, the vendors furnished the vendee an abstract of title continued to August 12, 1912. On September 17, 1912, the vendee's attorney reported to the vendee his conclusion with reference to the abstract of title, and on or about said date the vendee communicated said report to the vendors with a written demand that the alleged defects therein be corrected. The attorney's report upon the abstract in question, which is set out in full in the complaint, is to the effect that it appeared therefrom that the vendors owned the title in fee to an undivided four-sevenths of most of the property known as the Barry ranch, and that three-sevenths belonged to Mary M. Barry (five-fourteenths) and to John H. Barry (one-fourteenth). Other objections to the title are not clear, in the absence of the abstract, which is referred to in the report. One objection is that the abstract shows that one and one-third acres of land had been deeded to the trustees of the Cottonwood school district. It is alleged in the complaint that the vendors never at any time have corrected or remedied the defects in their title, and that they never have presented a good and merchantable title to said premises, and have never been able to convey to the plaintiff a good and sufficient and merchantable title to said premises, and it is also alleged that the vendors have never performed or offered to perform any of the covenants contained in their agreement or tendered the plaintiff any deed or conveyance to said property. It is further alleged that on June 4, 1913, the vendors delivered to the vendee a notice, set out in the complaint in part, as follows:

> "You are hereby notified that you have forfeited any and all rights which you may hold in and to that certain agreement * * * dated the 31st day of July, 1912, * * * and said parties of the first part therein hereby declare such forfeiture by reason of your noncompliance with the terms and conditions of said agreement, and hereby terminate the same; * * * that subsequent to the service of such notice * * * the plaintiff demanded of the vendors the return to him of the $5,000; which he had paid them;" that the vendors requested of plaintiff time to consider his demand, and particularly to consider the objections which the plaintiff had made to their title to said premises, which request plaintiff granted, and from time to time, at the request of the vendors, extended the time for the vendors to consider plaintiff's demand and the ground of his objection to said title until November 13, 1914, when the vendors, for the first time, notified the plaintiff that they would not return to him the $5,000, or any part of the same.

It is further alleged:

> That the abstract of title was returned by the vendee to the vendors September 17, 1912, and that it was retained by them until July, 1914, "when they caused said abstract to be delivered to William Grant, at San Francisco, who was then and there acting as attorney for plaintiff in an attempt to satisfy Frank Freeman, Esq., who was then and there acting as attorney for the vendors in the premises, that the vendors' title to said land was defective, and that, unless the defects in said title were corrected, the vendors should return to the plaintiff the $5,000 paid to them as aforesaid, but thereafter, to wit, on or about September 1, 1914, said abstract was returned to the vendors, and has at all times since been retained by them, and not in the possession or under the control of this plaintiff; that plaintiff hereby elects to treat said contract as terminated by reason of the vendors' said breach thereof, and the plaintiff hereby offers, upon the return to him by the vendors of said sum of $5,000 with interest from June 4, 1913, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, to reconvey to the vendors, by a good and sufficient written conveyance, any and all interest which this plaintiff may have acquired in or to said premises by reason of the execution of said agreement, and to surrender said agreement to the vendors."

[1-4] The effect of a complete failure and of a defect of title of the vendor upon the relations of vendor and vendee has frequently been considered by the courts of this state. Where there has been no fraudulent misrepresentation as to the vendor's title, the fact that he has an imperfect title, or no title at all, at the time of the execution of the contract of sale, does not invalidate the contract of sale. Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320; Backman v. Park, 157 Cal. 607, 610, 108 Pac. 686, 137 Am. St. Rep. 153; Krotzer v. Clark, 174 Pac. 657; Kerr v. Reed (App.) 179 Pac. 399. "In a case such as this it is permissible for one to contract to convey title to land which he does not own, and he is in default under such contract only when the vendee has performed his part of the contract and made demand for a title which the vendor is unable to furnish." Hanson v. Fox, 155 Cal. 106, 99 Pac. 489, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 338, 132 Am. St. Rep. 72, quoted with approval in Backman v. Park, supra, 157 Cal. 610, 108 Pac. 687, 137 Am. St. Rep. 153. It is sufficient, therefore, if the vendor has good title at the time he is called upon to perform. One-half of the purchase price (inclusive of the initial sum of $5,000) was to be paid 60 days after the execution of the contract. We may assume, as the parties seem to have done, and as we think the contract means, that the vendors were to make the contemplated deed upon such payment of one-half the price. The making of the deed and the payment of that part of the price were therefore dependent and concurrent conditions. In such case, even though time is of the essence of the contract, the vendor cannot put the vendee in default until he has tendered his deed. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290, 297, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126, and cases cited; Sausalito, etc., Co. v. Sausalito Imp. Co., 166 Cal. 308, 136 Pac. 57. It follows that on June 4, 1913, the vendee was not in default for failure to make the payment due 60 days from the date of the contract, and that the attempt to declare a forfeiture on the theory that the vendee was in default was unavailing, and that the contract still remained in full force and effect. Boone v. Templeman, supra, 158 Cal. 298, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126. Under the circumstances the vendors' notice was, in effect, an unauthorized attempt to abandon the contract. It is true that their action was predicated upon the erroneous claim that the vendee was in default for failing to make the 60-day payment. If the vendee, in fact, had been in default, a notice that the contract was terminated would have been proper, and the vendors would be no longer bound either to convey the land or refund the purchase money. Such notice would have been in strict accord with the contract. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 10, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Oursler v. Thatcher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007; Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539, 549, 23 Pac. 363; Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 140 Pac. 283; Myers v. Williams, 173 Cal. 301, 159 Pac. 982. As it was, the vendee immediately upon receiving the vendors' unwarranted notice had the right to treat the same as an abandonment of the contract, and to the return of the installment of the purchase price theretofore paid. Glock v. Howard, supra. The vendee, it is true, delayed his demand for reimbursement, and when made it remained under consideration for some months by the vendors, until November 13, 1914, when they finally refused to make such repayment and failed to go on with the contract. With reference to the long delay of the vendee in making such demand for reimbursement, it is sufficient to say that the vendors requested delay, and that, although the contract was in effect all this time, no effort was made by the vendors to correct the title, or to tender a deed, and they did not withdraw their declaration that the contract was terminated. Hence the legal effect of the demand of the vendee for the return of the purchase money paid was the same as though made at once.

The judgment is reversed.

LEMLE v. BARRY et al. (Sac. 2751.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1919.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser ⚷342 — Contracts of Sale—Abandonment by Vendor—Remedies of Vendee.

Where a vendor has failed to tender a deed under a contract of sale and to correct a defective title, the vendee may sue for damages for breach of the contract, or may sue to recover installments previously made, but cannot have both remedies, the former being based on the contract, and the latter on an abandonment of the contract.

2. Vendor and Purchaser ⚷170 — Contracts of Sale—Default—Necessity for Tender.

In order to put in default the vendor in a contract of sale of land, under which payment of a certain part of the purchase price and delivery of the deed were dependent and concurrent conditions, and in which time was of the essence of the contract, the vendee must tender the purchase money.

Action by Julius Lemle against Mary M. Barry and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Theodore A. Bell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Frank Freeman, of Willow, and Frank L. Hatch, of San Francisco, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. [1] This is an action between the same parties as in Sac. No. 2676, 183 Pac. 148, this day decided. By stipulation of the parties both cases were submitted at the same time and upon the same briefs. In a written stipulation filed by the parties it is stated that the questions involved in the two cases "are identical." In the petition for transfer to this court respondents state that this is the same case as Sac. No. 2676. The appellant, however, claims that in Sac. No. 2676 "he was entitled to recover from the respondents the payment made by him upon the execution of the agreement of July 3, 1912, and in his second action (Sac. No. 2751) to recover damages for breach of said contract," basing his contention upon the same principle of law in both instances. In the transcript on appeal in one case the second amended complaint alone is brought to this court, and in the other the amended complaint. The original complaint is not brought up in the record. It appears, however, from the dates in the two cases that, while both complaints are based in large part upon the same facts, the case now under consideration is a separate and distinct suit in which plaintiff seeks to recover $50,000 damages for the breach of the written contract, more particularly referred to in the opinion this day filed in Sac. No. 2676. The facts alleged in the two complaints are substantially identical, and, so far as necessary, are set out in the above-mentioned opinion, save that in this action for damages it is alleged not only that the plaintiff has fully performed each and every covenant contained in his said agreement by him to be performed, but that he has at all times been ready, willing, and able to pay to the vendors the one-half of the full purchase price of said premises, and to deliver the note and mortgage called for by the contract, and that he has been ready to perform each and every covenant and condition of said agreement by him to be performed in the event that the vendors had corrected, removed, or remedied the defects in their title and were able to convey to the plaintiff a fee-simple title. In lieu of the allegations contained in the action to recover the purchase money, to the effect that the plaintiff had demanded a return of the $5,000, it is alleged in this action that the defendants at all times since June 4, 1913, the date of the service of the notice that the contract was terminated, have failed and refused to correct the defect or to convey or to offer to plaintiff a good, sufficient or merchantable title to said land. As the parties have failed to make any distinction between the two actions or base any claim upon that distinction, it seems unnecessary for us to discuss at any length such differences. It seems to be agreed by the parties that both decisions should be either affirmed or reversed. It should be noted, however, that the remedies in the two cases are quite distinct and wholly inconsistent, and that the plaintiff cannot have both remedies. McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 70, 155 Pac. 460; Elliott on Con. vol. 3, § 2097. The action to recover the purchase money is based upon the theory that by the conduct of the vendors, acquiesced in by the vendee, the contract had been terminated, and the action is in the nature of one for money had and received, namely, money paid to the vendors for which, in view of the termination of the contract, the vendee has received no consideration. This is clearly pointed out in the case of Thomas v. Pacific Beach Co., 115 Cal. 136, 46 Pac. 899, which involved the application of the statute of limitations. It was there held that such an action was not an action upon the contract. See, also, Shively v. Semi-Tropic Land, etc., Co., 99 Cal. 259, 33 Pac. 848; Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320; Aikman v. Sanborn, 52 Pac. 729; Heilig v. Parlin, 134 Cal. 99, 66 Pac. 186. On the contrary, the action for a breach of contract is one based upon the contract. Ahlers v. Smiley, 163 Cal. 200, 124 Pac. 827.

[2] As we have held in Sacramento No. 2676, when the final payment became due it was essential for the vendors to tender a deed in order to put the vendee in default and to enforce a forfeiture. It is also true that it is necessary for the vendee to tender the purchase money in order to put the vendors in default (Townsend v. Tufts, 95 Cal. 257, 261, 30 Pac. 528, 29 Am. St. Rep. 107; Leach v. Rowley, 138 Cal. 709, 716, 72 Pac. 403; Sausalito, etc., Co. v. Sausalito Imp. Co., 166 Cal. 302, 308, 136 Pac. 57), unless such tender was excused under all the circumstances (Merrill v. Merrill, 95 Cal. 334, 30 Pac. 542; Id., 102 Cal. 317, 36 Pac. 675; 38 Cyc. 135).

It is a matter of some doubt, which is not discussed by the parties, whether the general allegations of the complaint sufficiently allege either a tender or a sufficient excuse for a failure to make a tender. See Lynn v. Knob Hill Imp. Co., 177 Cal. 56, 169 Pac. 1009. In view of the fact that the parties concede that both cases should be determined in the same way by reversal or affirmance, and that the plaintiff cannot recover in both cases, and that the recovery in each case would be substantially the same, and that the other case must be reversed for the reasons stated in the opinion, it follows that this judgment should also be reversed.

Judgment reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; MELVIN, J.

SHAW, J. I concur in the judgment. The complaint does not allege that the plaintiff ever tendered to the defendants the one-half of the price that was to be paid upon the execution of the deed. The contract set forth in the complaint shows that the agreement of the defendants to convey the title and that of the plaintiff to pay the first half of the price upon such conveyance were dependent and concurrent covenants. In this respect the case differs from Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, where the payment of the price was made a condition precedent to the right to demand a deed. What is said in that case on the subject must be considered with this difference in mind. But under the contract here involved a tender would be necessary as a condition precedent to the accrual of a cause of action for damages against a vendor for a refusal to convey. This is the cause of action stated in the complaint. Such tender may be rendered unnecessary, however, by the conduct of the vendors, and where this occurs the tender is excused, and the action will lie without it. The question is discussed at length in Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 278. It is there said that, where the vendee "by any adversary steps makes it known that he does not intend to observe and perform his covenant except upon compulsion, thus in effect refusing in advance of a demand, neither law nor equity imposes upon the vendee the observance of a ceremony thus made idle and fruitless." Page 280. In this case the complaint avers that the defendants gave notice to the plaintiff that they had declared the contract rights of plaintiff forfeited and that the contract was terminated. This was notice in advance that they would not perform, and under the rule above stated it absolved the plaintiff from the necessity of making a tender of payment and demand for a deed in order to put the defendants in default and lay a foundation for the action. See, also, 39 Cyc. 1562; Merrill v. Hexter, 52 Or. 138, 94 Pac. 972, 96 Pac. 865; Sharp v. West (D. C.) 150 Fed. 461; 2 Warvelle on Vendors, § 756. For these reasons I believe the complaint stated a good cause of action, and that the court erred in sustaining a demurrer thereto.

It appears from the reference in the opinion of Justice WILBUR to case No. 2676 between the same parties that the plaintiff is at the same time pursuing two remedies against the defendants, based on the same transaction—one to recover the price paid, upon the theory that there has been a rescission or abandonment; the other to recover damages for the breach of the covenant to convey. In view of this fact, it seems proper to say that the two remedies are inconsistent, and that a recovery cannot be allowed in both actions. McGibbon v. Schmidt, 172 Cal. 75, 155 Pac. 460, and cases there cited. When the defendant wrongfully repudiated the contract of sale, the plaintiff had his election, either to consider it rescinded and sue for the part of the price he had paid, or to consider it still in force and sue for damages caused by the breach. When a contract is rescinded, it ceases to exist. If the action to rescind or an action based on an alleged rescission or abandonment is successful, the contract is forever ended, and its covenants cannot thereafter be enforced by any action. If it fails because the alleged rescission did not take place, it has been held that the prosecution of such action does not bar a subsequent action for damages for breach of the contract or to enforce the contract specifically. Zimmerman v. Robinson, 128 Iowa, 72, 102 N. W. 814, 5 Ann. Cas. 960; Harrill v. Davis, 168 Fed. 187, 94 C. C. A. 47, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1153, and note; Bunch v. Grave, 111 Ind. 351, 12 N. E. 514; Clark v. Heath, 101 Me. 530, 64 Atl. 913, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 144, and note. But if the facts exist which justify a rescission by one party, and he exercises his right and declares a rescission in some effectual manner, he terminates the contract, and it cannot thereafter be made the basis of an action for damages caused by a breach of its covenants. The questions that may arise under such a dilemma are not presented upon this appeal; for the record in neither case shows the pendency of the other action, and the court cannot take judicial notice of it. The matter is mentioned in order to call the attention of the parties to the conditions that may arise in the subsequent progress of the two cases.

WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚷171(2)—FLOODING LANDS—DIVERSION OF STREAM—DAMAGES—"FLOOD WATER."

Where defendants, to prevent injury to their land from seasonal waters from a canyon, erected a wooden barrier which turned the waters onto plaintiff's land, they were liable to plaintiff as for a trespass; the rule as to waters which are a common enemy having application only to "flood waters," waters escaping because of their height from confinement in a stream and running over the adjacent county.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Janet Thomson against T. W. La Fetra and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John E. Daly and James H. Daly, both of Long Beach, for appellants.

E. H. Allen and Porter, Morgan & Parrot, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This is an appeal from a judgment upon the judgment roll alone which shows that the defendants maintain a dam which prevents the entrance and flow of certain surface waters upon and across their lands and so diverts these waters that they flow upon the land of the plaintiff.

The lands of the parties to the action are located near the city of Glendora in Los Angeles county. The lands are bounded on the north by a public highway which runs from east to west. The land of the plaintiff is situated several hundred feet to the east of that of the defendants. Some distance to the north are foothills. Seven hundred and fifty feet directly north of the defendants' lands is the mouth of a canyon. Following heavy rains there is a stream in this canyon, and, owing to the grade and to the fact that it follows the east wall of the canyon, this stream is given a southerly direction at the canyon's mouth. It originally proceeded in a southerly and southeasterly direction to a point 400 feet north of the defendants' lands, where, owing to the heavy growth of native vegetation, it became completely diffused. The water continued, however, to follow the slope of the country to the south and southeast toward the lands of the defendants, and some of it reached these lands. None of the water ever reached the plaintiff's land prior to 1915.

In 1900 a wooden flume was built to carry the water from the canyon. The flume was at that time carried no further than the former point of diffusion. The land at this point was cleared of the native vegetation and placed under a state of cultivation. In 1905 or 1906 this wooden flume was extended to the public highway by the upper proprietors, and by the county was continued by means of a culvert under the traveled portion of the highway which bounds the defendants' lands on the north. In 1914 this wooden flume was replaced by one of concrete of somewhat increased dimensions. The latter fact, however, did not materially alter the situation, for the wooden flume was large enough to carry any stream which has ever followed the course described.

Between the years of 1905 or 1906 and 1914 the defendants erected and maintained an earthen dam by which they sought to protect themselves from the water discharged from the flume. This dam was erected on the highway south of the point of discharge from the culvert, but north of the north line of the defendants' property. It appears that in the years 1907, 1911, and 1914, which were the only years between 1905 or 1906 and 1915 in which any appreciable amount of water was carried in the flume, this earthen dam did not prevent the flow of the water over the defendants' lands. In 1914 the defendants replaced the earthen dam with the structure here complained of, a substantial wooden affair 5 feet high and over 300 feet long. This was built without the permission of the county authorities. This structure effectively turned the large volume of water carried by the flume following the heavy rains of 1915 and caused it to flow upon the lands of the plaintiff, where it occasioned the damage complained of.

With these facts as a basis, the plaintiff sought and secured injunctive relief and a judgment in the sum of $329 as damages. The defendants have appealed, contending that the bulk of the water discharged from the flume would never have flowed naturally to their lands, and that the upper proprietors had gained no prescriptive right to have this water carried off by them. With these contentions as a basis, they argue that they had no duty to receive the water which they describe as a "common enemy" to themselves and the plaintiff. They claim the right to repel this so-called "common enemy" by means of the dam in question and assert that any injury which may be occasioned the plaintiff thereby is damnum absque injuria.

The rule applicable to waters which are a "common enemy" cannot be invoked under the facts of this case. That rule has application only to flood waters in the strict sense, that is to say, to waters escaping because of their height from the confinement of a stream and running over the adjacent country. The waters here involved are not of that sort.

The water not being in any sense flood water, the defendants, by changing its course and casting it upon the lands of the plaintiff, were guilty of a trespass. The fact that the water may have threatened injury to the defendants affords no justification or excuse to palliate the wrong done. If the injury threatened to the defendants' lands was the result of wrongful artificial changes made by upper proprietors, resulting in an increased, accelerated, or concentrated flow of water upon and across the lands of the defendants, their remedy was to proceed by appropriate action against the wrongdoers to enjoin such changes or to have the nuisance abated, and not by an attempt to shift the burden of the wrong upon an innocent third party who but for their intervening willful act would have suffered no injury at all. Larrabee v. Cloverdale, 131 Cal. 96, 63 Pac. 143; Castle v. Reeburgh (Okl.) 181 Pac. 297.

The damage suffered by the plaintiff not having resulted from a lawful act, it cannot be considered damnum absque injuria. The view which we have taken of the case makes it unnecessary for us to discuss and decide the plaintiff's contention that the upper proprietors had acquired a prescriptive right to have the water in question carried off over the defendants' lands.

The judgment is affirmed.

THOMPSON v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(L. A. 4913.)

1. PARTIES ⚷95(5)—AMENDMENT OF DEFECTS —MISNOMER OF CORPORATE DEFENDANT.

Where the agent of the real defendant, a corporation, appearing specially, received the summons and knew the contents of the complaint, there was proper service of process, despite a misnomer of defendant, which the court, having acquired jurisdiction of the person of defendant, as well as the subject-matter of the suit, possessed the power to correct.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷296(10) — INSTRUCTIONS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — OBVIOUS DANGERS.

An instruction that it is not contributory negligence for an employé to neglect to investigate conditions as to the safety of appliances, and in such case he assumes only the risk of danger which he has knowledge of, or one so obvious he must know of it, or as to which he has been put upon inquiry by suggestion of danger, and which by gross carelessness he has neglected to notice, held not erroneous, as being too great a limitation on the doctrine of assumption of risk.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷295(7)—INSTRUCTION — ASSUMPTION OF RISK — KNOWLEDGE BY SERVANT OF DANGER.

An instruction that knowledge by an employé of the defective or unsafe character of appliances is not a bar to recovery unless it also appears he understood and appreciated the danger, and thereafter consented to use the appliances, is not erroneous as laying on employer the duty to prove employé's state of mind and the extent of his understanding.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷217(2)—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—KNOWLEDGE.

A servant is deemed to have assumed the risk when he knows, not only the defects in instrumentalities used by him, but the dangers and risks arising therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Paul Thompson against the Southern Pacific Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Henry T. Gage and W. I. Gilbert, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Chas. E. Barrett, of Las Vegas, Nev., and Harry A. Hollzer and L. D. Collings, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff was successful in a suit for damages on account of personal injuries. Defendant appeals from the judgment.

In the complaint filed November 10, 1910, against Southern Pacific Railroad Company, it was alleged that the defendant was "a corporation organized and doing business as a railroad company in the state of California, and under and pursuant to the laws of the state of California." On that day summons was issued, and on November 1, 1911, an alias summons was given in said action. On December 29, 1911, a copy of said alias summons, attached to a copy of the complaint, was served upon F. H. Reed at San Francisco. Mr. Reed at that time was the duly authorized agent (upon whom process might be served in the state of California) of Southern Pacific Company, a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Kentucky. An answer to the complaint was filed on January 18, 1912, by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. On January 27, 1912, Southern Pacific Company, appearing especially for the purposes of the motion, gave notice of intention to move to quash the alias summons served on Mr. Reed and to set aside pretended service upon the grounds, among others, that said summons had not been regularly issued, and that said Southern Pacific Company was not a party to the action. This motion was heard and denied on February 19, 1912.

On December 10, 1914, plaintiff served and filed his notice of motion for leave to amend his complaint by striking out the word "Railroad" wherever it appeared as a part of the name of defendant. The motion was made upon the ground that the true name of defendant was "Southern Pacific Company" instead of "Southern Pacific Railroad Company," and on the further ground that Southern Pacific Company had been properly served and had appeared in the action. On December 12, 1914, Southern Pacific Company served and filed its notice of objections and answer to said motion to amend plaintiff's complaint, pleading, among other things, that it was organized under the laws of Kentucky, and denying that it had any corporate connection whatsoever with the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. There was also an averment that plaintiff's alleged cause of action (which was based upon physical injuries received on November 12, 1909) was barred by the statute of limitations. This answer was accompanied by certain affidavits. One of these was made by D. P. Ewing. In it he deposed that he was assistant secretary of Southern Pacific Railroad Company, defendant in the action, which was a corporation formed under the general laws of California, Arizona, and New Mexico, and that he was not an officer of Southern Pacific Company, a Kentucky corporation. T. O. Edwards deposed that he was assistant secretary of Southern Pacific Company, a corporation created by the laws of Kentucky; that said corporation had not been served with process, and that said Southern Pacific Company was a "different, separate, and distinct corporation from the above-named Southern Pacific Railroad Company, the defendant in the above-entitled action." Plaintiff's motion for leave to amend was heard, Southern Pacific Company appearing in opposition thereto, and on December 16, 1914, leave to amend the complaint was granted by the court. On December 18, 1914, the amended complaint, naming Southern Pacific Company, a corporation (but without specifying its principal place of business), as the defendant, was filed.

On December 28, 1914, Southern Pacific Company, still reserving its special appearance theretofore made in opposition to the motion for leave to amend the complaint, filed its answer, in which objection was still made to the jurisdiction of the court.

The cause was thereafter tried, and a verdict was rendered, which was set aside. Upon the calling of the case for trial the second time, Southern Pacific Company made formal objection to the introduction of testimony upon the grounds that, upon the face of the record it appeared that within one year after the accident Southern Pacific Railroad Company had been sued; and had duly answered; and that after five years following the accident the Southern Pacific Company, a Kentucky corporation, had been brought into the case by the expedient of amending the complaint, the said amendment having been made "without process ever having been served upon the Southern Pacific Company."

Respondent insists that there is no record to support the history of the controversy over the pleadings, and that as all intendments are in favor of the correctness of the orders of the superior court, they must stand. It appears that the two orders attacked by appellant were made each by a different judge. Another judge, the Hon. Louis W. Myers, who presided at the second trial of the cause, authenticated the entire record sought to be here used. As the two judges who presided at the hearings of appellant's motions were on the superior bench when the appeal was taken and the record prepared, respondent insists that no bill of exceptions embodying the supposed proceedings before them should be recognized and used by this court unless each authenticated that part of it relating to the motion which he heard. In support of this position they cite such authorities as Cummings v. Conlan, 66 Cal. 403, 5 Pac. 796, 903, Turner v. Hearst, 115 Cal. 394, 47 Pac. 129, Muzzy v. McEwen Lumber Co., 154 Cal. 685, 98 Pac. 1062, and Waymire v. California Trona Co., 176 Cal. 395, 168 Pac. 563.

[1] It is unnecessary to decide at this time the interesting question raised by respondent, because, assuming that the record is properly authenticated, it fully supports the orders attacked by appellant. The case upon which appellant relies principally for support of its assertion that it was brought into court without service of process is Altpeter v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., 26 Cal. App. 705, 148 Pac. 241. There is, however, a wide and essential difference between that case and the one at bar. In that case no representative of the corporation against which plaintiff had a cause of action was ever served with summons. In this case the real defendant's agent received the summons and knew the contents of the complaint because the corporation appeared specially in the action. True, there was a misnomer of the party defendant in the pleading, but the court having acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, as well as the subject-matter of the suit, possessed the power to correct the misnomer. This case on the point under discussion is essentially identical with and is ruled by Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 436, 83 Pac. 1077. Commenting upon that authority in the case of Reclamation District, etc., v. Diepenbrock, 168 Cal. 577, 143 Pac. 763, this court used the following language:

> "In Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 441, 83 Pac. 1077, the authorities are discussed and the rule approved which sanctions an amendment to correct a mistake in pleading the corporate name of a party to an action. With the conclusions reached by the District Court of Appeal in that case we fully agree, and we find no error in the action of the court in the case before us, permitting the amendment."

The record reveals the following facts: Plaintiff, who was a painter, had been employed by defendant for a period of about three months before the occurrence of the injury to him. He was sent out to paint a semaphore near a station. He had never before been required to paint an entire semaphore. Opposite the station, not on a main track, but on a "house track," stood a box car, which was also near the semaphore. After painting a part of the semaphore from the ladder attached to the semaphore pole, and being unable, as he testified, to reach the other part of the semaphore from this ladder, plaintiff, with the assistance of another employé of defendant from whom he had formerly taken orders, procured from the platform a ladder, which was placed on top of the box car with the upper end against the semaphore pole. From this ladder plaintiff continued his work. Both the tower man (who signaled all trains and adjusted switches) and the station agent knew that plaintiff was then at work. While he was so engaged one of defendant's freight trains came in on the main track and stopped. Plaintiff was in plain view of the train crew, yet a car was uncoupled from the freight train and sent down the "house track" against a line of cars upon one of which rested the ladder on which plaintiff stood. As a result plaintiff was hurled to the ground and seriously hurt.

[2] Defendant attacks some of the instructions, among others the following:

> "It is the duty of the master to provide reasonably safe and suitable appliances with or upon which his employé is to work. As to those things and appliances which it becomes the master's duty to furnish, the servant, or employé, has the right to assume that the master has done his duty, and that the appliances are reasonably safe and secure, and it is not contributory negligence for an employé to neglect to investigate and examine the conditions as to the safety of the appliances. In such a case the employé is held only to have assumed the risk of a danger of which he had knowledge, or the risk of a danger which was so obvious that he must have known of it, or of one as to which he had been put upon inquiry by discovery or suggestion of danger, and which by gross carelessness he has neglected to take notice of."

The last sentence of the instruction comes particularly under defendant's condemnation as being too great a limitation upon the doctrine of assumption of risk. Virtually the same language will be found in the opinion in Silveira v. Iversen, 128 Cal. 187–192, 60 Pac. 687.

[3, 4] Another instruction was as follows:

> "Knowledge by the employé of the defective or unsafe character or condition of any ways, appliances, or structures of his employer is not a bar to recovery for any injury caused thereby, unless it shall also appear from a preponderance of the evidence that such employé fully understood, comprehended, and appreciated the dangers incident to the use of such defective ways, appliances, or structures, and thereafter consented to use the same or continued in the use thereof."

It is asserted that this instruction entirely reverses the rule regarding "burden of proof," and lays upon defendant the duty of proving the state of plaintiff's mind and the extent of his understanding. The criticism is not well taken. The instruction merely states a well-known rule that a servant is deemed to have assumed a risk when he knows, not only the defects in the instrumentalities used by him, but the dangers and risks arising by reason of such defects. Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609–618, 55 Pac. 425; Pigeon v. Fuller, 156 Cal. 691, 105 Pac. 976. In this case plaintiff must have known that he would almost certainly be injured if a car should be sent down against the cars on the "house track." But it was for the jury to determine whether or not he knew that there was any imminence of the use of that track for switching at that time and under the existing circumstances.

Two other instructions offered by defendant were given with modifications based upon the principles discussed above. The court committed no error in making the changes to which defendant objects. The charge to the jury was full and fair.

Defendant's motion for nonsuit was properly denied.

The judgment is affirmed.

BENNETT et al. v. POTTER. (L. A. 4946.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 30, 1919. Rehearing Denied Aug. 28, 1919.)

1. Partition 🔑114(6)—Attorney's Fees.

Code Civ. Proc. § 796, contemplates that allowances for attorney's fees in a partition proceeding be made to the party, and not directly to the attorneys.

2. Attorney and Client 🔑144—Compensation—Construction of Contract.

In view of Civ. Code, §§ 1647, 1654, 1638, as to interpretation of contracts, under a contract between attorneys and client relating to attorney's compensation in action to partition land and for an accounting, providing that attorneys "shall receive as their compensation 10 per cent. of whatever is recovered, either by litigation or settlement, excepting that if the court makes an allowance for an attorney's fee in said partition suit or other suits then such fee shall belong to said law firm, exclusive of the said 10 per cent. so to be paid by" the client, the attorneys were not entitled to 10 per cent. of the land set apart to the client in addition to a fee allowed, but were only entitled to such fee, as far as the partition suit was concerned, and 10 per cent. of the amount recovered in the accounting.

3. Partition 🔑95—"Recover."

The land set off to one party in a simple partition suit to sever the unity of title and segregate the possession is not "recovered" by such party, partition in such case merely transforming the right of common possession of the whole tract into a right to the exclusive possession of the same interest or share as represented by a parcel set off in severalty.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Recover.]

4. Account Stated 🔑4—Mode of Stating and Settling.

An account stated may be shown by proof of an oral agreement as to the amount due, although no writing is exhibited at the time.

5. Contracts 🔑238(2)—Modification—"Account Stated"—"Executory Contract."

An account stated is a mere unperformed promise to pay a stated sum to another, and is therefore an executory contract, under Civ. Code, § 1661, and hence an oral statement of account cannot be shown to alter a written contract, under section 1698.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account Stated; Executory Contract.]

6. Account Stated 🔑1—Theory.

The theory upon which an action of account stated is allowed is that transactions have occurred between parties from which the relation of debtor and creditor has arisen, that one or both have rendered or made statements specifying definitely the amount due on account thereof, and thereupon there has been an agreement, express or implied, by the one who is the debtor, to the other, that a sum is due from him on such account, together with express or implied promise to pay the same.

7. Account Stated 🔑1—Number of Items.

Originally an account stated could exist only when the accounts were mutual, or where there was more than a single item, but it has now become settled there can be an account stated where but a single item is included or referred to therein.

8. Account Stated 🔑7—Written Promises—Oral Statements.

Account stated cannot become a substitute for an action of debt upon a written promise in writing, the written promise being a higher evidence of the debt, and the debtor being already bound thereby, and there being no uncertainty to be settled which would constitute a consideration for a new oral promise to pay.

9. Contracts 🔑47—Consideration.

There must always be a consideration to support a valid promise.

10. Account Stated ⚿3—Previous Transactions.

There can be no account stated where there have been no previous transactions between the parties from which the relation of debtor and creditor could arise.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nichol, Judge.

Action by Edmon Gordon Bennett and others against Howard J. Potter. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

William M. Hiatt and Irwin, Smith & Rosecrans, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Hugh Kelley and Bennett, Turnbull & Thompson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The complaint is in four counts. The only controversy concerns the first and the third counts, each of which covered the same demand. The plaintiffs were attorneys at law and partners in the practice of law. The defendant was the owner as tenant in common with S. W. Slinkard and Laura Slinkard, his wife, of 160 acres of land and certain crops and other personal property used on the land in connection with its cultivation, the defendant having eleven-sixteenths interest therein and the Slinkards five-sixteenths interest. In July, 1914, he employed the plaintiffs, as attorneys, to prosecute actions for the partition of the land and the division of the property and for an accounting between himself and the Slinkards respecting their transactions as tenants in common of the land. The contract of employment was in writing. The plaintiffs began two actions, one for partition, the other for an accounting, and prosecuted the same to a final determination. The first count of the complaint states a cause of action on the written contract aforesaid, claiming $2,750 as the amount due thereon. The third count alleges that on April 6, 1915, an account was stated between the parties embracing the services in the two actions, whereby the sum of $2,750 was found to be due from the defendant to the plaintiffs, which sum remained unpaid. The decision of the case depends upon the meaning and effect of the aforesaid contract. It will be necessary to set out the important parts thereof in full.

It recited that the defendant and the Slinkards were the owners of the land and the personal property thereon as tenants in common, and stated their respective interests therein, and that the defendant desired to employ the plaintiffs "to prosecute on his behalf a suit for a partition of the said property, to the end that his interest in the said property may be set aside and segregated from that of the said S. W. Slinkard and his wife, and to secure his interests in the personal property, improvements, etc., and also to bring suit for an accounting between himself and S. W. Slinkard and his wife, to the end that he may recover, or it may be determined just what his interests are in the profit and income from the property since he purchased the $^{11}/_{16}$ interest on September 25, 1913." It then proceeded to state an agreement that plaintiffs should proceed with such litigation as they deemed necessary, and prosecute the same to a conclusion or settlement to the satisfaction of Potter. With reference to the liability of Potter to plaintiffs for the services the agreement was as follows:

> "It is understood and agreed that the said law firm will advance the necessary expenses and other costs and shall receive as their compensation ten (10) per cent. of whatever is recovered, either by litigation or settlement, excepting that if the court makes an allowance for an attorney's fee in said partition suit or other suits then such fee shall belong to the said law firm, exclusive of the said ten (10%) per cent. so to be paid by the party of the first part."

[1] The court found that in the partition suit the court had allowed to Potter, plaintiff therein, the sum of $1,000 as attorney's fees. This is inaccurate. The judgment in that suit was introduced in evidence, and it shows that the court allowed $1,000 to Bennett, Turnbull & Thompson, as attorneys for Potter, declaring the same to be a lien on the land awarded to Potter, and $500 to the attorneys for the Slinkards, and declared the same a lien on the land awarded to them. The allowance was made directly to the attorneys and not, as the law contemplates, to the parties. Code Civ. Proc. § 796.

1. As to the first count, the findings in the case at bar were to the effect that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover of Potter the sum of $2,750 on account of the services rendered in pursuance of the written contract. Of this sum $1,750 was allowed as 10 per cent. on the value of the land set off to Potter and $1,000 on account of the fee allowed in the partition suit. The findings declare that the meaning of the contract of employment is "that as compensation for such services said plaintiffs were to receive 10 per cent. of whatever was allowed or recovered by said litigation or settlement thereof; and in addition thereto, to receive any attorney's fees allowed to the defendant, Howard J. Potter, in such litigation."

[2] We cannot agree with this interpretation. The provisions of the contract regarding compensation are uncertain and ambiguous. Such a contract "may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates" (Civ. Code, § 1647); it is to be "interpreted most strongly against the party who caused the uncertainty to exist" (Civ. Code, § 1654); and the language does not of necessity govern its interpretation if it involves an absurdity (Civ. Code, § 1638). The contract was drawn by the plaintiff, Bennett. Hence it is to be interpreted most strongly against the plaintiffs. This rule is accentuated by the fact that the plaintiffs were attorneys at law and presumably familiar with legal terms and proceedings, and accustomed to the use of language appropriate to the framing of contracts, while the defendant was a business man, with no special knowledge of, or familiarity with, these subjects.

The partition suit was solely for the partition of the land. The judgment therein was for a partition in kind, setting off a certain parcel thereof in severalty to Potter and the remainder in severalty to the Slinkards. The complaint in the action for an accounting set forth the ownership of the land in common by the parties, that they had been farming the same together for the common benefit, their respective interests in the profits and the personal property in use being the same as in the land, as above stated; that Potter had expended certain sums of money in the enterprise; that the Slinkards had received profits therefrom for which they had failed to pay or account to Potter; and prayed that an account be taken, that the personal property be divided between the parties according to their interests, and that judgment be given to Potter for the amount found due him. Some alfalfa hay was divided between them by an agreement made while the action was pending, and is not mentioned in the judgment. The other personal property was sold by them and taken into the account. The judgment was for $375 in favor of Potter. The complaint in the case at bar contains no allegations relating to the value of the services in obtaining the division of the hay.

The attorney's fee allowed in the partition suit was based on the allegation of the complaint in that action "that $2,000 is a reasonable counsel fee for the services rendered and to be rendered herein." It is to be presumed that the amount allowed was considered by the court to be the full value of the services rendered, the more especially since an additional amount was allowed to other attorneys for services to the Slinkards. We must also presume that the provision of the contract that the plaintiffs should have "ten per cent. of whatever is recovered" was considered by the parties to be full compensation, so far as it applied to the particular suit, for all services to be rendered by plaintiffs as attorneys in that action, if, as might be the case, no attorney's fee was allowed therein. An interpretation which would give them both, as that of the court below does, would involve the absurdity of giving them twice the value of the service rendered. Such construction cannot be allowed if any other reasonable interpretation can be found. Under section 1638, aforesaid, the language which is supposed to declare the absurdity does not necessarily "govern its interpretation." The two provisions should therefore be held not to be cumulative with respect to the partition suit.

[3] Furthermore, the language itself does not warrant the court's interpretation. Its conclusion was that the phrase "ten per cent. of whatever is recovered" means "ten per cent. of the value of whatever is recovered." But the contract does not mention value. It was 10 per cent. of the thing itself that the plaintiffs were to receive. If we assume that the land set off to a party in an action for partition is "recovered" by him, then plaintiffs would be entitled to a one-tenth interest in Potter's share of the land, and they could not maintain an action for the value thereof. Moreover, there was no issue in the partition suit, as to the title to the land, or as to the respective interests therein. It was a simple suit to sever the unity of title and segregate the possession. The land set off to one party in a partition suit of that character is not "recovered" by him. A simple partition does not change the title, nor transfer it from one to the other, nor return or restore to either party anything lost by him, or of which he had been deprived. It merely transforms the right of common possession of the whole tract into a right to the exclusive possession of the same interest or share, as represented by the parcel set off to him in severalty. He thereafter holds in severalty that interest which he previously held in undivided form. He does not recover the segregated parcel, nor even the possession thereof, but keeps such possession, and thereafter excludes the other tenants from that parcel. Christy v. Spring Valley W. W., 68 Cal. 75, 8 Pac. 849; Richardson v. Loupe, 80 Cal. 503, 22 Pac. 227; Cunha v. Hughes, 122 Cal. 113, 54 Pac. 535, 68 Am. St. Rep. 27; Rose v. Mesmer, 142 Cal. 328, 75 Pac. 905; Freeman on Cotenancy, § 529. The only reasonable conclusion is that the two provisions are not cumulative, but are alternative, and that the intention was to substitute the allowed fee, if any, in the partition suit, as compensation for the services therein, instead of the 10 per cent. specified in the first part of the compensation clause of the contract. This is emphasized by the succeeding phrase, "exclusive of the ten per cent. so to be paid by the party of the first part." The word "paid" is significant. The 10 per cent. of the property set off to Potter could not be said to be paid, in any sense of the word. But with respect to 10 per cent. of any money that might be recovered or obtained on the accounting, it would be in accordance with ordinary usage to say that it would be paid to the plaintiffs by Potter. The giving of the fee to be allowed in the partition suit to plaintiffs was not intended as compensation for their services in the other litigation. The meaning is that the receipt of the fee so allowed should not exclude the attorneys from receiving 10 per cent. upon the amount obtained in the accounting. This we believe to be the correct interpretation of the contract. It does not authorize a judgment which includes more than $1,000 for the services in the partition suit.

It may be noted here that the money recovered in the accounting suit did not cover the alfalfa hay on the farm. It was divided by agreement, and the plaintiffs, under the contract, were entitled to 10 per cent. thereof. But the complaint needs amendment in order to present clearly and specifically the claim for that part of the compensation.

2. The court also found that there had been an account stated between the plaintiffs and the defendant, as alleged in the complaint, and that it was thereby ascertained and agreed that defendant was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $2,750 on account of the services rendered by them to Potter under the contract aforesaid. We think this finding is not supported by sufficient evidence.

The evidence does not show that any account was kept in writing, or that any written statement of account was ever presented or delivered to the defendant, or agreed to or acquiesced in by him. The finding is based exclusively on the testimony of the plaintiff, Turnbull, relating a conversation he says he had with Potter on the 6th of April, 1915, shortly after the judgments were given in the two actions.

[4] It has been held by this court that an account stated may be shown by proof of an oral agreement as to the amount due, although no writing is exhibited at the time. Converse v. Scott, 137 Cal. 239, 70 Pac. 13. The decision states the rule to be that such would be the case even if no written evidence of the account had ever existed. See, also, 1 Corpus Juris, p. 682, § 256. Somewhat in conflict with this is the case of Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 556, 37 Pac. 504, where the court said:

> "An account stated is a document—a writing—which exhibits the state of the accounts between the parties and the balance owing from one to the other."

In Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 574, 150 Pac. 994, and again in Merchants' Natl. Bank v. Carmichael, 173 Pac. 999, this court quoted the above passage from Coffee v. Williams with approval. But neither of these cases involved the question whether or not the account as stated must exist in writing. Converse v. Scott has not been overruled on this point, and we may assume it to be correct.

Turnbull testified that in the conversation with Potter they agreed that the value of the land set off to Potter in the suit should be fixed at $17,500 "for the purpose of fixing the percentage." The only testimony that tended to show an account stated was given on cross-examination. He said, "I did not make any statement to him that we would charge him any amount." He added that after Potter had assented to the proposal to fix the value of the ranch at $17,500 he said to Potter:

> " 'That makes $2,750 for those two cases.' We didn't have any words about it at all. We arrived at a figure of $2,750—$1,750 on the basis of 10 per cent. of $17,500, plus $1,000, which the court had agreed should be allowed to us, and at that time he gave us a check for $200 and told us he expected $1,500 from his ore shipment and would pay up the balance as soon as he could."

Potter denied that any such conversation occurred at any time, and he said that the $200 was paid because Turnbull told him the firm had been under heavy expenses, that their fees were not coming in, and that they needed some money; that the first knowledge he had that plaintiffs proposed to charge 10 per cent. of the value in addition to the $1,000 was on the day before this action against him was begun, and that he then vigorously objected to the double charge. But as the finding was against defendant we can consider only the testimony of Turnbull.

[5] We have already seen that the contract did not allow the plaintiffs double compensation for the services in the partition suit, or more therefor than the fee of $1,000 therein allowed. For the services in the accounting suit the contract fixed the sum of $37.50 (10 per cent. of $375.00) as compensation. The testimony shows that the value of the personal property divided was not considered or fixed. Even if it had been valued, the value would be immaterial, for the contract gave plaintiffs no right to 10 per cent. of its value, but only 10 per cent. in kind for that service. The result is that if the oral account stated is good, it would have the effect of materially altering the written contract in these particulars, and it would practically double the amount which plaintiffs would be entitled to recover for the services thereunder. An account stated is a mere unperformed promise by one party to pay a stated sum to another, and it is therefore an executory contract. (Civ. Code, § 1661;

Pearsall v. Henry, 153 Cal. 325, 95 Pac. 154, 159. To allow a written contract to be thus altered by an oral statement of account, or by any statement not agreed to in writing by the debtor, would violate the rule of the Code that "a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise." Civ. Code, § 1698. This effectually cuts off any such claim in this case. Other reasons now to be stated lead to the same result.

[6, 7] The theory upon which the action on an account stated is allowed is that transactions have occurred between the parties from which the relation of debtor and creditor has arisen, that thereafter one or both have rendered or made statements or declarations specifying definitely the amount due on account thereof, and thereupon there has been an agreement, express or implied, by the one who is the debtor, to the other, that a certain sum is due from him on such account, together with an express or implied promise to pay the same. The action is based on the promise to pay, thus established; and, if it is not expressly made, facts from which such promise will be implied must be proven. Originally, an account stated could exist only where the accounts were mutual, or where there was more than a single item, but in the course of time it became settled that there could be an account stated where but a single item was included or referred to therein. 136 Am. St. Rep. 42, note.

[8-10] It was not every debt that could form the basis of such account stated or such action. It could not become a substitute for an action of debt upon a specialty, such as a promissory note or a bond for money. In such cases no subsequent statement of the amount due thereon, although agreed to by the payor, could supersede the special promise so as to form the basis of an action as upon an account stated to recover the original debt. Young v. Hill, 67 N. Y. 174, 23 Am. Rep. 99. The action in such a case must be upon the original promise in writing, and not upon account stated. The written promise being higher evidence of the debt, and the debtor being already bound thereby, there could be no necessity for a resort to a subsequent statement and promise to pay as the foundation of an action therefor. Moreover, the debtor being already completely bound for a specified sum, there is no element of uncertainty to be settled, and no difficulty in ascertaining the balance upon conflicting claims which could constitute a consideration for a new oral promise to pay, and therefore such promise would be a nudum pactum. There must always be a consideration to support a valid promise. From this the further rule follows that there can be no account stated where there have been no previous transactions between the parties from which the relation of debtor and creditor could arise. "It may not be made the instrument to per se create a liability where none before existed." Austin v. Wilson, 11 N. Y. Supp. 566; Stimson Mill Co. v. Hughes Mfg. Co., 8 Cal. App. 561, 97 Pac. 322. The case last cited is a good illustration of the proposition just stated. The plaintiff there had sold lumber and delivered it to one Coffey, and, claiming that it was really sold to the defendant, had thereafter rendered accounts therefor to the defendant as the debtor therefor, which defendant had kept for a long time without making any objection thereto, or any denial of its liability therefor, thus raising the inference that it acquiesced therein. In fact the lumber had been sold to Coffey and not to defendant, and defendant was in no wise liable therefor, unless upon account stated by reason of acquiescence in the aforesaid statements rendered to it. The court held that such "itemized statements could not be made to create an indebtedness." As an illustration of the proposition first stated there is the case of Jasper Tr. Co. v. Lampkin, 162 Ala. 388, 50 South. 337, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1237, also reported in 136 Am. St. Rep. at page 33. Plaintiff held certain promissory notes of the defendant, and long after they had become due had sent to defendant written statements of the amounts due thereon for principal and accrued interest, and the defendant had assented to the accuracy of the amounts stated. We quote from the decision at length:

> "At an early day in England it was held that where a debt was evidenced by an instrument under seal, a recovery could not be had in an action of assumpsit. One reason seems to be that there is no consideration for the new promise, because the party is already bound by a higher evidence of debt to pay, and the court says: 'There must be at least some additional consideration, such as items, for instance, foreign to the articles of agreement, introduced into the account and included within the promise, in order to take the claim founded upon it out of the operation of the agreement or contract under seal; otherwise, the plaintiffs below must be confined to their action of covenant, founded upon the articles of agreement, for the recovery of their claim.' Gilson v. Stewart, 7 Watts (Pa.) 100. It was also decided that, 'where a sum of money is secured by a deed, and a balance is struck for the purpose of ascertaining how much remains due thereon, and the obligor admits the correctness of the account and promises to pay it, debt or simple contract on an account stated will not lie, but the action must be brought on the specialty,' the court saying: 'The defendant is charged with nothing but the money secured by the deed. There is no consideration for the suggested new liability, except the ascertaining how much remains due on the deed. It is a perversion of language to speak of this as an account stated.

It is merely a process adopted for the purpose of ascertaining how much of the original debt has been discharged, and all which is really done is to make out to what extent the defendant remains liable upon the deed.' Middleditch v. Ellis, 2 Ex. 623."

(The case of Middleditch v. Ellis will be found in 2 Welsby, H. & G. 623, and in 154 Eng. Rep. 640. The word "deed" may mislead the reader who has not the report at hand. What is meant is that the plaintiff held a bond, or note, for the payment of money, secured by a mortgage in the form of a deed.)

The above authorities do not depend on the ancient technical distinctions between the common-law forms of actions. They are, as the reasoning shows, founded on the fundamental difference between a mere promise to pay an existing debt made upon no new consideration and a promise to pay it which is founded upon a new consideration such as further forbearance, to which the creditor binds himself by accepting this new promise or by some other valid agreement, or a new promise which has the effect of merging the original obligation and in effect extinguishing it as a living contract. They are clearly applicable to the case at bar, so far as it depends on the alleged account stated. In the first place there was no liability from Potter to the plaintiffs for the services in the partition suit, except for the sum of $1,000. That was ascertained and established by the original written contract. In so far as the so-called account stated attempted to enlarge this liability by the addition thereto of another item consisting of the 10 per cent. upon the value of the land segregated thereby, an item not mentioned in the contract, it would, if enforced, operate to "create a liability where none before existed," which, as the authorities state, cannot be done by means of an account stated. In so far as the oral account stated purported to bind Potter to pay more than the sum of $1,000 for the services in the partition suit, it was based on no new consideration whatever. There was no promise to pay 10 per cent. of the value of the segregated land, and hence no necessity for coming to an agreement as to the value for the purpose of fixing the percentage. Therefore that process could not be a consideration for the new promise. No other consideration could possibly have existed, and consequently the new promise claimed upon the account stated is a nudum pactum and unenforceable, except for the services other than those rendered in the suit for partition.

For these reasons we are of the opinion that the judgment was erroneous.

The judgment is reversed.

In re CARRAGHAR'S ESTATE. (Sac. 2938.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 8, 1919.)

1. HOMESTEAD 🔑84—PROBATE HOMESTEAD—PROPERTY OWNED JOINTLY.

A probate homestead cannot be created or set apart from property owned by the husband or wife and a third party as tenants in common or joint tenants.

2. HOMESTEAD 🔑3—STATUTES 🔑167(2) — ADOPTION OF CODES—ABROGATION OF STATUTE.

St. 1867–68, p. 116, relating to homesteads, and providing that a party entitled, if in exclusive occupation, should have his right though the land was held in joint tenancy, tenancy in common, etc., was abrogated by the adoption of the Codes January 1, 1873.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Edward James Carraghar, deceased. From an order denying the petition of decedent's surviving wife for a probate homestead, she appeals. Order affirmed.

R. Platnauer, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Aram & Carraghar, of Sacramento, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by the surviving wife of deceased from an order denying her petition for a probate homestead out of the only real property owned by the deceased at the time of his death, which was an undivided half of a lot in the city of Sacramento, and was his separate property. The other undivided one-half of said lot was owned by one Buckman. In the year 1898 deceased constructed a dwelling house on this land. From the year 1899 to the death of deceased in 1917, the premises were occupied by deceased and his wife as their residence, and during all said time deceased had said premises inclosed, and, with his wife, was in exclusive occupation thereof. The learned judge of the lower court concluded that in view of the decisions of this court a homestead could not be set apart from this property so owned by the deceased as a tenant in common with another person, and therefore denied the application.

[1] Whatever we might think if the question were a new one in this state, it is clear that the general rule to the effect that a homestead cannot be created or set apart from property owned by the husband or wife and a third party as tenants in common or joint tenants is too thoroughly established by a long line of decisions, commencing with Wolf v. Fleischacker, 5 Cal. 244, 63 Am. Dec. 121, and running down practically to this time, to permit us now to hold otherwise. Most of these decisions were discussed in the comparatively recent case of Schoonover v. Birnbaum, 148 Cal. 548, 83 Pac. 999 (decided in January, 1906), in which it was sought to have the prior decisions on the question overruled, and where we felt compelled to say that "without expressing any opinion concerning the soundness or unsoundness of the decisions in question, we are of the opinion that they should be adhered to, leaving it to the Legislature to extend the right of the homestead to cotenants if it shall see fit." This conclusion was reached in view of the rule of stare decisis, especially with regard to the rules of law upon the subject of titles to real estate. More than 13 years have passed since that decision without any legislative action in the respect referred to, and, of course, what was there said applies now with much more force than it did in 1906. Since the decision in Schoonover v. Birnbaum, supra, this general rule has been fully recognized in United States, etc., Co. v. Bell, 153 Cal. 781, 96 Pac. 901, Swan v. Walden, 156 Cal. 195, 103 Pac. 931, 134 Am. St. Rep. 118, 20 Ann. Cas. 194, and Estate of Davidson, 159 Cal. 98, 115 Pac. 49. In Swan v. Walden, supra, a case of a homestead selected by the wife during the lifetime of the parties, the homestead was upheld although the property was held in joint tenancy, but this was because the only joint tenants were the husband and wife, and the wife's selection was of the whole property, and the wife had the power under the law to declare a homestead upon the husband's separate property as well as upon her own property. As to this situation the court said:

> "The homestead thus attempted to be declared is upon land, all of which is susceptible at the instance of the wife of having the homestead characteristics impressed upon it. There is no occasion for segregation or partition or delimitation of boundaries, since the homestead attaches to all of the estate and all of the land. The reasons which, in the view of this court, made it legally impossible for the husband to declare such a homestead when there was a cotenancy between himself, his wife, or third persons does not exist in the peculiar instance of the case at bar."

See, also, In re Bailard, 173 Pac. 170. As we have seen in the case at bar the other tenant in common is a third party. The reason expressed for the rule enunciated by our decisions, as stated in Estate of Davidson, 159 Cal. 98, 101, 115 Pac. 49, 50, is that "on account of the nature of the tenancy, there can be no segregation or delimitation of the boundaries of the particular estate, or interest in the property of the cotenancy sought to be impressed whereby it can be determined as to what particular part of the land the homestead attaches." In Estate of Davidson, supra, it was sought by the surviving wife to have set apart as a probate homestead the deceased husband's undivided half of the property on which they resided at the time of his death, the wife being the owner of the other undivided half, and it was held by the same justices who participated in Swan v. Walden, supra, that, in view of the rule of our decisions, the husband's undivided one-half could not be selected as a probate homestead.

[2] Appellant's principal claim is that she is entitled to have her husband's undivided half of this property set apart as a homestead by virtue of the provisions of an act entitled "An Act Relating to Homesteads," adopted by the Legislature in the year 1868 (Stats. 1867-68, p. 116). It is probable, as was said in Swan v. Walden, supra, that this act was adopted to modify the rule of decision in this very matter. It substantially provided that whenever a party entitled to a homestead under the laws of the state is in exclusive occupation of any particular tract of land, having the same inclosed, and shall select and record and reside upon the same as a homestead, he shall be entitled to the same to the extent of his interest in the property, "although such land be held in joint tenancy, or tenancy in common, or such claimant own only an undivided interest." It may be assumed that if this act is still in force, appellant is entitled to have her deceased husband's interest set apart as a homestead, for it was held under this act in Higgins et al. v. Higgins et al., 46 Cal. 259, that the wife could select as a homestead the undivided interest of her husband in property exclusively occupied by him, to the exclusion of all other cotenants. But we do not see how it may reasonably be held that the act survived the going into effect of our Codes on January 1, 1873. The question whether this particular act was repealed by the Codes has never been determined or even discussed by this court, though the act was referred to in passing in both Swan v. Walden, supra, and Estate of Davidson, supra. The act does not appear to have been mentioned in either Estate of Carriger, 107 Cal. 618, 40 Pac. 1032, or Rosenthal v. Merced Bank, 110 Cal. 198, 42 Pac. 640, cases involving attempted selections since the Codes took effect. In each of these cases the right to a homestead was denied by the court, although, so far as we can see, the facts were such as to make the act of 1868 applicable, if still in force. The uniform course of our decisions on this matter has been the same since the adoption of the Codes as it was prior to the adoption of the act of 1868. We say this much simply for the purpose of showing that this court has never recognized the act of 1868 as surviving the taking effect of the Codes. When enacted in 1872 our Civil Code provided, as it still provides, as follows:

> "No statute, law, or rule is continued in force because it is consistent with the provisions of this Code on the same subject; but in all cases provided for by this Code, all statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed or abrogated. * * *" Section 20. A similar provision was contained in our Code of Civil Procedure. Section 18.

There is no claim that the act of 1868 was expressly continued in force. In title 5 of part 4 of division second of the Civil Code (sections 1237 to 1269), which was entitled "Homestead," and chapter 5, title 11, of part 3 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as originally enacted in 1872, was contained what clearly appears to have been intended as a complete and comprehensive system of laws on the subjects of homesteads. What a homestead consisted of, how and from what it might be selected, when and to what extent it was subject to execution or forced sale, how it might be conveyed, incumbered, or abandoned, its value, the rights of parties in the matter of probate homesteads and the manner of setting the same apart—all these things were fully covered by the Code provisions. In other words, the whole matter of homesteads was one of the "cases provided for by" the Codes. The rule embodied in section 20, Civil Code, and section 18, Code of Civil Procedure, is the statement of a well-settled principle applicable in considering the effect of revisory statutes. As was said in Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372:

> "Whenever it becomes apparent that a later statute is revisory of the entire matter of an earlier statute, and is designed as a substitute for it, the later statute will prevail, and the earlier statute will be held to have been superseded, even though there be found no inconsistencies or repugnancies between the two. Frequently, these cases arise where the latter statute covering the whole subject-matter omits or fails to mention certain terms or requirements found in an earlier, and it is insisted, as here, that those particular provisions of the earlier statute should be held to be still in force. But, as is said by the Supreme Court of the United States in Murdoch v. Mayor, etc., 20 Wall. 590 [22 L. Ed. 429], * * * 'It will be perceived by this statement that there is no repeal by positive new enactments inconsistent in terms with the old law. It is the words that are wholly omitted in the new statute which constitute the important feature in the questions thus propounded for discussion. * * * A careful comparison of these two sections can leave no doubt that it was the intention of Congress by the latter statute to revise the entire matter to which they both had reference, to make such changes in the law as it stood as they thought best, and to substitute their will in that regard entirely for the old law upon the subject. We are of opinion that it was their intention to make a new law so far as the present law differed from the former, and that the new law, embracing all that was intended to be preserved of the old, omitted what was not so intended, because complete in itself, and repealed all other law on the subject embraced within it. The authorities on this subject are clear and uniform.'"

See, also, Sponogle v. Curnow, 136 Cal. 580, 584, 69 Pac. 255; State v. Conkling, 19 Cal. 501. Our Codes, of course, were intended as complete revisions of the existing laws upon the subjects embraced therein. That was the main purpose of their enactment. And section 20, Civil Code, and section 18, Code of Civil Procedure, were enacted for the very purpose of putting it beyond the realm of possible dispute that existing statutes on subjects covered by the Codes, whether consistent or not with the provisions of the Codes on the same subject, were abrogated, unless expressly continued in force. True it is that there is no express provision in the Codes purporting to provide for the particular contingencies provided for by the act of 1868. But what we have quoted from Mack v. Jastro, supra, fully answers the claim based on this situation. The act of 1868 was one of the existing acts on the general subject of homesteads, the provisions of which the Legislature, in making the revision of the entire law on the subject, must be held to have intended to abrogate. We are satisfied that it must be held that this act was abrogated by the adoption of the Codes.

The cases cited by learned counsel on this point are not opposed to our conclusions. None of them involved any act upon a subject as to which, as here, an apparently complete revision was attempted by the Codes, and all were decided upon the theory that the act involved was regarding a subject in no way treated in any of the Codes. Here, as we have seen, we have in the Codes as enacted an apparently complete and comprehensive revision of the law on the subject of homesteads, and the fact that the Legislature did not include therein provisions for the selection of a homestead where the circumstances were as specified in the act of 1868 does not render the latter act one as to a "case" not "provided for" by the Code.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; WILBUR, J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; MELVIN, J.

OLNEY, J. (concurring). I concur, but solely on the ground that the question is now determined by the previous decisions of this court. If it were not for those decisions I believe the rule should be that a homestead may be imposed in the instances provided by the statute regardless of the character of the title of the homestead claimant or his or her spouse, the homestead, of course, affecting only the interests of the claimant or spouse, whatever those interests may be. The only requirement of the statute in this resepct is that the claimant be residing upon the premises, and to require more than this and make the validity of the homestead dependent upon the character of the interests affected is without statutory warrant, and contrary to the object of the statute. The injustice, I think, is manifest in the present case. It is now too late, however, for this court to reverse its previous decisions, for such reversal would necessarily be retroactive in effect, and would destroy interests and rights acquired in reliance upon the existing decisions. It is hardly necessary to say that this objection would not lie to a change made by the Legislature, which, of course, would operate only in futuro.

SAM KEE v. WILDE, City Clerk.

HOP WAH v. SAME.

(Civ. 2890.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 10, 1919.)

Municipal Corporations 🔑600 — Police Regulations — Laundries — Restricted Districts.

Los Angeles Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series), a residence district ordinance, and No. 26555 (New Series), providing that in order to establish an industrial district within a residence district it is necessary to get a petition signed by property owners, etc., are constitutional and apply to laundries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Proceedings in mandamus by Sam Kee and Hop Wah against Charles L. Wilde, City Clerk of the City of Los Angeles. From judgments in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., Charles S. Burnell, Asst. City Atty., and Wm. P. Mealey, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Dian R. Gardner, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

THOMAS, J. These appeals are from judgments of the superior court of Los Angeles county on the judgment rolls alone, ordering that peremptory writs of mandate issue commanding the city clerk of the city of Los Angeles to prepare and issue to the respective petitioners a license to conduct a laundry within the portion of the city set apart as a residence district. The issues are the same in both cases, and the pleadings, findings, and judgment are identical, save as to the name of the petitioner and the street address of his laundry. By stipulation, it is agreed that these two cases "may be presented, heard, and determined upon the same transcript and brief." The judgment roll, accordingly, has been omitted from the transcript in the Hop Wah Case.

The appellant has stated the case so well in his brief that we feel that we can do no better than to adopt his language as our statement of the case. This we do. It appears from the record before us that—

"The petition avers that respondent Charles L. Wilde is the city clerk, A. B. Conrad the city tax and license collector, and John S. Myers the city auditor of the city of Los Angeles, and their respective duties as prescribed by the charter are set forth. It is alleged that the petitioner is the lessee of a building at No. 241 North Figueroa street (in the Hop Wah case petitioner's laundry was located in the same neighborhood), and is conducting a laundry therein, and that up to November 30, 1915, he paid the city a license of $5 per month. The petition then sets forth section 3 of Ordinance No. 20000 (New Series), known as the license ordinance, providing that it shall be the city clerk's duty to prepare and issue licenses to persons liable under said ordinance to pay licenses, and to deliver said licenses to the auditor who shall sign and deliver them to the tax collector for collection. Section 81 of the same ordinance is also set forth; that section imposing a license of $5 per month on persons conducting a laundry business. It then alleged that on December 1, 1915, petitioner tendered the tax collector $5 for a license under said ordinance; that the tax collector refused to accept the money for the reason that the license had not been prepared and issued by the clerk; and that a few days later petitioner demanded of the clerk that he prepare, issue, and deliver to the auditor such license, and that the clerk refused so to do, whereupon petitioner again tendered $5 to the tax collector, who refused to accept it, whereupon petitioner deposited the same, in the name of the tax collector, in a reputable bank, immediately notifying the tax collector thereof, and upon the same day again demanded of the clerk that he prepare and issue a license to carry on the laundry business aforesaid, which the clerk refused to do. It is also alleged that the petitioner is beneficially interested in securing the license and is entitled to have it issued, and that he has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy in the ordinary course of the law.

"By amendment to the petition it is alleged that on December 15, 1912, the city council adopted Ordinance No. 25555 (New Series), entitled 'An ordinance prescribing the method of making and filing petitions for the establishing of industrial districts' (hereinafter called the 'petition ordinance'), which ordinance is set forth in full; and that after this ordinance became effective the city council adopted various ordinances creating industrial districts, which ordinances number 25 in the aggregate, and that all of them were adopted after a petition had been filed with the city council in accordance with said Ordinance No. 26555 (New Series), and that no industrial districts have been created during said time except upon such petitions. It is further alleged that petitioner prepared a petition under said Ordinance No. 26555 (New Series) to have the lot upon which his business is located established as an industrial district, but he was unable to secure the signatures of the owners of the necessary proportion of the property fronting on the opposite side of the street, or of a majority frontage in the block.

"The respondent in his answer denied that the petitioner was entitled to have a license issued, and set up the adoption, on June 7, 1911, of Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series), which ordinance establishes a residence district and regulates and prohibits the conducting and maintaining of works and factories where power other than animal power is used within the boundaries of said district, and referred to the various amendments thereto; said ordinance, together with amendatory Ordinance No. 33393 (New Series), being attached to the answer as Exhibits A and B, respectively. Said Ordinance No. 33393 (New Series) merely amends the residence district ordinance by excepting from the residence district those portions of the city which have become annexed thereto subsequent to January 1, 1915. The residence district ordinance, as amended, establishes all of the city as a residence district, except (a) that portion included within fire district No. 1, (b) those portions included within the boundaries of such industrial districts as are or may hereafter be established as such by ordinances, (c) the portion of the city lying south of Manchester avenue, and (d) all territory annexed since January 1, 1915.

"The answer also sets forth Ordinance No. 19901 (New Series), entitled 'An ordinance fixing and establishing fire districts of the city of Los Angeles,' as amended. It is further alleged that the city council has from time to time adopted various ordinances excepting certain specified portions of the city from the residence district established by Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series); 103 ordinances having been adopted excepting from the residence district portions of the territory embraced therein. It is next alleged that petitioner's laundry is not within fire district No. 1, nor within the boundaries of any industrial district, nor within any portion of the city lying south of Manchester avenue or added to the city by annexation subsequent to January 1, 1915, but that it is within the residence district, and that the respondent refuses to prepare and issue a license for the petitioner, for the reason that under the provisions of the residence ordinance it is unlawful to maintain a laundry within said residence district.

"It is further denied that the petitioner ever prepared a petition under Ordinance No. 26555 (New Series), or otherwise, to have the lot on which his business is located established as an industrial district, and that he had endeavored to secure the signature of property owners to such, or any petition, or that any of them have refused to sign same.

"The first 15 findings of the court are identical in language with the allegations of the complaint. Finding No. 16 is identical in language with paragraph XV of the complaint, as added by amendment, while finding No. 17 is identical with paragraph XVI of the complaint; finding No. 18 is the same as paragraph II of the answer, except that Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series), as amended, including the amendments contained in Ordinance No. 33393 (New Series), is set forth in full as a part of the finding. Finding No. 19 is identical with paragraph IV of the answer; finding No. 20 is identical with the first half of paragraph IV of the answer, alleging the adoption of various ordinances excepting certain portions of the city from the residence district established by Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series); while finding No. 21 is that 65 of the 103 ordinances set out in paragraph V of the answer were passed only upon petitions prepared in accordance with section 6 of Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series), and subsequent to the adoption of the residence district ordinance. Finding No. 22 is that the petitioner's laundry is not within fire district No. 1, nor within the boundaries of any industrial district established by ordinance, nor within that portion of the city lying south of Manchester avenue, nor within any portion of the city annexed thereto subsequent to January 1, 1915. The court failed altogether to find upon the issue made by paragraph XVII of the complaint, and by the answer, namely, as to whether or not the petitioner prepared and endeavored to obtain signatures to a petition to have the lot upon which his laundry is conducted declared an industrial district.

"As conclusions of law the court finds that the residence district ordinance, Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series), as amended, is void and unconstitutional so far as it affects laundries; and also that the petition ordinance, Ordinance No. 26555 (New Series), is void and unconstitutional in so far as it affects laundries; and that the petitioner is entitled to a license, and that respondent has failed to show cause why he has not issued the same.

"From the above it will appear that there is no controversy whatsoever as to the facts, except with respect to the one issue upon which the court has failed to find.

"Appellant, contends that the residence district ordinance is valid and constitutional, and that under it the petitioner was prohibited from conducting a laundry, and that he, as city clerk, properly refused to prepare and issue a license for the conducting, at a specified locality, of a business the conducting of which was prohibited within that portion of the city wherein it was sought to conduct the laundry."

The principal question presented, therefore, is the sufficiency of Ordinance No. 22798 (New Series), the residence district ordinance, and No. 26555 (New Series), the petition ordinance, of the city of Los Angeles, in their application to petitioners.

The contention here was, and the court so found, that these ordinances are, and each of them "is, void and unconstitutional, and of no force and effect, so far as the same applies, affects, or tends to affect laundries or the laundry business."

No service of value could, we think, be rendered by a discussion of the various ordinances set out in the pleadings and findings of the court, nor even by setting forth here in extenso the particular ordinances under consideration, as we are of the opinion that the question here presented has been so thoroughly settled in this state that we shall not burden the record nor impose upon the profession the hardship of reading any discussion by us of this case. There is such a wealth of decisions from all over the United States, many of them discussed at great length, presenting exhaustive, thorough, and able arguments, and covering, we think, the identical question here presented, that we content ourselves by simply citing a few of them. The constitutionality of ordinances such as, or similar to, those here involved, has, we think, been upheld by the courts in the following cases: Ex parte Hadacheck, 165 Cal. 416, 132 Pac. 584, L. R. A. 1916B, 1248; In the Matter of Montgomery, 163 Cal. 457, 125 Pac. 1070, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 130; Ex parte Quong Wo, 161 Cal. 220, 118 Pac. 714; San Luis Obispo County v. Greenberg, 120 Cal. 300, 52 Pac. 797; Ex parte Haskell, 112 Cal. 412, 44 Pac. 725, 32 L. R. A. 527; Ex parte Lacey, 108 Cal. 326, 41 Pac. 411, 38 L. R. A. 640, 49 Am. St. Rep. 93; San Luis Obispo v. Pettit, 87 Cal. 499, 25 Pac. 694; Ex parte Christensen, 85 Cal. 208, 24 Pac. 747; Ex parte Moynier, 65 Cal. 33, 2 Pac. 728; Laurelle v. Bush, 17 Cal. App. 409, 119 Pac. 953; Goytiño v. McAleer, 4 Cal. App. 655, 88 Pac. 991; Hadacheck v. Sebastian, 239 U. S. 394, 36 Sup. Ct. 143, 60 L. Ed. 348, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 927; Soon Hing v. Crowley, 113 U. S. 703, 5 Sup. Ct. 730, 28 L. Ed. 1145; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 5 Sup. Ct. 357, 28 L. Ed. 923.

In view, therefore, of this fact, we are unable to agree with the learned trial judge in his conclusions, and hence we hold the said ordinances valid and constitutional; that the appellant, accordingly, very properly refused to issue a license to respondents; and that, from the record before us, he has shown good cause why a writ of mandate should not issue. No other point presented need be considered.

The judgments are reversed.

LOMPOC PRODUCE & REAL ESTATE CO. v. BROWNE. (Civ. 2752.)

1. SALES 🔑409—BREACH OF CONTRACT—TIME FOR SUIT.

Where defendant seller refused to perform a contract for sale of a bean crop, plaintiff buyer had an immediate right of action, although time for delivering the crop had not arrived.

2. SALES 🔑418(2)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

In buyer's action for breach of contract for sale of a bean crop, the market value of the beans at time of breach is the proper measure of damages.

3. SALES 🔑196—CONTRACT—WAIVER.

Any breach by plaintiff buyer of a contract provision requiring him to purchase seed for defendant seller was waived, as a matter of law, where defendant retained a partial payment and kept the contract open for his own benefit for six months, without complaint regarding the alleged breach.

4. SALES 🔑413—BREACH—WAIVER.

Where defendant seller claimed plaintiff buyer had breached a sales contract, plaintiff may show that defendant's own testimony established a waiver of the alleged breach, although waiver was not pleaded, since any variance could not have surprised defendant and might be cured by amending complaint to conform to proof.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1039(13)—HARMLESS ERROR—VARIANCE.

A variance between allegation and proof will not be prejudicial error, where, if complaint had been amended to meet the proof, the result would have been the same.

6. SALES 🔑182(3)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—WAIVER.

While waiver of a sales contract breach is a mixed question of law and fact, yet, when but one inference can be drawn from the facts, it is not error for the court to charge that these facts constitute a waiver.

7. TRIAL 🔑62(3) — REBUTTAL EVIDENCE — CONTRACTS—WAIVER.

Where defendant seller's own testimony showed he had waived an alleged breach of the sales contract by plaintiff buyer, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing defendant permission to rebut claim of waiver, when permission was sought after defendant had rested and plaintiff's motion to withdraw issue regarding its breach of contract from jury had been granted.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

Action by the Lompoc Produce & Real Estate Company against Maxwell Browne. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. F. Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant.

Oscar Samuels, of San Francisco, and Chas. B. Rosendale, of Salinas, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $16,505.36 damages for the alleged breach of a contract for the sale of a crop of beans. The court directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, leaving to them the determination of the amount of the damages. The contract is in writing, and was entered into upon February 13, 1917. It provides that the defendant shall grow for the plaintiff certain quantities and varieties of beans at a specified price. It acknowledges receipt by the defendant of $2,000 to apply upon the purchase price of the beans, and also provides that the conditions printed on the back thereof are a part of the contract. Among those conditions is one to the effect that the plaintiff agrees to furnish the defendant sufficient seed for the crop bargained for, said seed to be selected by the defendant, and for the seed furnished by the plaintiff the defendant agrees to return with the crop an equal amount, without charge, as the equivalent of the seed furnished. The contract provides that a certain price was to be paid for beans delivered to the defendant on or before October 1, 1917, and a different price was to be paid for beans delivered after October 1, 1917. It is also provided that delivery should be made on or before November 1, 1917. On October 18, 1917, defendant wrote to the plaintiff refusing to perform the contract and returning the $2,000 advanced to him thereunder. The plaintiff brought this action on October 25, 1917.

[1, 2] The defendant demurred to the complaint and urged as one ground of demurrer that the action was prematurely instituted because delivery was to be made on or before November 1, 1917, and the suit was brought before that time. This point was also urged upon the motion for a nonsuit made at the conclusion of plaintiff's proof. We believe this point is not well taken. The complaint set out the contract, and alleged that on October 18th the defendant had renounced the contract and refused to be bound by it or to deliver to plaintiff any portion of the crop, and that at said time a portion of the crop, approximately 200,000 pounds, was sacked and ready for delivery, and that, the balance was lying on the ground ready for sacking and delivery. We think that the absolute refusal of the defendant to perform conferred upon the plaintiff an immediate right of action. Garberino v. Roberts, 109 Cal. 126, 128, 41 Pac. 857; Stum v. Hadrich, 7 Cal. App. 242, 244, 94 Pac. 82; Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953; Central Trust Co. of Illinois v. Chicago Auditorium Ass'n, 240 U. S. 581, 36 Sup. Ct. 412, 60 L. Ed. 811, L. R. A. 1917B, 580; Cabrera v. Payne, 10 Cal. App. 675, 678, 103 Pac. 176. The market value of the beans at the time of the breach was a proper measure of damages. Masterson v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 7 Hill (N. Y.) 61, 42 Am. Dec. 38, quoted with approval in Hale v. Trout, 35 Cal. 229, at page 243; Roehm v. Horst, 178 U. S. 1, at page 21, 20 Sup. Ct. 780, 44 L. Ed. 953.

[3] The plaintiff alleged complete performance by it of all the conditions of the contract by it to be performed. In regard to the provision in the contract that the plaintiff should furnish seed to the defendant, which seed should be selected by the defendant, the plaintiff proved that no seed had been selected by the defendant, and no request for any seed or for the privilege of selecting any seed had been made by the defendant to any authorized agent of the plaintiff company. The defendant denied that the plaintiff had performed its part of the contract, and introduced certain testimony of the defendant to the effect that he had selected certain seed from samples in the possession of one Grannas, who, it was claimed by defendant was ostensibly acting for the plaintiff company, and that defendant had requested Grannas to furnish such seed and that Grannas had refused because of the high cost of the same. But by his own testimony defendant also put in evidence facts which clearly indicate a waiver of this condition concerning the seed, even though we concede that the testimony established an ostensible agency in Grannas to act for the plaintiff company. Plaintiff, thereupon, at the close of defendant's case, made a motion to withdraw from the jury the issue of plaintiff's alleged breach of the seed provision, and upon this motion plaintiff urged that, even though it be conceded that the seed provision had been breached, yet it appeared from the defendant's own testimony that he had waived that breach. We emphasize the fact that it was upon defendant's own testimony that plaintiff asked for a directed verdict. This motion was granted and a verdict for plaintiff was directed. It appeared from the defendant's testimony that he had arranged for the purchase of certain seed known as the Soares seed from Mr. Soares before he made the contract with the plaintiff for the sale of his crop; that he mentioned this fact to Grannas, who, he claims, was acting for the plaintiff company; that later, after Soares had sold his seed to the plaintiff company, and they in turn had disposed of all of it, and after the contract between plaintiff and defendant had been entered into, the defendant asked Grannas for this Soares seed and was told that it had all been sold. He then selected other seed, a sample of which Mr. Grannas had in his office, which seed was known as the Santos seed, and which, it developed, was grown on the same land and was a part of the same crop as the Soares seed. Grannas then told him this seed was held at too high a price and that he could not buy it, and asked the defendant to try to purchase it himself. The defendant made no objection to doing this, but replied, "All right," and proceeded to purchase it. He never asked for reimbursement from the plaintiff for the amount he paid for the seed, and never objected that it had not fulfilled its contract in this regard, and did not return the $2,000 advanced to him under the contract until October 18, 1917, approximately the time fixed for the performance of the contract, when he attempted to repudiate it because of this alleged breach. On several occasions after he had purchased the seed he met representatives of the plaintiff company and allowed them to go over the ranch and inspect the crop, but he never at any time indicated to them that he considered the plaintiff had breached its contract in any respect or that the contract was not in full force and effect. Even if it be conceded that a breach of the contract by the plaintiff occurred in April, 1917, the defendant would not have been permitted to have retained the consideration paid him and to have kept the contract open for his own benefit for six months, making no demand or complaint, and permitting the plaintiff to believe that he was going to comply therewith, and then, at the last moment, when the price of beans had advanced, repudiate the contract. The evidence of the defendant, without contradiction, indicates a waiver of this condition.

[4, 5] The defendant and appellant objects that the verdict and judgment were obtained upon an issue of waiver, and that, as no waiver was pleaded, the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment upon this issue when the pleadings alleged performance by the plaintiff and not a waiver by the defendant. While we have not been cited to any case involving this precise question of pleading in relation to waiver, a similar question has arisen in certain cases involving the pleading of an estoppel. In the case of Blood v. La Serena L. & W. Co., 113 Cal. at page 229, 41 Pac. 1017, 45 Pac. 252, it is said that had the plaintiff under the circumstances been called upon to rely upon an estoppel in order to maintain his action against defendant at all, it would have been necessary, of course, for him so to have pleaded. But such was not his cause of action, for he successfully made out a prima facie case, and might, without pleading it, use the evidence in estoppel to prevent the corporation from maintaining what, as against its acts, would be an injust and unwarranted defense. In the case of Donnelly v. S. F. Bridge Co., 117 Cal. 417, at page 422, 49 Pac. 559, at page 560, it is said: "* * * A party is not bound to plead an estoppel where he is without knowledge that his demand must ultimately rest upon it."

In the present case the plaintiff alleged and relied upon performance. It made out a prima facie case. The authority of Grannas, from whom it is asserted defendant selected and requested the seed, rested only upon an ostensible agency. It was not shown that he was the agent of the plaintiff in fact, but plaintiff throughout the trial denied his authority and objected to proof of any dealings with him by the defendant. The plaintiff, therefore, in its main case, relied upon the fact that the defendant had not selected seed from any of its authorized agents, and therefore there was no breach of the condition to furnish seed. The defendant met this by proof which, for the purpose of this discussion, let us concede established an ostensible agency of Grannas to act for the plaintiff company, and then showed that he selected and requested seed from Grannas. The plaintiff, while denying the authority of Grannas to act for it in this matter, may rely upon the defendant's testimony and take advantage of the waiver proven by it, even though such waiver may not have been pleaded.

Furthermore, the defendant could not have been surprised or injured by this variance between the pleadings and proof, because the evidence concerning waiver was largely his own testimony. He may not complain that his own testimony is construed most strongly against him, and he cannot be damaged by a consideration of the facts which he himself has admitted. If it be true that there is a variance between the allegations and the facts shown, then it is apparent that defendant could not have been prejudiced by the variance, because if the complaint had been amended to conform to the proof the result would have been the same, and no good would result from sending the case back for a new trial, as it is apparent that the result would necessarily be the same, under the evidence of the defendant himself. It is said in the case of Foster v. Carr, 135 Cal. 83, 67 Pac. 43, that even where there is a variance such as ordinarily would be ground for reversal, yet if there is no dispute about the facts, and the evidence could not be varied upon a new trial, there is no prejudicial error which requires a reversal of the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 469. A judgment will not be reversed or a new trial granted for mere error when it clearly appears that the appellant has sustained no injury therefrom. Edwards v. Wagner, 121 Cal. 376, 53 Pac. 821.

[6] Appellant also contends that the alleged waiver by defendant should have been submitted to the jury as a question of fact, and that the directed verdict was therefore improper. While waiver is a mixed question of law and fact, when, however, but one inference can be drawn from the facts, it is not error for the court to charge the jury that these facts constitute waiver. 40 Cyc. 270; Spring Garden etc. Ins. Co. v. Evans, 9 Md. 1, 66 Am. Dec. 308, 315. The uncontroverted evidence before the court in the present case was such that it would have been the duty of the court to set a contrary verdict aside as unsupported by the evidence. A directed verdict was therefore proper. Estate of Baldwin, 162 Cal. 471, 123 Pac. 267; Meyer v. Lovdal, 6 Cal. App. 369, 92 Pac. 322; Bunt v. Sierra Buttes Gold Min. Co. (C. C.) 11 Sawy. 178, 24 Fed. 847.

[7] The trial court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to permit the defendant to offer additional testimony to rebut the claim of waiver. After the defendant had rested his case and the plaintiff had made a motion for the withdrawal of the issue of breach of the contract by the defendant from the jury, and after the court had granted that motion, the defendant asked leave to introduce further testimony to rebut the waiver which was shown by the defendant's own testimony. The court denied the application upon the ground that there was no showing made that such application could not have been made sooner and before the court had decided the matter. Apart from this objection, this is not a case of a refusal to permit a party to introduce evidence to overcome the testimony of the opposing party. All the testimony upon the subject of waiver was given by the appellant himself. He cannot claim to have been surprised by his own testimony, and should not object to its being given full credence. He should not be permitted to attempt to contradict it.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTERN CALIFORNIA LAND CO. v. WELCH et al. (Civ. 2892.)

1. Appeal and Error 🔑499(3) — Bill of Exceptions — Specifications of Error — Necessity.

Although a bill of exceptions does not attack insufficiency of evidence to sustain the findings and judgment, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 648, no specifications are necessary to enable the reviewing court to consider errors of law in the rulings of the trial court on defendant's objection to the introduction of evidence, motion to strike them from the record, and for nonsuit on the ground of irrelevancy and immateriality, in the absence of proper foundation.

2. Ejectment 🔑86(1)—Evidence—Presumption of Title and Right of Possession.

Actual possession establishes presumption of title and right to possession in an ejectment suit which can only be overcome by proof of anterior possession or title from a paramount source.

3. Appeal and Error 🔑907(4)—Review—Presumption on Appeal — Burden of Showing Error.

The law will presume, where the extent and nature of the evidence in an ejectment suit is not sufficiently set forth in the bill of exceptions to show the contrary, that there was competent and sufficient evidence before the court to sustain its rulings and findings.

4. Trial 🔑412, 414, 419—Rulings on Motion to Strike—Evidence.

Where, after adverse rulings on objections to evidence, motion to strike and for a nonsuit, defendants proceed with the case and introduce evidence which supplies the defects in plaintiff's proof, the erroneous rulings of the trial court are cured.

5. Appeal and Error 🔑907(2)—Review—Presumption on Appeal.

Where plaintiffs in an ejectment suit offered a deed in evidence which was objected to as being irrelevant, and defendants introduced another deed without disclosing its contents in the bill of exceptions, it will, on appeal, be presumed that such deed, if its terms were shown, establishes a foundation for plaintiff's claim.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Ejectment by the Western California Land Company against Benjamin P. Welch and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James R. Jaffray, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Gray, Barker & Bowen and Donald Barker, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an action in ejectment. The complaint alleges plaintiff's ownership and right to possession of the land in question, and that defendants were wrongfully in possession and withholding it from plaintiff. The answer of the defendants denies plaintiff's claim of ownership or right of possession, and alleges that defendants are in the rightful possession. The findings support the allegations of the complaint, and judgment was for plaintiff. Defendants appeal on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

While the bill of exceptions contains a statement to the effect that all the evidence introduced on the trial is set forth therein, it affirmatively appears on the face of the bill that it does not contain all of the evidence. So far as the evidence on plaintiff's part is concerned, the bill of exceptions is as follows:

"Plaintiff offered in evidence a deed from the Title & Guaranty Company to plaintiff, Western California Land Company, dated December 11, 1915. (Here set out so much of said deed as is necessary to the action). Plaintiff offered a decree of this court in case No. B-29782, In Matter of Voluntary Dissolution of the Los Angeles Title & Trust Company, entered and docketed Nov. 4, 1915. (Here set out so much of said decree as may be necessary to the action) Plaintiff rests."

"Defendants objected to each and every part of such offered evidence on the ground that the same was and is irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial, and without foundation, which objection was overruled by the court, and the evidence admitted. Defendant then moved the court to strike out each and every part thereof, on the same grounds as objected to, which motion was overruled by the court. Defendant then moved the court to grant a nonsuit in this case on the ground that no evidence had been produced by defendant, or admitted in evidence, tending in any way to support all or any of the issues in favor of the plaintiff, which motion was denied by the court."

If defendants had rested their case at this point we would be justified in reversing the judgment.

[1] It is true, as respondent urges, that this bill of exceptions contains no specification of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment, as is required by Section 648 of the Code of Civil Procedure and numerous decisions of the Supreme and appellate courts of this state, where the findings are attacked for insufficiency of evidence; but no such specifications are necessary to enable the court to consider on this appeal errors of law in the rulings of the trial court on defendant's objections to the introduction of these documents, their motion to strike them from the record, and for nonsuit on the ground of irrelevancy and immateriality of the evidence in the absence of proper foundation. Smith v. Smith, 119 Cal. 183, 48 Pac. 730, 51 Pac. 183; Barfield v. South Side Irrigation District, 111 Cal. 118, 43 Pac. 406; Harper v. Gordon, 128 Cal. 489, 61 Pac. 84.

[2] Notwithstanding the fact that the bill of exceptions fails to set forth, as therein suggested, the contents or substance of the deed and decree introduced by the plaintiff, it is difficult to conceive of anything these documents could have contained which, in the absence of a chain of conveyances or other basis of title by way of foundation, would show title or right of possession in the plaintiff as against the presumption of right and title in defendants arising from their actual and admitted possession at the time of the commencement of the action. There is no more firmly established rule of evidence than that actual possession establishes presumption of title and right to possession, which can only be overcome by proof of anterior possession or title from a paramount source. Hawxhurst v. Lander, 28 Cal. 331; Morris v. Clarkin, 156 Cal. 16, 103 Pac. 180; Civil Code, § 1006. It is unnecessary to review the long list of authorities submitted by appellants to sustain this proposition. Plaintiff's deed from the Title Guaranty & Trust Company, no matter what its terms, in the absence of a showing that the Title Guaranty & Trust Company had title to convey, was entirely irrelevant and immaterial; and a decree in the matter of the dissolution of the Los Angeles Title & Trust Company, an apparent stranger to the title to this property, was equally ineffective, no matter what its recitals. So far as appears from the record of plaintiff's side of the case, the defendants' objection and motions should have been sustained.

[3] But we find, however, in the record of defendants' bill of exceptions that the defendants introduced in evidence a deed from the Los Angeles Title & Trust Company to plaintiff's grantor, the Title Guaranty & Trust Company, antedating the deed to plaintiff. The contents of this instrument are not set out. It does not even appear whether it was a deed to the land in question. Nothing, however, appears to the contrary. It may have contained recitals as to grantor's source of title that would estop defendants from claiming against it. This deed was put in evidence by defendants, and they would be bound by its recitals. The law will presume, where the extent and nature of the evidence is not sufficiently set forth in the bill of exceptions to show the contrary, that there was competent and sufficient evidence before the court to sustain its rulings and findings. The burden is upon appellant to affirmatively show, by production of all the evidence on the point, that the ruling or finding was erroneous.

[4] If, after the adverse rulings on their objection and motions to strike and for a nonsuit, the defendants proceeded with the case and introduced evidence which supplied the defects in plaintiff's proof, the erroneous rulings of the court are cured. Robinson v. Nevada Bank, 81 Cal. 106, 22 Pac. 478; Russell v. Pacific Can Co., 116 Cal. 527, 530, 48 Pac. 616.

[5] The introduction of this deed by defendants, without disclosing its contents in the bill of exceptions, opens up a field for presumption which will support any conjecture as to its terms that might reasonably be made, and which would, if shown, establish a foundation for plaintiff's claim. Doubtless the failure to include the terms of these various instruments in the engrossed bill of exceptions was the result of an oversight, but, in the absence of any suggestion for the diminution of the record, the appeal must be determined by the record as it is presented.

Judgment affirmed.

Action by Frank M. Arnold against the California Portland Cement Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Shankland, R. H. McHargue, and Gurney E. Newlin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank B. Daley, Daley & Byrne, and Frank T. Bates, all of San Bernardino, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action for damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff in a dynamite explosion at defendant's plant, near the town of Colton, while plaintiff was in defendant's employ as a "powder man." The accident occurred May 9, 1909. This was prior to certain recent legislation enlarging the responsibility of employers for injuries to employés. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, upon the verdict of a jury, defendant appeals. The case was before the Supreme Court on a former appeal (161 Cal. 522, 119 Pac. 913), where a previous judgment for plaintiff was reversed by that court upon the ground of error in the admission of certain evidence.

The gravamen of the action is that defendant negligently furnished for plaintiff's use an electric battery that was too weak to explode the dynamite in nine holes that he was directed by his foreman to explode in the process of "springing the holes," that is, preparing them to receive the charges of black powder. The nine holes were connected by wire in a series. Plaintiff attempted to explode all of them at one time by a single discharge of the electric current from the battery. The battery failed to explode at least one of the holes. The failure to explode all the holes could not be detected from surface indications. For some reason, perhaps because he suspected that some of the holes had failed to explode, plaintiff, immediately after his attempt to explode the nine holes at once, connected each hole separately with the battery, turning on the current each time. The connection so made separately with each hole caused no explosion. From this plaintiff concluded that all the charges had exploded with the first discharge of the current from the battery. Thereupon he commenced to drill the holes with a heavy steel drill for the purpose of cleaning them out and preparing them to receive the heavy black powder. He made no further examination, and took no precaution of any kind against any accident that might occur if it should turn out that the dynamite in some one or more of the holes had failed to explode the first time. While drilling in one of the holes, either the third or the fourth in the series, the dynamite that he had placed therein, and which had failed to explode when the current from the battery was turned on, exploded, and the injuries of which he complains were thus sustained. The battery had been used for several months, and at times had failed to discharge a blast when connected with but a single hole. Plaintiff had been at work for the defendant for about four months. He knew the battery was not new, and also, from his experience, that such a battery, which is but a mechanism for generating an electric current, gets weaker with use.

Inasmuch as the case must be reversed because of the misconduct of plaintiff's counsel while examining the jury panel upon their voir dire, we do not find it necessary to make a more extended statement of the facts. It will suffice to refer to the facts as stated in the opinion on the first appeal. In their essential aspects the facts brought out at the first trial do not differ materially from those adduced at the second trial.

Whether respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in assuming that the nine blasts were exploded by the first discharge of the electric current from the battery, and in failing to use any precautions against possible injury in the event that all the charges were not thus exploded, is a very close question. It is also a nice question as to whether the failure of the charge to explode when the current was turned on was due to weakness of the battery or to respondent's own negligence in failing properly to connect the wires from the battery with the charge of dynamite. We are not entirely satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict. If it is, the margin is very slight indeed. However, since the case must be sent back for a new trial because of the error above suggested, and because the case for plaintiff on the next trial may be stronger than that disclosed by the record before us on this appeal, it will not be necessary to consider the sufficiency of the evidence.

Considering the weakness of the evidence and the exceeding narrowness of the margin to support respondent's theory of the accident, it is obvious that any improper questions propounded to the jurors upon their voir dire, calculated to bias them in favor of respondent, must be deemed to have been prejudicial to appellant. Questions of that character, over appellant's objections, were propounded and allowed during the examination of the panel. The objectionable questions were asked in the presence and hearing of all the panel from which the jury that tried the case was selected. For this reason we think the judgment should be reversed.

While examining the jury panel upon their voir dire, respondent's counsel asked these questions:

> "Now, if you were sworn as a juror, and during the trial of this case, near the end of it, you should learn that the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, one of these surety companies, was a surety at the time of this accident alleged, or an insurer against any injury to employés, would that in any wise affect your verdict in this case?" Also: "And if it came to your knowledge, if you were a juror in this case, and it came to your knowledge from any source whatever, that the New Amsterdam Casualty Company was a surety for any injury to the employés of the defendant company at the time of this alleged injury, would that knowledge of that fact in any wise influence your verdict in the case?"

Each of these questions carried with it the implication, if not the direct assertion, that appellant was insured by a casualty insurance company against any financial loss it might sustain by reason of the injury to respondent. To these questions, and others of a similar import persistently propounded, appellant's counsel strenuously objected upon the ground that the same were incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, and particularly upon the ground that each was an improper question to be asked the jurors upon their voir dire. The objections were overruled. It does not appear that the court in any manner or at any time endeavored to admonish the jury to disregard the damaging insinuation conveyed to their minds by this line of questioning. The questions were highly prejudicial, and it was error to overrule respondent's objections. Pierce v. United Gas, etc., Co., 161 Cal. 176, 188, 118 Pac. 700; Roach v. Llewellyn, etc., Co., 140 Cal. 563, 74 Pac. 147; De Liere v. Goldberg, etc., Co., 30 Cal. App. 612, 159 Pac. 197; Dameron v. Ansbro, 178 Pac. 874; Spinney's Adm'x v. There is a decided divergence of opinion among the courts of the several states as to the right of counsel for plaintiff in a personal injury action to suggest in any way, in the presence of the jury, that an indemnity insurance company is an actual party in interest. The cases are collected and reviewed in an exhaustive note to Egner v. Curtis, etc., Co., L. R. A. (N. S.) 1915A, p. 153 et seq. From what is said in De Liere v. Goldberg, etc., Co., supra, it is evident that, as yet, there is no decision in this state that has attempted to define the circumscribing bounds within which examining counsel, at their peril, must confine themselves. The question is one that, in so far as is reasonably possible, ought to be settled as a matter of general practice.

It is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to lay down a fixed rule that will apply on all occasions and define the restrictive limitations with absolute exactness. It is, however, possible and practicable to define the guiding principles applicable to such cases. Courts do not look with favor upon an attempt to impress the jury with the idea that, not the local defendant in the case, but an insurance company, which often is a foreign corporation, may be called upon to respond to such damages as the jury may assess. The knowledge that the defendant has such protection may have a tendency to make the jurors careless as to the amount of their verdict. As was said in a Maine case (Sawyer v. Arnold Shoe Co., 90 Me. 369, 38 Atl. 333):

> "* * * To allow juries, in cases of this kind, to take into consideration the fact that an employer was insured against accidents would do more harm than good, and would increase the already strong tendency of juries to be influenced, in cases of personal injury, especially where a corporation is defendant, by sympathy and prejudice."

Notwithstanding the apparent diversity of the decisions, we think that a correct statement of the rule, supported by reason and the weight of authority, is substantially as follows: It is entirely proper for counsel to ask the jurors such questions as may reasonably be necessary to ascertain whether they are free from a bias or interest that may affect their verdict. To this end it is proper for counsel, in good faith, to ask of each juror whether he is interested as an agent or stockholder or otherwise in a specified casualty company. Or he may be asked the broad question whether he is interested in any insurance company insuring against liability for negligence. Rinklin v. Acker, 125 App. Div. 244, 109 N. Y. Supp. 125; Grant v. National, etc., Co., 100 App. Div. 234, 91 N. Y. Supp. 805. But counsel must take pains to propound such questions in such a manner as not unnecessarily to convey the impression that the defendant is in fact so insured. It is misconduct on the part of counsel for plaintiff in such actions so to frame his question that it goes beyond what is reasonably necessary to serve the legitimate purpose of eliciting the facts he is entitled to adduce in order to secure a jury free from bias or prejudice, if it is also apparent that the question may fairly be said to have the effect of serving the illegitimate purpose of prejudicing the jury by fixing in their minds the idea that the defendant is protected by insurance against liability for negligence. And if the amount of the verdict is large as compared with the nature of the injuries sustained, or the defendant's liability is a close question, such misconduct is prejudicial and ground for reversal.

The plaintiff has the right to inquire about any interest, direct or indirect, of the jurors that may affect their verdict, but he has no right to abuse his privilege or make of it a strategem by which he can prejudice the jury with irrelevant matter. As was well said in one of the cases, counsel, at his peril, must steer a clear course between the Scylla of an interested jury on the one hand and the Charybdis of pettifoggery on the other. Asking a juror whether he is interested in a specified casualty company, or, generally, in any insurance company, if the question be propounded in good faith, may be necessary in order to insure the plaintiff a body of jurors unbiased by any connection in favor of the party really interested in the defense of the action. But beyond this it is neither necessary nor proper to go. It is not permitted to counsel, under the guise of testing their qualifications as jurors, to go beyond what is necessary to insure a body of unbiased jurors and seek to create the impression that an insurance company, and not the defendant in the case, will be called upon to respond to such damages as the jury may assess. When questions propounded to prospective jurors overreach the limit, they may prove unprofitable to the party asking them. As was said in Hoyt v. Davis Mfg. Co., 112 App. Div. 755, 98 N. Y. Supp. 1031:

> "When counsel ask such questions, overreaching the limit, with a hope to gain a benefit from them, it is but fair that he should take the risk, and in a close case the court may properly consider that such suggestion had the very effect which counsel intended it should have."

It appears from the questions propounded to the jurors in this case that respondent's counsel, not satisfied merely to ask the prospective jurors whether they knew any one connected with the New Amsterdam Casualty Company, or whether they were interested in that company as stockholders or otherwise, which questions they would have had the right to ask for the purpose of exercising their challenges, proceeded further, and, in effect, conveyed to the minds of the jurors, unnecessarily, the idea that the New Amsterdam Casualty Company was the real party interested in the defense of the action. And the court, by overruling the vigorous objections of appellant's counsel, stamped the statements with its approval. It is obvious, therefore, that counsel, presumably learned in the law, could not have asked the questions for any legitimate purpose, and, while we will not say they were deliberately made for the illegitimate purpose of prejudicing the jury, it is plain that they were well calculated to have that effect. The questions could have had no other tendency than to seduce a verdict on the ground that an insurance company, and not the defendant, would be the one really affected by a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. They certainly would have a tendency to render the jurors careless as to the amount of their verdict. It is possible in such cases for an attorney, who is acting in good faith and with a proper regard for the rights of his adversary, to elicit all necessary information without disclosing to the jurors the reason prompting the inquiry. Without attempting to mark out a definite course to be pursued in all cases, for that is neither necessary nor practicable, we hold that counsel here overstepped the bounds of fair and legitimate practice. The court erred in overruling appellant's objections. And, in view of the slight margin of evidence in favor of the proposition that respondent himself was not guilty of contributory negligence, we cannot say that the error was not without prejudice to appellant.

The conclusion at which we have arrived renders it unnecessary to consider appellant's complaint of certain questions propounded by respondent's counsel to the witness Mullen, and which appellant contends were an invasion of the province of the jury and of the kind held objectionable on the first appeal. Doubtless, on the retrial, respondent's counsel, in the examination of the witnesses, will so frame their questions as to avoid any risk of possible error.

Judgment reversed.

LOS ANGELES ATHLETIC CLUB v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. (Civ. 2886.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1919.)

1. Insurance 🔑542(6)—Surety Company—Itemized Statement of Claim.

In an action on fidelity insurance policy for loss by reason of dishonesty of an employé, itemized statement of claim held sufficient.

2. Insurance 🔑665(7) — Fidelity Insurance—Notice.

In an action on fidelity insurance policy, which required the employer to give notice by registered letter, addressed to the president of the insurance company at its office promptly after becoming aware of any act which might be made the basis of the claim, evidence held insufficient to show that the employer promptly gave notice after its executive officers received knowledge of the employé's dishonesty.

3. Insurance 🔑539(5) — Fidelity Insurance—Time of Notice of Claim.

Noncompliance with the provision of fidelity insurance policy, requiring prompt notice after the employer should become aware of any act which might be made the basis of a claim, cannot be excused on the ground that it was an immaterial provision, and that therefore, under Civ. Code, § 2611, a violation did not avoid the policy.

4. Insurance 🔑670—Fidelity Insurance—Evidence—Finding.

In an action on a fidelity insurance policy, held that, while the court had the right to arrive at an estimate of the employé's misappropriations, which consisted largely of consuming the employer's stock of liquor, by an approximation of the daily articles consumed, the finding of the court was insufficient, where it did not show what proportion of the value taken by the employé accrued prior to the discovery of his dishonest acts.

5. Insurance 🔑508½, New, vol. 4 Key-No. Series—Fidelity Insurance—Losses.

A fidelity insurer is not liable for any acts of fraud or dishonesty committed by the employé, after the employer became aware of any act which might be made the basis of a claim.

6. Insurance 🔑646(8) — Fidelity Insurance—Evidence.

In an action by an athletic club against a company insuring it against loss by reason of the dishonesty of the club manager, who, it was charged, in violation of his contract of employment, consumed without payment large amounts of liquors belonging to the stock of the club, held that the club had the burden of proving that the manager did not pay for the liquors consumed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Athletic Club against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Clyde E. Cate, H. W. Creighton, Sol. A. Rehart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought to recover on a bond or policy of fidelity insurance. The plaintiff employed one Walter L. Patterson as manager of its clubhouse at a salary of $300 per month, with the express agreement "that he was to receive no other remuneration, perquisites or consideration," and "that he should pay the customary price or charge so fixed by plaintiff for every article of said goods, wares and merchandise said Patterson should receive for himself and use to his own benefit"; and further, "that he was not, under any circumstances, to take, use or receive for his own benefit any articles of goods, wares or merchandise kept in stock by plaintiff as aforesaid without paying therefor the full price fixed by plaintiff as the selling price thereof to the members of its said club."

The defendant, a fidelity insurance company, for consideration, insured plaintiff against any pecuniary loss that might be sustained by reason of the fraud or dishonesty of said Walter L. Patterson up to and including the amount of $5,000.

It stands admitted by the pleadings that Patterson was in the employment of the plaintiff under the agreement as stated from the 1st day of November, 1911, until the 2d day of May, 1914.

The trial court finds:

> "That subsequent to the 1st day of July, 1912, the said Walter L. Patterson fraudulently and dishonestly, and contrary to and in violation of the terms of said agreement of employment, and without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, used, took, carried away, and converted to his own use goods, wares, and merchandise consisting of certain articles and commodities kept in stock by plaintiff for the use of its members, such as alcoholic and other beverages, cigars, candies, etc., of the reasonable value of $2,015.08. That said Walter L. Patterson has not paid the plaintiff for any of said goods, wares, and merchandise, although demand was made on him therefor."

The court further finds that plaintiff had no knowledge of the taking and appropriation of these commodities by Patterson until "on or about the 1st day of April, 1914, and that thereafter, about said date, plaintiff advised the defendant corporation of the alleged acts of fraud and dishonesty on the part of Patterson."

Defendant appeals from the judgment against it for $2,015.08, and costs. It is urged that the judgment should be reversed for the following reasons:

(1) Because plaintiff did not comply with the conditions of the insurance contract, which required "that the employer shall give notice by registered letter addressed to the president of the surety company at its office in Baltimore, Maryland, promptly after becoming aware of any act which may be made the basis of a claim," and also that "the employer shall, within ninety days after date of said notice, file with the surety company its itemized claim thereunder, duly sworn to."

(2) That the acts of Patterson on which the claim rests did not constitute fraud or dishonesty in the course of his employment, and were not such acts of dishonesty as were covered by the policy of insurance.

(3) Insufficiency of the evidence as to the amount and value of the goods taken by Patterson.

(4) Insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the finding that the articles taken and used were not paid for.

[1] On the second specification of the first ground of objection to the judgment, we are of the opinion that the requirement for an itemized statement of the claim was as fully and satisfactorily made as it could be under the circumstances, by the affidavit of various officers and employés of the club, which appear in the record, and which give in detail all the information as to the nature and amount of Patterson's alleged misappropriations which the various witnesses possessed. These affidavits were in reasonable time, before bringing suit, furnished to representatives of the defendant company.

[2] But as to the first specification, there does not appear at any time to have been a compliance with the express condition of the policy that notice should be given in writing to the president of the company; and it is more than doubtful if such notice as was conveyed to the local agents of the defendant was given with any degree of promptness after the officers of the plaintiff "became aware" of the acts of alleged dishonesty on which they base their claim.

It is claimed by plaintiff, and the trial court so found, that plaintiff had no knowledge of the alleged acts of dishonesty on the part of Patterson until on or about the 1st day of April, 1914. The only finding as to notice to the defendant is that "thereafter, and on or about said date, plaintiff advised the defendant corporation of the acts of fraud and dishonesty on the part of Patterson." This is perilously close to a vague and indefinite conclusion of law as to the matter of notice. Moreover, we are not at all satisfied that the evidence supports the finding as to the time of discovery of the facts, or of the alleged notice.

In the first place, there seems to have been a conspicuous lack of diligence on the part of the officers of the club in discovering Patterson's habits in the matter of personal consumption of the supplies of the club. It seems to have been a matter of common notoriety among the employés of the club, including the bartenders who served him, that he was a constant and capacious patron of the bar for years. From his subsequent investigations the vice president of the club estimates that the aggregate of the goods and wares received by Patterson—most of which seem to have been openly procured by him from other employés at the bar—amounted in value to about $6,000. Roberts, the head barkeeper, who was in that position throughout Patterson's employment as manager, testified that the latter received at his bar, on an average per day, four long whisky highballs, two cocktails, three to five pints of beer, two gin fizzes and two glasses of Lithia water; and that he smoked about eight cigars per day, and received from two to six quarts of whisky per week, and six pints of champagne per week—together with cigarettes, light wines, and other commodities not enumerated. The witness further states that he does not include in his list any liquor which Patterson might have drunk between 2:30 p. m. and 4:30 p. m. while the witness was off duty. Another bartender, named Sakai, testified that he was bartender of the club after July 14, 1913, and that he served Patterson drinks on an average of about four pints of Budweiser a day, a cocktail before dinner, another about 6:30 p. m. and about three pints of whisky a week; also occasional highballs and packages of candy. Shubata, another bartender, testifies to serving Patterson mostly highballs, Budweiser beer, and some champagne. He served him an average daily of from three to five highballs, about four pints of Budweiser, about three pints of whisky per week, a gin fizz in the morning, and sometimes wine, cocktails, and champagne.

All this was done openly, and from the service bar of the club. The witnesses further stated that Patterson paid very little, and that no account was kept by them.

One F. W. Lloyd, whose affidavit was admitted in evidence as part of the statement submitted to the defendant company, testifies: That he was the house detective of the plaintiff club. About March 1, 1914, it was reported to him "by numerous employés of the club that Patterson was in the habit of drinking quite heavily, and that he was frequently intoxicated, and that the said employés believed that said Patterson was not paying for the liquor which he drank and had sent out to his house from the club. That this affiant reported said rumors to Mr. Frank A. Garbutt, vice president of said club," and that Garbutt stated that he did not believe the rumors, but directed the witness to investigate. That on the expiration of a week, and "being convinced that said Patterson was defrauding the club of many dollars' worth of liquor each day," the witness again reported to Garbutt the result of his investigations. This affiant further avers "that it was generally known among the employés of said club that said Patterson was mulcting said club out of large quantities of valuable commodities daily, but that this knowledge on the part of said employés was just on hearsay and upon their observations of Patterson's apparent intoxication." According to this witness, the information contained in his affidavit was conveyed to Mr. Garbutt, the vice president and a director of the club, early in March, 1914.

The testimony of Mr. Garbutt himself is rather confusing. He states in one of his affidavits that in his capacity as vice president of the club he did, "on or about the 25th day of January, 1914, become cognizant of said acts of fraud and dishonesty on the part of said Walter L. Patterson, whereby said Patterson was misappropriating goods belonging to said Los Angeles Athletic Club." In another place, in answer to the question, "Did Patterson ever do anything which you considered as a violation of the terms of his employment?" he answered, "On or about three months before Mr. Patterson was discharged it was brought to my attention that he was drinking at the club." Patterson was discharged May 2, 1914. At another place in his affidavit he states that—

> "During the period between January 28, 1914, and May 2, 1914, Patterson misappropriated goods of the value of $209.70," and "that the fraud and dishonesty of said Walter L. Patterson was not discovered or suspected by said Frank A. Garbutt, or any other officer of the Los Angeles Athletic Club, before or until the date last mentioned."

If this refers to the date of May 2d, the date when Patterson was discharged, it is inconsistent with all the other testimony on this point. It is more probable that he refers to the "period" somewhere between January 28th and May 2d. At another place in his affidavits Mr. Garbutt states that on or about the 1st of April, 1914, facts were reported to him tending to show that Patterson "was systematically defrauding the club." It is upon this date that the court fixes its finding, but it may be observed that the witness does not state in this connection that he had no information of an earlier date. We find in the record a letter, introduced by plaintiff, addressed to Mr. Garbutt, signed by one J. E. Murphy, of date March 3, 1914, purporting to confirm a previous interview with Garbutt, which letter calls attention to a liberal supply of liquors at Mr. Patterson's home, and a statement by Patterson that—

> 'Mr. Garbutt might be a shrewd business man, but he sure was easy when it came to club business, for he (Patterson) pulled it all over them when it came to taking an inventory in the wine room."

The letter also contains a statement of the writer that on leaving the club on one occasion he saw the storeroom man come up from the wineroom and give Patterson three large boxes of cigars. There are also further statements in the letter calculated to reflect upon Mr. Patterson's integrity in his relations to the club.

The conclusion cannot be avoided that the officers of the club had information as early as the first part of March, 1914, sufficient to demand an investigation, and that every facility was close at hand and accessible for getting promptly at the facts. There seems to have been no hesitancy on the part of the various employés in telling what they knew, when asked.

In spite of this remarkable history of events, there is no pretense of any notice to the president of the defendant company, as required by the policy, and no evidence of any notice at all, so far as we have been able to discover, earlier than the last of May or the first of June, 1914. The only definite evidence on this point is contained in the testimony of Mr. Creighton, an attorney for the plaintiff, who states that he first became aware of the matters involving Patterson about April 1, 1914, when Mr. Garbutt called him into his office and told him that he had information tending to show that Mr. Patterson had been violating his contract. He says that he took the matter up with Mr. Shroder, of the Frank M. Kelsey Company (local agents of the defendant, we assume), some time during the month of May. Further on in his testimony he says:

> "The first occasion of taking these facts up with Mr. Shroder, or anybody, was the latter part of May or the first of June."

Later on in his testimony, having examined certain correspondence of date May 7, 1914, he says that the claim was not presented to the Frank M. Kelsey Company "until after May 7, 1914." He states further that Mr. Shroder told him to place the claim in form and present it to him, and that he might wait until he had done so before sending formal notice to the president of the company. If any authority on the part of a representative of the local agent to make such a waiver of notice could be assumed under any circumstances, we are met by the provision of the insurance bond or policy that—

> "None of its conditions shall be deemed to have been waived by or on behalf of said surety unless the waiver be clearly expressed in writing, over the signature of its president or secretary, or their duly authorized officer, and its seal thereto affixed."

We have here, then, an entire failure to give the required notice to the president of the company, and a delay of about 60 days from the time the court found the plaintiff became aware of Patterson's alleged defalcations, and of from 90 days upwards from the time when they should have been, and probably were, sufficiently aware of these facts, before the matter was called to the attention of even the local agents of defendant. And the authority, by the way, of these agents to act for the company in any capacity does not appear in the record.

[3] Respondent contends that this condition of the policy, requiring prompt notice of the acts constituting the basis of a claim, is not material to the rights of defendant, and that under the Civil Code, § 2611, the violation of an immaterial provision of a policy does not avoid it, unless it is so expressly declared in the policy. The contention that this express condition for prompt notice is not material to the contract is not sustained by respondent's authorities, and is contrary to the generally recognized construction of such requirements in insurance policies. Respondent's citations to the effect that notice is not material unless it is shown that injury has resulted from the failure to give same, in nearly every instance, deal with the implied requirements of notice under the general law of guaranty and suretyship. Here the parties expressly stipulated in their written contract for prompt and specific notice. To quote from another opinion:

> "The conditions in policies requiring notice of losses to be given, and proofs of the amounts to be furnished the insurer within certain prescribed periods, must be strictly complied with to enable the insured to recover. And it is not perceived that the conditions under consideration stand upon any different footing. The contract of insurance is a voluntary one, and the insurers have the right to designate the terms upon which they will be responsible." Riddlesbarger v. Insurance Co., 7 Wall. 386, 390, 19 L. Ed. 257, cited in California Savings Bank v. American Surety Co. (C. C.) 87 Fed. 118.

Construing and applying a requirement of notice similar to the one here, in a fidelity insurance policy, in the case of California Savings Bank v. American Surety Co., supra, Judge Wellborn of the United States District Court, in his opinion, says:

> "In case of loss upon an insurance against fire, an insurer is exonerated if notice thereof be not given him by some person insured or entitled to the benefit of the insurance without unnecessary delay. Civil Code, § 2633. * * * Whether or not in other kinds of insurance notice is essential, depends upon the contracts which the parties make. The foregoing section, however, does emphasize in the strongest possible manner the materiality of notice in the case of fire insurance; and it is believed that in fidelity insurance, which is of recent origin, notice of the fraudulent acts of the employé is of equal, if not greater, importance, for the reason that prompt notification may often enable the insurer to avoid, or secure indemnity for, losses which otherwise would be inevitable or irremediable. The authorities cited by defendant to the effect that the requirement as to notice of loss is a material provision, and must be strictly complied with in order to enable the employer to recover, are numerous. Ermentrout v. Insurance Co. [63 Minn. 305] 65 N. W. 635 [30 L. R. A. 346, 56 Am. St. Rep. 481]; Quinlan v. Insurance Co., 133 N. Y. 356, 31 N. E. 31; Insurance Co. v. McGookey, 33 Ohio St. 555; 2 Wood, Ins. §§ 436, 437; 2 May, Ins. § 461; Tayloe v. Insurance Co., 9 How. 403 [13 L. Ed. 187]."

The opinion cited further states:

> "The allegations of the complaint that the defendant was in May, 1892, fully advised and informed of the breaking of the bond and the loss resulting therefrom do not, in my opinion, excuse plaintiff's failure to give the prescribed written notice of the fraudulent acts of the employé, and such failure is nonperformance of the contract on the part of plaintiff as to defeat recovery."

It may be conceded that the insured is not called upon to act on mere suspicion in the matter of giving notice to the insurer; but in this case the plaintiff knew, or had every opportunity of knowing, all the facts early in March, or the first of April, 1914, at the latest.

Our conclusion as to the materiality of the requirement to give notice of the facts upon which respondent's claim is based, and the failure to make a reasonable, or any, compliance with its terms, make it unnecessary to discuss to any extent the other points of appellant's argument. It may be said, however, that while under the terms of the employment of Patterson any ordinary running of a bill at the bar or restaurant of the club, although remaining unpaid, might merely create a debt and not constitute a fraud, the nature and extent of his appropriation and consumption of the supplies of the plaintiff club as shown here, particularly the carrying away of liquors and cigars, are, we believe, such as to justify a finding of fraud and dishonesty in his transactions.

[4, 5] We are satisfied, too, that the court had a right to arrive at an estimate of the amount of Patterson's misappropriations by the method of approximation from the daily average of articles consumed. The fact alone that it is difficult, and perhaps impossible, to reach an accurate accounting, should not deprive the insured of all relief. But the difficulty presented by the finding of the court on this point is that it does not show what proportion of the value taken by Patterson accrued prior to the discovery of his dishonest acts. It is well-settled law, and is expressly provided by this policy of insurance, that the insurer shall not be liable for any acts of fraud or dishonesty committed by the employé after the employer shall become aware of any act which may be made the basis of a claim. The court here finds that "subsequent to the 1st day of July, 1912," the said Walter L. Patterson fraudulently and dishonestly, and contrary to the terms of his agreement, appropriated to his own use the goods and wares of plaintiff to the value of $2,015.08. Patterson's dishonesty was discovered not later than April 1, 1914. He continued in the employ of plaintiff until May 2, 1914. The evidence tends to show that his misappropriations continued throughout his employment. What proportion of the value found by the court accrued after April 1st cannot be determined from the record. The finding is insufficient in this respect.

[6] It is also doubtful if there is any sufficient evidence of nonpayment. The bartenders testified that Patterson paid them something, but not much. As to whether there was ever any settlement with the officers of the club, there is no evidence at all. If the action was against Patterson, the burden would be upon him to show payment. But in this action against his sureties it is certainly incumbent on plaintiff to show nonpayment. The action is not on the indebtedness of Patterson, but upon a contract to indemnify plaintiff against pecuniary loss from Patterson's dishonesty. The plaintiff must prove his loss, and to do this must establish the fact that Patterson has not paid for the goods taken.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Appeal and Error 🔑856(5)—Review—Grant of New Trial.

Where an order granting a new trial stated, "The motion of plaintiff for a new trial herein is hereby granted, upon the grounds specified in the notice of intention filed herein, except upon the grounds of insufficiency of evidence, as to which grounds said motion is denied," the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict for defendant cannot be considered on appeal.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1078(6)—Matters Reviewable—Briefs.

Where an appellee's brief urges only one ground why the court was warranted in granting a motion for a new trial, it will be assumed that there was no other valid ground for a new trial.

3. Municipal Corporations 🔑705(12) — Automobiles—Lights—Duty of Owner.

By the use of the alternative, "owned by him or under his control," in St. 1913, pp. 645, 646, §§ 13, 19, the Legislature intended to impose the duty of seeing that a motor vehicle carried a rear red light upon the owner when, and only when, he is in control of the motor vehicle, personally or through a servant, and to impose that duty upon some other person when such other person is operating the vehicle and it is under his control.

4. Master and Servant 🔑315—Independent Contractor —Violation of Automobile Regulations—"Allow."

The word "allow," as used in St. 1913, p. 646, § 19, providing that no person shall allow a motor vehicle owned by him or under his control to be operated in violation of the statute, means to acquiesce in, and, since knowledge, express or implied, is essential to guilt, a motor vehicle owner is not liable for the absence of a rear red light at night while the vehicle is in the hands of an independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Allow.]

5. Master and Servant 🔑316(1)—Injuries to Third Persons—Relation—Servant or Independent Contractor.

Whether a motortruck lessee employed by the lessor to haul coal is a servant or independent contractor, at the time of injury to a third person, must be determined not alone from the written contract of employment, but from the subsequent conduct of each, known to and acquiesced in by the other.

6. Master and Servant 🔑318(1)—Injuries To Third Persons—Relation.

A conditional vendee and lessee of a motortruck, who is under a contract of employment to haul coal for the lessor, who has no right to control and direct the manner in which the hauling should be done, is an independent contractor, for the negligence of whose servants the lessor is not liable.

7. Master and Servant 🔑316(1) —Contract of Employment—Modification.

Where the parties to a written contract of employment by mutual consent, inferred from their subsequent conduct, have modified their contract so as to create the relation of contractee and independent contractor, and have acted upon it as modified, it is valid in the modified form to the extent and during the period it was so acted upon and carried out.

8. Evidence 🔑424 —Parol Evidence Affecting Writing—Third Persons.

It is competent for one sued as master for the negligence of his alleged servant, where the written contract bears evidence of that relation, to show, by parol evidence, that he and his alleged servant by their conduct put a different construction upon their contract and treated each other as contractee and independent contractor.

9. Master and Servant 🔑318(1) —Independent Contractor.

The mere fact that a contract of employment gives employer right to terminate it at any time he chooses does not necessarily show that the person employed is not an independent contractor.

10. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷318(1)—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

That a contract of employment of a motor-truck lessee and his truck, for making deliveries for the lessor, required that the lessee drive the truck, does not necessarily lead to the conclusion that he was a servant and not an independent contractor.

11. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷332(3) —INJURIES TO THIRD PERSONS—QUESTION FOR JURY—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR.

Whether the relation between a coal company and one to whom it had leased a motor-truck with option to purchase, compensation under a contract to haul coal for the company to be applied on the truck, was that of master and servant or contractee and independent contractor, held for the jury.

12. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷302(1) — RESPONDEAT SUPERIOR.

The doctrine of respondeat superior applies only where the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged with the result of the wrong, at the time and in respect to the very transaction out of which the injury arises.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Action by Lorenzo Foster Luckie against the Diamond Coal Company. Verdict for defendant, and from an order granting a new trial it appeals. Reversed.

Harry A. Hollzer and J. Crider, Jr., both of Los Angeles, and Guy Le Roy Stevick, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Delphin M. Delmas, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant appeals from an order granting a new trial after a verdict in its favor.

The action is for the recovery of damages for personal injuries sustained in an automobile accident, alleged to have resulted from the negligence of defendant's servants. Whether the persons whose negligence caused the accident were the servants of defendant or of one whom defendant claims was an independent contractor, is one of the principal questions presented.

[1, 2] The order granting the new trial is as follows:

> "The motion of plaintiff for a new trial herein is hereby granted, upon the grounds specified in the notice of intention filed herein, except upon the grounds of insufficiency of evidence, as to which grounds said motion is denied."

The language of the order eliminates from consideration here the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 270, 29 Pac. 481, 18 L. R. A. 124; Siemsen v. Oakland, etc., Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 494, 66 Pac. 672; Higgins v. Los Angeles Gas, etc., Co., 159 Cal. 651, 115 Pac. 313, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 717. Though respondent, had he elected to do so, could have presented to this court any good reason, disclosed by the record, why there should be an affirmance of the order appealed from, other than as to the sufficiency of the evidence, he has chosen to limit his attempted vindication of the order to alleged error in giving and refusing certain instructions. Respondent's brief here consists of a printed copy of his oral argument in the lower court upon his motion for a new trial. From this it appears that the sole grounds there urged why a new trial should be granted, which are likewise the sole grounds here urged as reasons why the order should be affirmed, are that the court erred in giving the instructions complained of, and in refusing the requested instructions. It will be assumed, therefore, that there was no other valid ground for a new trial. So that, if none of the grounds urged by respondent in his brief be tenable, the order should be reversed. Piercy v. Piercy, 149 Cal. 163, 86 Pac. 507.

On the evening of December 16, 1914, more than a half hour after sunset, in the city of Los Angeles, an automobile, in which plaintiff was riding as a passenger, collided with a heavy autotruck, known as a Gramm truck, on which was the sign "Diamond Coal Company." The truck was in charge of one Terry, as driver, assisted by one Cunningham, as helper. It was standing on Sunset boulevard near the corner of that thoroughfare and Alvarado street. Upon approaching the corner, Terry and Cunningham discovered that the light known in common parlance as the "tail light" had gone out. It was a stormy, rainy night. Failing to light a match in the blustering wind, Terry secured an ordinary hand lantern which was regularly carried on the truck, took it to a nearby garage, lit it, and hurried back. As he approached the truck with the lighted lantern, the automobile in which plaintiff was being carried as a passenger, traveling on Sunset boulevard in the same direction that the truck had been going, collided with the rear end of the truck, resulting in the injuries to plaintiff.

At the time of the accident, the truck was in the possession and control of one Foulks, under a written lease from defendant, or conditional sale contract, bearing date June 20, 1914. Contemporaneously with the execution of this lease defendant and Foulks had entered into another written agreement, hereinafter referred to as the "contract of employment," wherein defendant is referred to as the first party and Foulks as the second party, and which, so far as is necessary to an understanding of the questions here presented, after reciting that defendant is desirous of securing the services of an autotruck and driver, and that Foulks, as the lessee of the Gramm truck, is desirous of securing a steady and permanent contract for the employment of himself and his truck, provides as follows:

> "That said second party shall use and drive said autotruck in the service of said first party at least ten hours per day of each working day, continuously, until all claims said first party has against second party for payments on lease of said Gramm * * * truck have been satisfied. * * * Second party will furnish all gasoline, oil, and grease necessary in the operation of said autotruck, and will prudently use, care for, and keep same in good order and repair. * * * In case the truck is held up for repairs for more than one hour of any working day, the time which said truck is held up in excess of one hour shall be deducted. * * * The entire responsibility for the operation of the truck and for any damage to the truck or to persons or property through its operation shall be with the party of the second part, who alone shall be held responsible. * * * Said second party shall at all times keep said auto truck insured against personal liability and fire. * * * Payment by first party to second party shall be made $275 per calendar month, from which shall be deducted $175 one month and $150 the succeeding month (amounts alternating each month), said amounts so deducted to be applied, first, on the payment of rental and interest of Gramm truck and, second, on the purchase price of the Garford truck."

The Garford truck referred to in this agreement was another autotruck which originally was owned by defendant, but which it had sold to Foulks, though the purchase price had not been paid at the date of this new arrangement. Upon this Garford truck defendant, early in the year 1914, had taken out a state license under the state motor vehicle act.

At the same time that defendant and Foulks entered into their written contract of employment, they executed their lease or conditional sale contract whereby defendant leased the Gramm truck to Foulks. This agreement, which was also in writing, declares that Foulks agrees to pay defendant, as rental, a certain sum for the Gramm truck, in equal amounts of $125 per month on the 20th day of each month, to and including April 20, 1916, and a further sum, in certain monthly installments, for the Garford truck and for certain items for repairs and insurance. The agreement further provided that—

> "When said hirer shall fail to pay said rentals or said interest or any part thereof in the manner and at the time above specified, or fail to keep or perform any of the agreements or conditions contained in this contract, or whenever said coal company shall think it necessary in order to be secure against loss, although no breach of this contract has been committed by said hirer, with or without legal process, the said coal company may demand, take, and repossess said autotruck [the Gramm truck], notwithstanding anything herein contained."

It was further agreed that Foulks, at his expense, should pay all state, county, and city taxes and licenses, and keep the autotruck insured against liability and fire to an amount not less than $2,750. Then follows a provision to the effect that if Foulks shall perform all the conditions of the lease and make all payments, he shall have the privilege of purchasing the Gramm truck from defendant for $1, and, upon the execution of a bill of sale title should vest in him.

At or about the time when the written agreements were executed, the metallic plate upon which was inscribed the license number for the Garford truck was transferred to the Gramm truck, and remained fastened thereto up to and including the time of the accident. This, presumably, was done or caused to be done by defendant in conformity with the requirements of section 8 of the state motor vehicle act of 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 643).

Defendant's sole right to the Gramm truck was by virtue of a lease to it under a written conditional sale contract with one Colyear, by whom the truck was owned in the first instance, and who had executed to defendant a conditional sale contract similar, mutatis mutandis, to that which defendant gave to Foulks.

Foulks had an independent calling. He was in the transfer and delivery business. In that business he used autotrucks. He testified that, at the time of the accident, and in connection with his business, he was making deliveries for persons other than defendant. He hired the driver Terry and the helper Cunningham. He kept the Gramm truck on his brother-in-law's premises when it was not in use. Though defendant insured the truck, Foulks paid the premium by permitting defendant to deduct it from his monthly wage. Foulks, after ascertaining on the morning of each day where the various deliveries were to be made, selected the routes of travel. Terry received his orders from Foulks, and no one else; and whatever Foulks said to Terry the latter did.

The court, of its own motion, after giving correct definitions of the terms "servant" and "independent contractor," and stating that if Foulks was an independent contractor and Terry and Cunningham were his servants and not defendant's plaintiff could not recover, instructed the jury that if the written agreements were signed and delivered by the parties thereto, the law presumes that they were delivered on the day they bear date, to wit, June 20, 1914; that they are genuine and not sham, and were in force prior to and at the time of the accident; and that these presumptions, while satisfactory if uncontroverted, are not conclusive. The court further instructed the jury that if they found that these written agreements were genuine and in force at the time of the accident, and that, in carrying them out, Foulks selected and hired the men who were in charge of the truck at the time of the accident, fixed their duties, and had sole control over the details of their work, and that at that time they were performing some duty for Foulks, then the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover. Also that if the jury found that, under and by virtue of the contract relations between defendant and Foulks at the time of the accident, the latter was in the employ of the defendant for the purpose of using the truck in making deliveries for defendant, at such times and to such places as it should direct, and that he had the right to determine and control the manner or method and details of the operation of the truck in making such deliveries—being responsible to the defendant only for the making of deliveries at the time and places designated by it, but not for the method of making the same—and that Foulks had the right to operate the truck either by himself or, at his election, through some other person whom he might select and employ for that purpose, and that at the time of the accident Terry had been so selected and employed by him, and was then operating the truck under his direction and control as to the manner of its operation, then Foulks was an independent contractor, and Terry was not the servant of defendant, but was the servant of Foulks, and defendant would not be responsible for any negligent act or omission of Terry. Respondent contends that in giving these instructions the court erred.

Plaintiff requested, but the court refused, an instruction to the effect that the only right which the defendant acquired under the contract of employment between itself and Foulks was that of an employer of Foulks and the Gramm truck; that the duty of carrying a red light on the rear of a motor vehicle is imposed as a condition of the "license or privilege" of operating such vehicle upon the public highways of the state; and that responsibility for its neglect cannot be avoided by authorizing another person than the licensee to operate it. The court likewise refused an instruction, requested by plaintiff, instructing the jury, as a matter of law, that the relation created between defendant and Foulks by the written contract of employment was that of master and servant and not that of contractee and independent contractor. Respondent claims that in refusing to give these requested instructions the court committed error.

For the reasons stated at the beginning of this opinion, the order granting the new trial must be reversed, unless at least one of the grounds expressly assigned in this court by respondent for its affirmance is tenable.

To support his claim that the court erred in refusing the requested instructions and in giving those which it gave of its own motion, respondent contended in the lower court, as he does here: (1) That because the truck was registered under the state motor vehicle act in defendant's name, as owner and licensee, it is liable, even if Foulks were an independent contractor; (2) that Foulks was a servant merely and not an independent contractor; and (3) that the court erroneously left it to the jury to construe the documents and determine therefrom whether Foulks was a servant or an independent contractor.

To maintain his contention that, because the license on the Gramm truck was issued in appellant's name, presumably upon its application therefor, the latter is liable, regardless of whether Foulks was appellant's servant or an independent contractor, respondent claims that where the public has given to a licensee the privilege of using the public highways, such licensee is liable for any injury resulting from the omission of any statutory duty imposed as a condition to the right to enjoy the privilege—citing in support of this principle, among other cases, Lee v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 116 Cal. 97, 47 Pac. 932, 38 L. R. A. 71, 58 Am. St. Rep. 140. If this position be tenable, then the owner of a licensed automobile who may have loaned it for the day to a friend is liable for any injuries proximately caused by the friend's negligence in failing to observe any one of the numerous requirements of the motor vehicle act. If this be the law, then, harsh as it may be, ita lex scripta est, and there is nothing to do but enforce it. Is it the law? We think not.

[3, 4] Foulks was in possession of the truck under a conditional sale contract between himself and defendant, just as defendant, in its turn, under a similar contract with Colyear, had the right of possession as between itself and Colyear. We shall assume, however, that defendant, and not Foulks, was the "owner" of the truck within the meaning of the motor vehicle act (section 1 of the act [Stats. 1913, p. 640]); also that as such owner it was obliged to, as it in fact did, apply for and receive a license (section 3 of the act [Stats. 1913, p. 641]); and that it was defendant who caused the license plate to be affixed to the Gramm truck. It is provided by the motor vehicle act that—

"Every motor vehicle * * * while in use shall carry during the period from a half hour after sunset to a half hour before sunrise, * * * at the rear * * * a lighted lamp exhibiting one red light." Section 13 of the act (Stats. 1913, p. 645).

The act, however, does not impose this duty upon the owner and licensee regardless of whether he or some one else be in control of the vehicle. It is this that differentiates this case from those relied upon by respondent. The language of the act is:

"No person shall allow a motor vehicle owned by him or under his control to be operated * * * in violation of the provisions of this act." Section 19 of the act * * * (Stats. 1913, p. 646). (The italics are ours.)

We think it evident that, by the use of the alternative, "owned by him or under his control," the Legislature intended to impose the duty of complying with the requirements of the act upon the owner when, and only when, he is in control of the motor vehicle, personally or through his servant, and to impose that duty upon some other person—a friend to whom the vehicle may have been loaned, for instance—when such other person is operating the vehicle and it is "under his control." Aside from this consideration. the language of the act is that "no person shall allow," etc. This word "allow" materially limits the obligation of the owner, or the person in control, as the case may be. To allow is to acquiesce in or tolerate. Knowledge, express or implied, is essential before one may be guilty of either. Sawyer v. Mould, 144 Iowa, 185, 122 N. W. 813, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 602. The truck was in the possession of Foulks as lessee; and if at the time of the accident Foulks was using the truck as an independent contractor and not as a servant of defendant, no knowledge, actual or imputed, that the tail light was out, could be attributed to defendant; and in that case it could not be said that defendant had "allowed" any violation of the provisions of the motor vehicle act. If defendant did not "allow" any violation of the requirements of the act, it was not remiss in the due performance of any duty imposed upon it as a licensee of the state.

[5, 6] Both of respondent's remaining points, assigned by him as reasons for the affirmance of the order, appear to be grounded upon the assumption that the nature of the relation between defendant and Foulks at the time of the accident must be determined solely from the written agreements, particularly the written contract of employment. We think this an erroneous assumption. We think that the nature of Foulk's relation to defendant at the time of the accident, whether that of an independent contractor or servant, must be determined not alone from the terms of the written contract of employment, but from the subsequent conduct of each, known to and acquiesced in by the other.

We are not interested in the contracts between defendant and Foulks, or the right of either to enforce the same, save in so far as such contracts may afford evidence as to the nature of the true relation between them at the very time of the accident. For here the vital question is: What, at the time of the accident, was the actual relation between defendant and Foulks? Was their relation at that time that of contractee and independent contractor, or master and servant? Regardless of what may have been their written agreement six months before the accident, they unquestionably had the right to rescind it, or, by express verbal consent or by conduct mutually acquiesced in, wholly to disregard it, or to modify it, and create the relation of contractee and independent contractor, if, originally, their relation had been that of master and servant. So that if, with or without the written agreement, defendant, at the time of the accident, had the right to control and direct Foulks in respect to the manner in which the work was to be done, then the relation of master and servant existed. And, conversely, if, with or without the written agreement, defendant, at the time of the accident, did not have the right to control and direct Foulks in respect to the mode and manner in which the work should be done, the latter was an independent contractor, for the negligence of whose servants defendant would not be liable.

[7, 8] We do not think that the relation of master and servant, and none other, is conclusively established by the written contract of employment. But even if it were, that would not prevent the parties from changing that contractual relation and establishing another. Where the parties to a written contract of employment, by mutual consent inferred from their subsequent conduct, have modified their contract and have acted upon it as thus modified, it is valid, in the modified form, to the extent and during the period it was so acted upon and carried out. As between a third party and either party to the contract, such change or modification unquestionably could be shown by parol. In an action between a party to a contract and a third party, the rule that parol evidence cannot be received to contradict or vary a written contract does not apply, as the estoppel on which the rule rests must be mutual, and, since the third person is not bound by the contract as written, neither is his adversary in the action. Strangers to the contract are at liberty to show that the written instrument does not disclose the full or true character of the relation between the contracting parties. And if a stranger to the contract be thus at liberty, when contending with a party to the contract, the latter must be equally free to show the true relation between himself and the one with whom he has contracted. Both must be bound by this conventional rule of law, or neither. Dunn v. Price, 112 Cal. 46, 44 Pac. 354. Accordingly, it has been held that, in an action of this character, while, prima facie, the relation of the parties to a written contract of employment is that which is expressed by the terms of their writing, nevertheless, in order to determine their true relation, such contract should be considered in view, not only of the circumstances under which it was made, but of the conduct of the parties while the work is being performed. Klages v. Gillette-Herzog Co., 86 Minn. 458, 90 N. W. 1116. It is competent for the plaintiff in such an action to show that, as a matter of fact, the parties to a written contract creating the relation of contractee and independent contractor had put a different construction upon it by their conduct, and that the defendant has in fact exercised a supervision and control over the work in its details inconsistent with the presumed character of the other party to the contract as an independent contractor. Powell v. Construction Co., 88 Tenn. 692, 13 S. W. 691, 17 Am. St. Rep. 925; Klages v. Gillette-Herzog Co., supra; 1 Bailey on Personal Injuries, § 39. This being the rule, the converse must be equally true; and it is competent for one sued as a master for the negligence of his alleged servant, where a written contract between them bears evidence of that relation, to show that as a matter of fact, he and his alleged servant, by their conduct, put a different construction upon their contract and treated each other as contractee and independent contractor. For these reasons we hold that the nature of the relation between defendant and Foulks at the time of the accident was not determinable solely from the written contract of employment, but from all the evidence in the case, particularly that which bore upon the question as to whether, at that time, defendant was assuming the right to control and direct Foulks respecting the manner in which the work should be executed by him. As to this the evidence was conflicting. We hold, therefore, that whether defendant and Foulks were, respectively, master and servant or contractee and independent contractor, was a mixed question of law and fact, and that it was for the jury to determine, under proper instructions, the real relation of Foulks to defendant at the time of the accident. Greenberg v. Western Turf Ass'n, 148 Cal. 126, 82 Pac. 684, 113 Am. St. Rep. 216; Brophy v. Bartlett, 108 N. Y. 632, 15 N. E. 368. This is precisely what the court did. And if all the evidence in the case—that aliunde the writings as well as the writings themselves—was sufficient to justify a finding that the relation between defendant and Foulks was that of contractee and independent contractor, respondent cannot complain that this question, as a mixed question of law and fact, was left to the jury to determine. That there was sufficient evidence to justify such a finding, we have no doubt.

The accepted doctrine is that, where the essential object of the employment is the performance of work, the relation of master and servant does not exist unless the employer retains the right to direct the mode and manner in which the job shall be done; or, in other words, not only what shall be done, but how it shall be done. Labatt's Master and Servant, § 64; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721. "The chief consideration which determines one to be an independent contractor is the fact that the employer has no right of control as to the mode of doing the work contracted for." Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 99, 78 Pac. 337, 339. He is deemed to be the master who has the supreme choice, control, and direction of the servant, and whose will the servant represents, not merely in the ultimate result of the work, but in all the details. The legal test for the determination of the question is stated by Thompson as follows:

> "An independent contractor, within the meaning of this rule, is one who renders service in the course of an occupation, representing the will of his employer only as to the result of his work, and not as to the means by which it is accomplished. The contractor must answer for his own wrongs and the wrongs committed in the course of the work by his servants." 1 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 621, 622.

Foulks exercised an independent occupation. He was, to use his own words, in the transfer and delivery business. There was evidence that defendant did not exercise, or assume the right to exercise, any authoritative control over Foulks as to how his truck should haul the loads. Foulks determined what route the deliveries should take. Terry and Cunningham were his servants. Defendant exercised no control over them or the truck, so far as the driving or method of taking the loads to their destination, or the general care of the truck and its equipment, were concerned; nor did it assume to exercise any. It did not hire the driver or helper, and had no power to discharge them. The driver and his helper were paid by Foulks with his money, though it seems that at times the money for one or the other of these men was furnished by defendant; but the evidence shows that this was done as a matter of accommodation to Foulks. We thinks there is ample evidence to sustain a finding that Foulks represented defendant only as to the result of the work his truck did—the delivery of the loads at their respective destinations—and not as to the manner of the performance of the work. The driver of the truck and his helper, by delivering the loads, caused them to be dumped in heaps at their respective destinations. This, in its essence, was a "result," as much as if, being a building contractor, Foulks had orderly arranged steel, brick, and mortar so as to produce a stately structure. Upon the facts as above stated, Foulks was not the servant of defendant, but an independent contractor, for whose negligence defendant was not responsible. Burns v. Michigan Paint Co., 152 Mich. 613, 116 N. W. 182, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 816; Foster v. Wadsworth, 168 Ill. 514, 48 N. E. 163; Jahn's Adm'r v. McKnight & Co., 117 Ky 655, 78 S. W. 862; Driscoll v. Towle, 181 Mass. 416, 63 N. E. 922; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, supra.

Respondent argues that Foulks was a servant and not an independent contractor because: (a) Under the lease contract or conditional sale agreement between Foulks and defendant, the latter had the right at any time, and for no reason other than its own untrammeled will, to terminate the lease contract, and thus indirectly terminate the contract of employment; and (b) the contract of employment provides for the personal services of Foulks, in that it requires him to drive the truck.

[9] The contract of employment did not expressly give to defendant the right to discharge Foulks. Nor did the other contract—the so-called lease contract—give to defendant the right to terminate the lease of the truck merely because the manner whereby Foulks was performing his contract of employment might not be satisfactory to defendant. The so-called lease contract provides that it might be terminated by defendant if the latter shall deem it necessary to do so in order to secure it against loss, that is, loss under that particular contract. However, even if the contract of employment had given defendant the right to terminate it at any time it chose to do so, it would not necessarily follow that the relation between it and Foulks was that of master and servant. Though the fact that a contract provides that the employer may discharge the other party at any time is a circumstance that may be considered in determining the relation, and, in a doubtful case, may become an important circumstance, still it is not a controlling factor. It is not a "master fact"—it does not lead necessarily to the conclusion that the person employed to do work is not an independent contractor. Gall v. Detroit Journal Co., 191 Mich. 405, 158 N. W. 36; New Albany, etc., Co. v. Cooper, 131 Ind. 363, 30 N. E. 294; Thomas v. Altoona, etc., Ry. Co., 191 Pa. 361, 43 Atl. 215. For failure satisfactorily to accomplish the results contracted for, a contractee may discharge the contractor. Yet such right to discharge the contractor does not necessarily give the contractee the right to interfere with the manner the contractor may choose to use to accomplish the results contracted for.

[10, 11] Assuming, though not conceding, that the written contract of employment contemplated that Foulks should personally drive the truck, the fact remains that Foulks did employ others to drive it and deliver the loads; that these other persons received their orders and directions, as well as their pay, from him and not from defendant; and that defendant acquiesced in this course of conduct. And even if Foulks himself had been required to drive the truck, it would not necessarily follow that he was a servant and not an independent contractor. See Gall v. Detroit Journal Co., supra. The fact is there were many circumstances adduced at the trial, none of an absolutely controlling nature, but each pointing to the character of the employment—some squinting at the relationship of master and servant and others at that of contractee and independent contractor. For this reason different and discordant inferences were deducible from the attending circumstances, so that the question became one for the jury, under proper instructions.

[12] Furthermore, the doctrine of respondeat superior applies only where the relation of master and servant is shown to exist between the wrongdoer and the person sought to be charged with the result of the wrong, at the time and in respect to the very transaction out of which the injury arises. Foulks was in possession of the truck as lessee, or purchaser under a conditional sale contract. Upon him alone, under the terms of his contract with defendant, rested the obligation to take care of, house, and repair the truck. At the time of the accident the truck, which had been in a repair shop for certain repair work, was being taken from the repair shop to the place where Foulks habitually kept it overnight. At that time the truck was not being used in the service of defendant. At that time Foulks was the only master in whose business the driver and his helper were engaged.

DOYLE v. BRADSHAW et al.

(Civ. 2800; S. F. 8900.)

1. Exceptions, Bill of 🔑56(4)—Signature—Time for Presentation of Engrossed Bill.

Order relieving appellants from effect of failure to have bill engrossed within ten days after original proceeding was valid, though made after expiration of six-month period limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, where proceedings for obtaining such relief were commenced within such period.

2. Appeal and Error 🔑1024(5)—Findings of Trial Court—Review.

An order of the lower court based on conflicting affidavits must be sustained on appeal.

3. Boundaries 🔑46(3)—Agreed Location.

Where there was uncertainty as to true location of boundary line between lots, a dispute regarding it, possession, and payment of taxes for period required to establish adverse possession, the agreed line became in law the true line between the properties, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location as made to appear by subsequent survey or measurement.

4. Quieting Title 🔑35(1)—Pleading Title and Possession.

An allegation in a suit to quiet title that the plaintiff is the owner of the land in possession of it is sufficient, even though plaintiff's right of recovery depends upon whether or not there was an agreed boundary line.

5. Adverse Possession 🔑66(1) — Agreed Boundaries.

In action to quiet title by one claiming by adverse possession, question of whether or not plaintiff's original entry was by virtue of an agreement for a boundary line has no bearing upon the character of his adverse possession up to such line.

6. Boundaries 🔑35(3)—Evidence — Materiality.

In an action to quiet title, evidence of surveyors as to the location of the measured boundary line is immaterial, where there is an agreed boundary line.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

7. Appeal and Error 🔑873(1)—Orders of Trial Court—Conclusiveness on Appeal.

Order of trial court relieving appellants from effect of failure to have bill of exceptions engrossed within ten days after original proceeding, although made after the expiration of the six-month period limited by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, was not void; and, where no appeal was taken therefrom, is conclusive on appeal from the judgment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Suit by John M. Doyle against R. H. Bradshaw and others. A decree for plaintiff is affirmed by the Appellate Court, and the Supreme Court denies a petition for rehearing.

Elston, Clark & Nichols, of Berkeley, for appellants.

Dixon L. Phillips, of Hanford, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. [1, 2] The defendants appeal from a decree quieting plaintiff's title to a lot on the south side of University avenue, east of Milvia street, in the city of Berkeley. At the outset respondent contends appellants' bill of exceptions should not be considered, because it is claimed it was not engrossed within ten days after it was settled. The delay in the engrossment of the bill was caused by the fact that on the proceedings for its settlement the court ordered the transcript of the reporter's notes as to certain matters to be incorporated in the bill. The reporter who had taken the evidence at the trial had left the city of Oakland, no reporter's transcript had been prepared, and his notes were not available. Within six months from the original proceedings on the settlement of the bill, with an affidavit showing diligence on the part of the appellants to ascertain the whereabouts of the missing reporter, a notice of motion was served and filed, upon which motion the court on August 16, 1918, after the expiration of the six months' period limited by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, made an order in terms relieving the appellants from the effect of their failure to have the bill engrossed within ten days after the original proceeding. In opposition to the making of the order, an affidavit was presented on behalf of the respondent showing the reporter was in Oakland until shortly before the original proceeding. It is argued the appellants should have anticipated that the transcript would be required. While the relief sought was not granted until after the expiration of the time limited in the Code section, the proceeding was commenced within that time. This procedure has been approved. Baker v. Borello, 131 Cal. 617, 63 Pac. 914. The order of the court was made on conflicting affidavits, and must therefore be sustained. Doak v. Bruson, 152 Cal. 19, 91 Pac. 1001.

The parties claim from a common source of title. The land actually in dispute is a narrow strip lying along the eastern boundary of the plaintiff's lot designated as lot 13. The defendants own the adjoining lot, No. 12, on the east. Doyle, the plaintiff, first received a deed to the property in 1879 and went into possession under that deed. Later the property was sold for delinquent taxes to Simon Fischel, who then owned lot 12. Fischel made a quitclaim deed of lot 13 to Doyle in 1889, under which he conveyed whatever he acquired under the tax deed. Doyle built a house on lot 13 40 years ago, and, except between 1880 and 1889, while it was in the possession of his tenant, he lived on the property from the time the house was built until his testimony was given in this suit. After receiving the quitclaim deed from Fischel, Doyle paid all taxes assessed upon lot 13.

In 1890 a dispute arose between Doyle and Fischel as to the location of Doyle's house, which extended to the eastern boundary of his lot. Fischel moved the house, and Doyle sued him to quiet title. The suit was settled by a payment by Fischel to Doyle. The latter then built his house up to the eastern line of lot 13, and built a fence along that line with Fischel's knowledge, and to the cost of which fence Fischel contributed.

[3-5] The fence line so established was at all times after 1890 recognized by the parties as the division line between lots 12 and 13. These facts meet all the requirements of an agreed boundary, there having been uncertainty of the true location of the line, a dispute regarding it, and possession and the payment of taxes for the period required to establish adverse possession. Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 745, 130 Pac. 1061. In such a case the agreed line becomes in law the true line between the properties, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location as made to appear by subsequent survey or measurement. Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 484, 119 Pac. 893; Schwab v. Donovan, 165 Cal. 363, 132 Pac. 447; Silva v. Azevedo (Sup.) 173 Pac. 929; Staniford v. Trombly, 28 Cal. App. Dec. 959.[1] The appellant contends that the establishment of such an agreed boundary rests in estoppel, and relies upon the cases holding that, where estoppel is relied upon, it must be pleaded by the plaintiff. In a suit to quiet title the allegation that the plaintiff is the owner of the land and in possession of it is sufficient. Souter v. Maguire, 78 Cal. 543, 21 Pac. 183; Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 381, 108 Pac. 278. The plaintiff alleged and proved adverse possession of lot 13 up to the agreed line. The question of whether or not his original entry was by virtue of the agreement for the boundary line had no bearing upon the character of his adverse possession. It is contended that the finding of occupancy of the land by the plaintiff was outside of the issues. The complaint alleged ownership and possession of lot 13 by the plaintiff. The evidence showed and the court found the division line between lots 12 and 13 to be in accordance with the agreement of the parties when the location of the line was uncertain.

[6] On the trial a motion was granted striking out the evidence of the surveyors as to the location of the measured line. If there was an agreed line, under the rule of Price v. De Reyes, the location of the measured line was immaterial, and there was no error in striking out the evidence.

In the closing brief of the appellants it is argued it was not shown the plaintiff had paid taxes on the land up to the fence. In the complaint, and in the findings, in addition to the description by called distances, the plaintiff's lot was described as lot No. 13, in block No. 1, etc., and the plaintiff testified without objection that he had been in possession and had paid all taxes on the lot occupied by him up to the division fence.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM. [7] With relation to what is said in the opinion as to the consideration of the bill of exceptions, it is sufficient to say that it is conceded that no appeal was taken by respondent from the order relieving the appellants from any possible effect of their failure to engross the bill within the time prescribed. The order certainly was not void, and is conclusive on this appeal. See Ryer v. Rio Land & Imp. Co., 147 Cal. 462, 82 Pac. 62. We express no view as to the correctness of what is said in the opinion on this subject.

The petition for rehearing in this court is denied.

WEICHERS v. DEHAIL. (Civ. 2791.)

1. Landlord and Tenant ⟹48(2) — Damages—Insufficiency of Evidence.

In action by hotel lessee against lessor for breach of covenant because of inadequate heating facilities, etc., evidence that some patrons had left the hotel, but not showing what portion of lessee's losses were due to the causes of which he complains, held to sustain an award of only nominal damages.

2. Trial ⟹397(2)—Findings—Necessity.

In action by a hotel lessee against the lessor for failure to provide proper heating facilities, court's conclusion that appellant lessee was entitled only to nominal damages rendered unnecessary an express finding regarding the adequacy of the heating plant.

3. Appeal and Error ⟹1071(6)—Harmless Error—Findings.

A judgment will be sustained though the trial court failed to find on a material issue, unless a finding in appellant's favor on that issue would require a reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by A. J. Weichers against Elmo Dehail, administrator, etc. Judgment for plaintiff for nominal damages only, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur H. Barendt, of San Francisco (William Klein, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Albert J. Sherer, Robert Young, and Ingall W. Bull, all of Los Angeles (Henry T. Gage and W. I. Foley, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in his favor for damages in the sum of $1 in a suit in which trial by jury was waived, upon a cause of action of the lessee of a portion of a building in San Francisco, for hotel purposes, for breach of an express covenant of the lease and of claimed implied covenants. The record is voluminous, and since the judgment must be sustained no purpose will be served by an extended recital of facts. It is enough to say that since the lease was for hotel purposes, the appellant claims there was an implied covenant that the heating and hot water plants should be adequate for the use to which the building was to be devoted. It is claimed the evidence shows that neither the heating nor hot water plant was adequate, and, because there was no direct and express finding upon the issue of adequacy that the judgment must be reversed.

On behalf of the respondent it is contended the rule of implied covenants does not go to the extent claimed by the appellant, and that the evidence upon the question of adequacy was conflicting; further, that a finding to the effect that the heating plant was installed and ready for use when the lessee entered into possession sufficiently met the issue of adequacy.

After the lease was executed, the landlord leased a portion of the ground floor of the building to other tenants, who installed an autotruck repair shop. There was evidence to the effect that the operation of the repair shop, by reason of vibration and noises as well as by the filtration of smoke and noisome gases into the hotel, constituted such an injury to the leasehold as to amount to a constructive eviction under the implied covenant for quiet possession. The finding of the court and the conclusions of law support the position of the appellant in regard to this matter.

There was an express covenant in the lease, the substance of which was that if the hot water tank of the building should be found to be inadequate, the landlord would install a second hot water tank. Plaintiff demanded the installation of such a tank. At the time of trial it had not been installed. The court found that the defendant had offered to install the tank, and that his offer had not been accepted. On behalf of the appellant it is argued that under the covenant when demand was made for the installation of the tank, the duty of the landlord to make the installation was fixed, and that he should be held liable for damages by reason of his failure.

[1] The questions of law and fact presented upon the matters involved in the foregoing statement are argued at length in the briefs. On behalf of the appellant it is most strongly urged that upon his proof of injury he was entitled to substantial damages, and that the $1 awarded him was wholly inadequate. There was evidence that some roomers left the hotel, that others insisted on having their rooms changed from a point over the autotruck shop to other parts of the hotel, and that one possible patron of the hotel refused to take a room there because of the conditions of which complaint was made. There was also evidence that by reason of those conditions the plaintiff had been compelled to reduce the price charged for certain of the rooms in the hotel. There is no evidence concerning the price placed upon any rooms by the lessee, nor the reduced price, nor the number of rooms involved in the reduction of the price. There is no evidence that there were not other vacant rooms in the hotel, nor anything upon which to base even inferentially the amount of damages suffered by the plaintiff. In such a case nominal damages only may be awarded. The suit is upon the contract and not in tort. "The amount of recovery was not to be left, upon general principles, to the 'sound discretion' or 'dispassionate judgment' of the jury. It is an action to recover the actual and proximate damages caused to plaintiff by failure of defendant to perform his contract. Where there is a legal measure of damages, the jury must determine the amount as a fact; otherwise the law which so measures the damages would be of no avail." 1 Sutherland on Damages, 2. "It is often said to be a paramount principle that the person injured shall receive compensation commensurate with his injury, and no more. By reason of the breach of his contract, if he did break it, the defendant here became liable for the full amount of damages which resulted 'naturally' (that is, in usual course of things) and proximately from the breach. These were to be proved with reasonable certainty. The particulars of damage were so far capable of ascertainment, and upon the plaintiffs was imposed the obligation of proving them. The matter should not have been left to the conjectures of jurymen." Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 369, 17 Pac. 427, 429.

The rule announced in Parke v. Frank has never been questioned in this state, nor, so far as the court is advised, in any other state. Damages, 13 Cyc. 214, and cases cited in the note. In the appellant's brief the only evidence called to the attention of the court on this subject is contained in a letter addressed to the landlord by the attorney for the tenant, in which upon the basis of the number of rooms in the hotel at fixed prices per room, less an arbitrary deduction of 10 per cent. for vacancies, it was computed the net income of the hotel should have been $2,196 per month. Following this computation is the statement:

> "This is what Mr. Weichers should take in from this hotel if it were in proper condition, located as it is on the main artery of the city. As you know, his income has ranged from $1,000.00 to $1,200.00 a month. The largest month he ever had was $1,600.00. In other words he has been running behind from nine hundred to a thousand dollars a month. Somewhere in these figures a basis of adjustment must be reached."

In the absence of any evidence upon the subject, it cannot be assumed that but for the conditions of which the appellant complains there would have been no vacancies other than the arbitrarily fixed 10 per cent. There is some evidence which would indicate that a portion of the failure of the lessee to receive what he ought to have received from the building was due to other causes than any default upon the part of the landlord. The trier of the facts would not have been justified in guessing what portion of the $900 to $1,000 a month the hotel proprietor was losing was due to causes of which he complained, nor without any basis of measure to render a judgment for unproved and speculative profits.

[2, 3] In view of the entire lack of evidence of the amount of damages resulting naturally and proximately from the claimed breaches of the lease, the conclusion of the court that the plaintiff was entitled to damages in the sum of $1, based on findings in favor of the plaintiff, rendered unnecessary an express finding on the adequacy of the heating plant. Even though the trial court fails to find upon a material issue unless a finding in favor of the appellant upon that issue would work a reversal, the judgment will be sustained. "The rule is that if all material issues are not found upon, a reversal will not be ordered, unless the findings on those issues in favor of the appellant would entitle him to a judgment. Morrison v. Stone, 103 Cal. 94 [37 Pac. 142]; Gould v. Adams, 108 Cal. 365 [41 Pac. 408]." Blochman v. Spreckels, 135 Cal. 664, 67 Pac. 1061, 57 L. R. A. 213. "Although findings are required upon all material issues, a judgment will not be reversed for want of a finding, unless it shall appear there was evidence before the court from which it was required to make a finding which would countervail its other findings." Bliss v. Sneath, 119 Cal. 528, 51 Pac. 849.

In this case, if the court should adopt the theory of the appellant that there was an implied covenant that the heating plant should be adequate, and the facts warranted a finding that the heating plant was entirely inadequate and the lessee had sustained injury thereby, in the absence of evidence from which the measure of damage for that injury could be ascertained, he would be entitled only to a judgment for nominal damages under the rule announced in Parke v. Frank, supra.

Criticism is directed in appellant's brief to certain other findings, but they fall within the same rule as that applied to the absence of the finding on inadequacy of the heating plant. If they were in any degree defective, and appellant's contentions in regard to them could be sustained, still there was no evidence to warrant a judgment for more than nominal damages.

The judgment is affirmed.

CITY OF ORANGE v. CLEMENT, City Treasurer. (Civ. 3056.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑89—ACTION OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES—NECESSITY OF NOTICE—SPECIAL MEETINGS.

Where no written notice of a special meeting of the board of trustees of a municipal corporation was delivered to any member of the board, and one member was absent, the meeting and all proceedings therein were void, in view of Municipal Corporation Act, § 858.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑89—BOARD OF TRUSTEES—SPECIAL MEETING WITHOUT NOTICE—RATIFICATION OF VOID PROCEEDINGS.

Where a municipal board of trustees at a special meeting, invalid because of want of written notice, resolved to purchase certain lots, such action could not be ratified at a subsequent legally constituted meeting; the proceedings at the first meeting being not merely defective, but absolutely void.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS 🔑85—ACTION OF BOARD OF TRUSTEES—SUFFICIENCY OF RESOLUTION.

Proceedings before a municipal board of trustees purporting to ratify its action at a prior illegal meeting in authorizing the purchase of land and directing a warrant to be drawn in payment, held insufficient in itself to authorize the purchase of the property, or to constitute the adoption of an original order for the payment of the specified amount.

Mandamus by the City of Orange, a municipal corporation, against W. E. Clement, as treasurer of the City of Orange. Petition for peremptory writ denied, and alternative writ discharged.

W. R. Garrett, City Atty., of Orange, and Scarborough & Forgy, of Santa Ana, for petitioner.

F. C. Drumm, of Orange, and Head & Rutan, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Mandamus. Assuming the facts to be those stated in the petition filed by plaintiff herein, an alternative writ of mandate was issued requiring that the defendant, as treasurer of the city of Orange, a city of the sixth class, pay out of the city hall fund of the city of Orange a certain warrant for the sum of $3,150 in payment for certain lands alleged to have been purchased by the city to be used as a city hall site, or show cause why he did not pay the same.

The complaint alleged that on March 3, 1919, at a special meeting of the plaintiff's board of trustees, duly called to consider certain offers and proposals to sell to the plaintiff suitable lots for the stated purpose, a resolution was duly adopted by the vote of four members of said board, the fifth member being absent, which resolution determined that the city should purchase certain described lots at a stated price, and which resolution was duly approved and published; that on April 14, 1919, at a regular monthly meeting of the board of trustees, a resolution was adopted which, after reciting the adoption and publication of the former resolution and that no objection had been made thereto and that no request for a referendum thereon had been presented or filed, ordered that the warrant be drawn; that said warrant was drawn and presented to the defendant, who refused to pay the same; that at an adjourned regular meeting of the board of trustees duly held on April 30, 1919, said refusal of the treasurer to pay said warrant was reported to the board, and thereupon a resolution was duly adopted by unanimous vote of the four members then present, ratifying and confirming all proceedings of the board for the purchase of said lots, and directing that proceedings be taken to compel defendant to pay the warrant; that at a special meeting of said board duly called and held on May 15, 1919, at which all members of the board were present and voting, a resolution was unanimously adopted demanding the payment of said warrant and instructing that the city attorney present the warrant to the defendant and demand payment of the same; that such demand was made, but defendant refused to make the demanded payment.

[1] In his answer to the petition, defendant denied that any special meeting of the board of trustees was held on March 3, 1919, to consider said offers or proposals, or for any purpose, and denied that at any meeting of said board of trustees any resolution was adopted as alleged in the paragraph of the petition referring to said meeting of March 3, 1919. Evidence was heard by this court upon the issue so raised. From such evidence it appears, and this court finds, that no written notice of said alleged special meeting of March 3, 1919, was delivered to any member of the board of trustees, and that one member of the board was absent from the alleged meeting. This being so, it follows that said meeting and all proceedings thereof were void. Municipal Corporations Act, § 858; Stats. 1883, p. 268; Deering's Gen. Laws, 1915 Ed. p. 1121.

[2] Counsel for petitioner contend that, even if the meeting and resolution of March 3, 1919, are void, the warrant nevertheless is valid by reason of the resolution of April 14, 1919, adopted at a regular meeting of the board; that the board of trustees had power at such regular meeting to ratify the former proceedings, and, at all events, had power at that time to purchase the property and order that a warrant issue to pay the purchase price. This contention cannot be sustained on the ground that it was a ratification of former proceedings. Those proceedings were not merely defective action occurring at a legally constituted meeting; they were absolutely void, and were no action at all on the part of the city or any authorized agency thereof.

[3] In order to constitute authority for the issuance of the warrant in question, the resolution of April 14, 1919, must first be held to be sufficient in itself as an original proceeding for the purchase of the property and as an original order for the payment of the amount specified. But this resolution did not contain any language purporting to constitute a present determination that the city acquire land for city hall purposes or at all. It is wholly without those elements of legislative action which must precede the acquisition of property for purposes like those here proposed. There being, therefore, no legal ground for the issuance of the warrant, the defendant was justified in his refusal to make the demanded payment.

The petition for a peremptory writ is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

PATTERSON GLASS CO. v. THOMAS et al. (Civ. 1971.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 12, 1919.)

1. INJUNCTION 🔑118(3) — INDUCING EMPLOYÉS TO BREACH CONTRACT—NOTICE OF CONTRACT—PLEADING.

In an action by an employer to enjoin third persons from inducing employés to breach their contract of employment, complaint held, as against a general demurrer, to sufficiently allege that defendants had knowledge that a contract of employment existed.

2. INJUNCTION 🔑118(3) — INDUCING EMPLOYÉS TO BREACH CONTRACT—CONSPIRACY —PLEADING.

In an action to enjoin members of a labor union from inducing plaintiff's employés from breaching their contracts, complaint held to sufficiently allege that defendants conspired together for the purpose of inducing the employés to break their contract, and were engaged in an effort to induce them to abandon their employment.

3. INJUNCTION 🔑63—INDUCING EMPLOYÉ TO BREACH CONTRACT—REMEDIES.

An employer may enjoin third persons from inducing employés, by threats or otherwise, from breaching their contracts of employment.

4. INJUNCTION 🔑57 — INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT.

The employment of workmen under a contract by a glass manufacturer for the season of 1917 and 1918, held subject to protection by injunction against interference by third persons, and not an employment at will of such persons, although no number of months of the season were specified, and it was agreed that the workmen could be discharged or could quit on seven days' notice, so that the contract was terminable under Civ. Code, § 1999, at the will of either party.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT 🔑339—INTERFERENCE WITH CONTRACTS OF EMPLOYMENT.

Although workingmen have the right to organize a union of their craft for the purpose of improving the working conditions of the members of such organization, and to maintain such improved conditions by peaceable means, they do not have the right to induce employés, by threats or otherwise, to break their contracts of employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Suit by the Patterson Glass Company against Herbert Thomas and William Pickering, individually and as members of the National Window Glass Workers' Association. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Gordon A. Stewart and R. C. Minor, both of Stockton, for appellant.

Ben Berry and Lawrence Edwards, both of Stockton, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. A general demurrer to the amended complaint of plaintiff was sustained, plaintiff was given leave to file a second amended complaint, and, upon its failure so to do, judgment of dismissal was entered, from which judgment plaintiff prosecutes this appeal upon the judgment roll.

The sole question presented for decision is: Does the amended complaint state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action?

The complaint alleges:

> That plaintiff is a California corporation doing business at the city of Stockton, in San Joaquin county, being engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling window glass and operating a glass plant for that purpose. That in the operation of its plant it is necessary that plaintiff should have in its employ skilled artisans. That "to that end and purpose the plaintiff entered into a contract during the month of September, 1917, at which time it commenced the operation of its plant, with approximately 75 artisans to work for the plaintiff during the season of 1917–1918, under the terms of which contract of employment the plaintiff agreed that the said artisans could work for the plaintiff during said period of time, and that so long as said artisans faithfully discharged their duties in the employ of plaintiff, the plaintiff would not discharge any of said artisans without giving to said discharged artisans seven days' notice prior to the date when said discharge became effective, and, in like manner, each of said artisans agreed with the plaintiff that he would not quit the employ of the plaintiff during said season, unless prior to quitting such employ he gave to the plaintiff seven days' notice of his intention to leave the services of the plaintiff. That the foregoing mentioned artisans being insufficient in number to meet the requirements of the plaintiff, it was compelled to and did during the month of September, 1917, enter into a contract with approximately 30 artisans" in different cities of the United States "to leave their homes and come to Stockton, Cal., to work for the plaintiff in its plant." That plaintiff agreed to pay their traveling expenses and said artisans agreed to work for so long a period as would be necessary to repay to plaintiff, in weekly installments, the moneys so advanced as traveling expenses, and that a similar agreement as above mentioned, regarding seven days' notice, was entered into between said artisans and the plaintiff.

It is then alleged:

That the defendant National Window Glass Association "is a voluntary unincorporated association of individuals" composed of workers in the window glass business, and that defendants Thomas and Pickering are members thereof. That its office and principal place of business is in Cleveland, Ohio. "That the business of said association is the collection of dues and fines from said members, the fixing of hours of labor and the compensation of said members. * * * That the compensation of said members is based upon the value of the product produced by their labor. That the said association, for the purpose of increasing the sale cost of glass, limits the production of said glass by prohibiting its members from engaging as journeymen in the manufacture of window glass except for such duration of time in each year as may be designated by the association. That it has been the custom of said association to limit the annual output of glass by refusing to permit its members to work for a certain number of months in a year. That the association, in the fall of each year, fixes its scale of wages to be paid to its members by employers. That until said wage scale goes into effect its members are not to perform any services as journeymen to any employers. That said association gave notice to the plaintiff that it would not permit its members to work for plaintiff prior to the 1st day of December, 1917. That the plaintiff opened its plant for the manufacture of glass upon the 15th day of September, 1917, and thereupon received in its employ a large number of journeymen window glass artisans who were members of said association. That no dispute exists between the plaintiff and its employés as to the hours of labor or compensation, and said employés are satisfied and content with their employment."

It is next alleged:

That during the month of September, 1917, "the defendants entered into a combination, federation, and conspiracy for the purpose of coercing the plaintiff to shut down its plant and not to operate the same until such time as the said defendants would consent thereto; the object and purpose of said combination, confederation, and conspiracy being to limit the output of glass, restricting its manufacture, and thereby increasing the cost of production to the consuming public, and out of the increased cost so manipulated to increase the wages of said members employed in the manufacture of window glass." That defendants, for said purposes, "are seeking to induce, procure, and entice the said artisans to quit their employment with the plaintiff, without giving any notice to said plaintiff, * * * and to that end and purpose are promising divers employés of the plaintiff that in the event that such employés abandon their contract of employment with the plaintiff, said defendants will pay money to said employés in the way of living expenses of said employés to the 1st day of December, 1917, and at said last-mentioned time will transport, at the expense of the defendants, the said employés so abandoning their contracts" to Eastern points where they might find employment. That the acts of the defendants are for the purpose of rendering the operation of plaintiff's plant unprofitable, and that skilled workmen are not available in California to take the places of any employés who may be induced to leave plaintiff's employment.

It is further alleged:

"That it would be extremely difficult in a suit of law for the plaintiff to ascertain the amount of compensation which would equalize the damages sustained by it in the enticement of its employés from its service. That said damages would result from the loss of material and overhead expenses resulting from the decreased output of the plant, depreciation in the value of the glass products by its not being handled seasonably at the proper time, the fluctuating market in the sale of glass, and the expenses of procuring or endeavoring to procure other employés to fill the places of those who are enticed from its employment, and the cost of transporting said employés from Eastern points to Stockton, Cal. That these and other damages which will result to the plaintiff if the defendants are permitted to entice from its employment its skilled artisans are extremely difficult to ascertain, and an action at law against said defendants would not afford adequate relief."

Also:

"That the plaintiff is informed and believes that all of the defendants, save and except the National Window Glass Workers' Association, are insolvent and judgment proof. That the assets of the National Window Glass Workers' Association, if any, are without the state of California, and beyond the process of this court. That by reason of these facts, the plaintiff alleges that it has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. That said defendants threaten to and will, unless restrained by this court, continue to solicit and to entice plaintiff's employés from its employment, to the great and irreparable injury of said plaintiff."

The prayer is that—

Defendants and each of them be "enjoined and restrained from knowingly and intentionally causing or attempting to cause, by threats, offers of money, payments of money, offering to pay expenses, or by any like inducement or persuasion, any employé of the plaintiff under contract of hire to break such contract to render service to the plaintiff by quitting the plaintiff's employment, or from knowingly and intentionally causing, or attempting to cause, by threats, offers of money, payments of money, offering to pay expenses, or by like inducement or persuasion, any employé of the plaintiff to quit his employment, or preventing or deterring them or any of them from rendering services to the plaintiff by any like means, scheme, or plan; and for such other and further relief as to the court seems meet and equitable."

In support of the order sustaining the demurrer the respondents advance certain propositions: (1) Attention is called to the averments of the complaint in which it was stated that an agreement existed between plaintiff and its employés that so long as the latter faithfully discharged their duties plaintiff would not discharge any of them without giving seven days' notice, and that the employés agreed to give like notice before quitting the employ of plaintiff. It is hence claimed that the only definite time specified was for a period of seven days. Cyc. is quoted as follows:

> "When the complaint alleges a contract of employment for a period of time, no recovery can be had where there is no evidence of a contract for a definite term of service." 26 Cyc. 1585.

Section 1999 of the Civil Code is then quoted, which reads:

> "An employment having no specified term, may be terminated at the will of either party, on notice to the other. Employment for a specified term shall mean an employment for a period greater than one month."

It is contended that if the period of time is less than a month the employment may be terminated at will, for the statute provides first what shall and what shall not be considered a "specified term." It is further claimed that the complaint nowhere alleges that defendants knew or were informed that any contract of employment existed between plaintiff and its employés, and hence defendants "had a right to assume that the employment of the members of defendant association was upon a contract of employment at will."

It is alleged in the complaint that certain of plaintiff's employés were contentedly working under wages and conditions satisfactory to them; that, requiring more artisans and not being able to obtain them in California, plaintiff sent to Eastern states and entered into contracts with 30 artisans, by which it was agreed that they would go to work for plaintiff on the same terms as the others were working under, and they further agreed to work until they had by their wages paid to plaintiff the money plaintiff had advanced to bring them to California. And it is alleged:

> That these men will shortly arrive at Stockton, "and that said defendants, conspiring one with the other, threaten to and will, unless they are restrained by the order of this court, induce, persuade, and entice said persons, by the use of money and by threats and intimidation, to violate the terms of their contract, and will induce, persuade, and entice said persons to leave the plaintiff's employ and depart from the state of California."

The men who were there at work had voluntarily entered into these contracts, and were engaged in the performance of their duties when defendants appeared upon the scene and commenced their propaganda and persuasions, as alleged in the complaint, to induce these men to quit work, the result of which, if successful, would necessarily cause plaintiff to shut down its establishment and cease its productive activities. That such an injury may not be adequately compensated in damages, but may only be thwarted by injunctive relief, is manifest.

In closing their brief, defendants, after a somewhat extended examination of the cases and text-books, including the California cases, state the following as the result:

> "(1) Where a third person has knowledge of a lawful contract existing between employer and employé, to induce such employé to break his contract is actionable, whether done in good faith or not.
> "(2) Where the employment is at will, to maliciously induce an employé to quit is actionable, but not otherwise."

The complaint does not specifically and in terms charge knowledge by defendants of the contract of employment. Referring to the employés then at work, the complaint (paragraph V) states that—

> Defendants "are seeking to induce, procure, and entice the said artisans to quit their employment with the plaintiff, without giving any notice to said plaintiff, and are seeking to induce them to leave the employ of the plaintiff, and to that end and purpose are promising divers employés of the plaintiff that, in the event that such employés abandon their contract of employment with the plaintiff, said defendants will pay money to said employés in the way of living expenses of said employés to the 1st of December, 1917, and at said last-mentioned time will transport, at the expense of the defendants, the said employés so abandoning their contract of employment with the plaintiff from Stockton, Cal., to Eastern points where they might find employment in their respective trades."

We think that by fair implication it sufficiently appears that defendants knew that the employés of plaintiff were working under a contract with plaintiff. An inference that they were ignorant of the fact that a contract existed is inconsistent with the averments of the complaint. One of the points contended for by defendants was that the men should not work until December 1st, whereas some were then at work and others expected to commence work. By seeking to induce them not to go to work until December 1st and to cease work until that time, defendants lend aid to the inference that they knew they were endeavoring to cause the employés to break the existing contract of employment under which they were working.

The acts which it was charged defendants were committing seem to have been directed to bringing about a breach of their contracts by the employés in respect to the express terms of their contracts, and this gives rise to the implication that defendants must have known, not only that the employés were working under contract engagements, but that they knew the terms of the contracts. We do not think, however, that it was necessary to allege specifically what the terms were. The defendants are charged with seeking to induce plaintiff's employés to quit work without giving any notice; they are promising to furnish the employés with money to cover their living expenses if they would break their contract; that they would furnish them money to pay their expenses in returning to the states from whence they came. These and like averments, admitted by the general demurrer, would seem to show that defendants had knowledge that plaintiff's employés were working under existing contracts.

We confess some difficulty in determining just what was intended by the Legislature in the enactment of section 1999 of the Civil Code. But, whatever the intention was and whatever its meaning, it cannot be held to dispute the facts, admitted by the demurrer, that plaintiff's employés were working under contract engagements, and, among other things, had agreed not to quit work without giving seven days' notice. In addition, the employés soon to arrive from the East were under contract to work until they had repaid to plaintiff the advances of money made by plaintiff in transporting them to California. We do not believe that the section of the Civil Code relied upon should be given a construction which would justify a court of equity in holding that these employés were working "at will," i. e., that they could quit work without notice and without paying plaintiff its money advances. What the section may mean as to the mutual relation of employer and employé, it was not intended that third persons could with impunity induce the employés to violate their contract and thus evade the lawful right of the employer to their services. If the section may be construed, as between employer and employé, that the engagement was "at will," it cannot mean that the employé was working at the will of a third person.

The questions here involved have had the attention of the courts in many cases and under great variety of circumstances. Certain principles have been settled with but little disagreement—defendants' proposition that it is actionable for a third person, having knowledge that an employé is working under contract, to induce such employé to break his contract, may be set down as one of these settled principles. Indeed, some of the courts have held that such acts are actionable where no contract for a specified period exists.

In Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, 245 U. S. 229, 251, 38 Sup. Ct. 65, 72 (62 L. Ed. 260, L. R. A. 1918C, 497, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 461), the court said:

> "Plaintiff, having in the exercise of its undoubted rights established a working agreement between it and its employés, with the free assent of the latter, is entitled to be protected in the enjoyment of the resulting status, as in any other legal right. That the employment 'was at will,' and terminated by either party at any time, is of no consequence."

The writer of the opinion quotes as follows from Truax v. Raich, 239 U. S. 33, 38, 36 Sup. Ct. 7, 9 (60 L. Ed. 131, L. R. A. 1916D, 545, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 283):

> "It is said that the bill does not show an employment for a term, and that under an employment at will the complainant could be discharged at any time for any reason or for no reason; the motive of the employer being immaterial. The conclusion, however, that is sought to be drawn is too broad. The fact that the employment is at the will of the parties, respectively, does not make it one at the will of others. The employé has manifest interest in the freedom of the employer to exercise his judgment without illegal interference or compulsion, and, by the weight of authority, the unjustified interference of third persons is actionable, although the employment is at will" (citing many cases).

Pursuing the subject the court said:

> "In short, plaintiff was and is entitled to the good will of its employés, precisely as a merchant is entitled to the good will of his customers, although they are under no obligation to continue to deal with him. The value of the relation lies in the reasonable probability that by properly treating its employés, and paying them fair wages, and avoiding reasonable grounds for complaint, it will be able to retain them in its employ, and to fill vacancies occurring from time to time by the employment of other men on the same terms. The pecuniary value of such reasonable probabilities is incalculably great, and is recognized by the law in a variety of cases" (citing cases).

In the Hitchman Case the defense was advanced that all measures may be resorted to if they are "peaceable," that is, if they stop short of physical violence, or coercion through fear of it. The court said:

> "In our opinion, any violation of plaintiff's legal rights contrived by defendants for the purposes of inflicting damage, or having that as its necessary effect, is as plainly inhibited by the law as if it involved a breach of the peace. A combination to procure concerted breaches of contract by plaintiff's employés constitutes such a violation" (citing cases).

Eagle Glass & Mfg. Co. v. Rome, 245 U. S. 275, 38 Sup. Ct. 89, 62 L. Ed. 286, is similar to the Hitchman Case, and was decided upon the authority of that case. Upon the question of employment "at will" the case of George Jonas Glass Co. v. Glass Blowers' Ass'n, 77 N. J. Eq. 219, 79 Atl. 262, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 445; Folsom v. Lewis, 208 Mass. 336, 94 N. E. 316, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 787, are instructive.

We do not think it necessary in the present case to follow these cases in their view as to engagement "at will," for here, we think, were contracts which defendants had no right, by peaceable or other means, to cause the employés to break. Our Supreme Court seems to have held that an employé may, with or without reason, stop work, if by so doing he does not violate his contract, and where there are no contractual relations employés may strike without notice. Parkinson & Co. v. Building Trades Council, 154 Cal. 594, 98 Pac. 1027, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 550; Pierce v. Stablemen's Union, 156 Cal. 70, 103 Pac. 324. Holding, as the learned trial judge did, that no contract was pleaded, he probably regarded the object of defendants to be lawful. If so, we think his decision was without a sustaining premise.

We quote from the text-books as follows:

> "The doctrine that it is not lawful to induce to quit employment applies even in the absence of any contract to serve for a fixed period; a fortiori does not apply to inducing to quit employment in violation of a contract to serve for a fixed period." Cooke on Combination, Monopolies, and Labor Unions, § 67.
> "Where a union (by statute made liable to be sued) or its officers or members, intentionally and without just cause or excuse, induces another's employés to quit his service in breach of their contracts of employment, he is entitled to recover the damages resulting from such tortious acts, from such union, or from such combination of officers or members, and this has been held true whether the means used is peaceable persuasion, or intimidation, or threats, or abusive language, or a system of espionage. Procuring a breach of such contracts is not justifiable as legitimate trade competition, and it is immaterial that those inducing the breach of contract acted in good faith and without ill will toward the employer." Martin on Modern Laws of Labor Unions, § 207.

The right to injunctive relief is no longer questioned, and it is no justification that defendants acted without ill will but in good faith, in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution of the union prohibiting its members from working with nonunion men; the employer not being aware of or a party to such provisions.

> "The rule applies where the means to procure the breach of contract are mere molestation or annoyance, payment of money or of transportation advances, abusive language, or violence or threats of violence, and where no justification is shown the rule is applicable, where the method employed to procure the breach of contract is persuasion." Id. § 209.

In Thacker Coal & Coke Co. v. Burke, 59 W. Va. 253, 53 S. E. 161, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1091, 8 Ann. Cas. 885, it was held that—

> "Persons who conspire to induce others to break a valid contract between other persons are liable to actions therefor."

In Frank v. Herold, 63 N. J. Eq. 443, 52 Atl. 152, the court said:

> "Now, the relation of master and servant being shown to exist, the law is quite clear that no person has a right to entice away another's servant. * * * The right of a master to have his servant continue in his employ without molestation * * * is a recognized property right."

This doctrine finds support in many cases, among which are the following: Brown Hardware Co. v. Indiana Stove Works, 96 Tex. 453, 73 S. W. 800; Butterfield v. Ashley, 6 Cush. (Mass.) 249; Bixby v. Dunlap, 56 N. H. 456, 22 Am. Rep. 475; Haskins v. Royster, 70 N. C. 601, 16 Am. Rep. 780; Jones v. Blocker, 43 Ga. 331.

Some objection is made to the complaint in failing to state the particular acts or facts relating to the things which it is alleged have been done or that defendants threatened to do. The foregoing, however, disposes of the grounds on which, counsel seem to agree, the trial court sustained the demurrer, and is, we think, decisive.

The judgment is reversed.

BURNETT, J. [1-3] I concur in the judgment and generally in the opinion of the Presiding Justice. It is admitted by respondents that—

> "Where a third person has knowledge of a lawful contract existing between employer and employé, to induce such employé to break his contract is actionable, whether done in good faith or not."

Assuming that to be the law, we must hold that the complaint, while admittedly imperfect, is sufficient as against a general demurrer. It does appear, as pointed out in the main opinion, that defendants had knowledge of the contract, although it is to be regretted that such fact was not explicitly alleged. That the contract between plaintiff and its employés was and is lawful, of course, does not admit of doubt. And that it sufficiently appears that defendants have not only conspired together for the purpose of inducing the employés to break such contract, but are actually engaged in the effort to induce them to discontinue and abandon their employment, I think cannot be successfully controverted. In my opinion, there is much of surplusage in the complaint, and I feel satisfied that it is open to attack on the ground of uncertainty in certain particulars. But we are called upon to deal with the single question whether it states facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Accepting the law applicable to the case as stated by respondents themselves, it seems to me we must hold the complaint sufficient. In considering the case, it is not improper to notice that the conduct of respondents relates not only to those artisans in the East who have contracted to work but have not yet entered upon their employment, but it has reference also to the employés who were actually engaged in carrying out the terms of their employment. While it might be doubted whether the allegations of the complaint are sufficient as to those who have not entered upon their employment, there is no such doubt of the sufficiency of the complaint as to the other class.

[4] I may add that, in my opinion, the situation does not call for a discussion of the rule applicable to instances of employment at will. It appears that the workmen herein were employed for the season of 1917 and 1918. While the number of months of the season is not specified, I think we have a right to assume that it was for a longer period than one month, and that its exact duration was capable of ascertainment and proof. It is true that there was another agreement that the employés would not abandon their work until certain advancements had been restored to plaintiff, and that they would give seven days' notice of their intention to quit, but this was not inconsistent with the terms of the contract requiring them to work during the season of 1917 and 1918.

[5] Of course, there is no intention herein to question "the right of workingmen to organize a union of their craft for the purpose of improving the working conditions of the members of such organization, and to maintain such improved conditions by peaceful means," but we have to take the complaint as we find it, and it appears therein that defendants are violating the law, which is enacted for the protection of all classes; and whether the allegations can be proved or not, we must hold them sufficient to require an answer.

FLICKINGER v. McKESSON. (Civ. 2901.)

1. Evidence ⚷348(2)—Foreign Judgments—Clerk's Certificate.

In an action on a foreign judgment, a certificate of the clerk of the foreign court that papers offered in evidence "are true and correct copies" of certain enumerated records, "as full and complete as the same remains on file and of record in my office," will be held sufficient as against an objection that it fails to certify "that the papers are copies of the originals on file in this office."

2. Evidence ⚷348(2)—Foreign Judgment—Authentication.

In an action on a foreign judgment, the certificate of authentication of the clerk of the foreign court will not be held insufficient in that the words "county clerk of County of P. and ex officio" were erased from before the words "clerk of the district court of said P. County," where the judge certified that he was the clerk, and that his signature was genuine, although the clerk in his certificate to the official character of the judge did not erase such descriptive words, and although such erasures were unexplained.

3. Appeal and Error ⚷757(1)—Alternative Method of Appeal—Record.

Where an appeal is taken under the alternative method, it is incumbent upon appellant to point out in the record the matter he relies upon to support his points.

4. Evidence ⚷178(9)—Secondary Evidence—Assignment of Judgment.

In an action by an assignee of a foreign judgment, a certified copy of an assignment of the judgment as recorded in the court where the judgment was rendered was properly admitted in evidence, where the evidence was undisputed that the original assignment which had been made and delivered to plaintiff was lost, and that the lost assignment was in the same form as the one shown in the record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Laura Flickinger, administratrix of the estate of I. N. Flickinger, deceased, against O. P. McKesson. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

P. S. McNutt, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an action by the assignee on a foreign judgment. Defendant appeals from the judgment here under the alternative method. The only errors assigned are as to the sufficiency of the identification and authentication of the record from the district court of the state of Iowa, where the judgment sued on was obtained, and of the assignment thereof to plaintiff. We find no merit in the appeal.

In the first place, our attention is called to an exhibit in the record, being marked Defendant's Exhibit 3, exemplified abstract of judgment in the original suit, with certificate of the clerk of the court in which the matter was pending of the subsequent assignment of the judgment to the plaintiff here. The facts therein set forth, if binding on the defendant—as they appear to be, he having introduced them in evidence—are sufficient to support the judgment here appealed from. But, aside from this, the exhibits, to the introduction of which defendant takes exception, were sufficiently proved and authenticated to admit them as evidence.

[1] The first exception is to Plaintiff's Exhibit 1, being a certificate of the clerk of the Iowa court to the record supporting the original judgment, on the ground that it fails to certify "that the papers are copies of the originals on file in this office." What the clerk does certify is that the papers therein enumerated "are true and correct copies" of certain enumerated records, "as full and complete as the same remains on file and of record in my office." As the copies enumerated include all that is necessary to prove the judgment, and are of the records on file, we see no reason to question the sufficiency of the certificate, so far as the specified ground of the objection goes.

[2] The second specification is alleged error in admitting in evidence Plaintiff's Exhibit 2, being the certificate of authentication, because of certain unexplained erasures. The typewritten certificate of the clerk to the judgment record, and the certificate of the judge to the clerk's attestation, contain the following descriptive words in each reference to the clerk:

> "I, J. N. Tollinger, county clerk of the county of Pottawattamie, state of Iowa, and ex officio clerk of the district court of said Pottawattamie county, state of Iowa."

In these recitals the words "county clerk of the county of Pottawattamie, and ex officio," have been erased. This leaves these certificates as relating alone to the official in question as the "clerk of the district court of said Pottawattamie county." The judge of the district court certifies that the signature is the genuine signature of said J. N. Tollinger; that the seal annexed thereto is the seal of said district court; that said Tollinger, as such clerk, is the proper official to execute the said certificate and attestation; and that such attestation is in due form, etc.

Section 1905 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a judicial record of a sister state "may be proved by the attestation of the clerk and the seal of the court annexed, if there be a clerk and seal, together with a certificate of the chief judge or presiding magistrate that the attestation is in due form." The certificates, therefore, as they stand, contain all that is necessary to the authentication of the record. If the certifying officer is, as described, the clerk of the court, that is sufficient. The matter erased is mere surplusage. The certification would be good under either state of the facts. The final certificate to the official character of the judge in this exemplification contains the full recital without erasures, and is signed, "J. N. Tollinger, County Clerk of the County of Pottawattamie, State of Iowa, and ex officio Clerk of the District Court of Iowa, in and for Pottawattamie County." As the certificate is in due form either way, the erasures are immaterial.

[3, 4] The third assignment of error is upon the admission in evidence of Plaintiff's Exhibit 3, which is in terms an assignment by the judgment creditor of the Iowa judgment to the plaintiff here, before the present action was commenced. The exhibit is certified to by the clerk of the Iowa court as being a true copy of an assignment of said judgment, "as the same remains of record and on file" in his office. Appellant's counsel states in his brief that this exhibit was admitted in evidence over defendant's objection that it was incompetent and not the best evidence; but we find no record of such, or any, objection, either in the appendix to appellant's brief or in the reference given to the reporter's transcript. This appeal being taken under the alternative method, it is incumbent on the appellant to point out in the record the matter he relies upon to support his points. In any event, the undisputed evidence outside of this record is ample to show that an assignment in writing, which was lost, had been made and delivered to the plaintiff here before suit on the judgment was commenced, and the document introduced as Plaintiff's Exhibit 3 was properly used in evidence as the basis of plaintiff's parol testimony as to the contents of the lost assignment; it being testified by one of plaintiff's witnesses that the lost assignment was in the same form as the one shown in the exhibit.

Judgment affirmed.

CRIST et al. v. FIFE et al. (Civ. 2816.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 10, 1919.)

1. Appeal and Error ⚷1011(1)—Findings of Fact—Conflicting Evidence.

A finding of the trial court based upon conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

2. Covenants ⚷42(1)—Against Incumbrances—"Suffered."

"Suffered," as used in Civ. Code. § 1113, relating to implied covenant against incumbrances "suffered by the grantor," implies reasonable control, and does not apply to an incumbrance not caused by the act of the party nor within his power to prevent.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Suffer.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Suit by Wiley F. Crist and others against Nettie Fife and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Edward R. Eliassen, of Oakland, for appellants.

Roscoe D. Jones, of Oakland, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This suit is one for the rescission of a contract for the purchase of certain residence property, the cancellation of a note and mortgage given as part payment therefor, and the recovery of money paid thereon.

The complaint charged that respondents had falsely and knowingly, and with intent to deceive appellants, represented that the title to the property was free and clear of all incumbrances of every kind, and that appellants relied upon these representations, whereas there were in fact certain building restrictions against the property. The trial court found that the claimed representations were not made, and judgment went in favor of defendants.

[1] It is first claimed as ground for reversal that this finding on the alleged representations is not supported by the evidence. There was a conflict upon this subject, and the finding is conclusive here.

As a further ground for reversal it is urged that, notwithstanding this question, the facts found by the trial court necessitate a reversal of the judgment. These facts, in substance, are as follows:

On the 28th day of August, 1911, the respondents sold to appellants the residence property for the sum of $6,850, receiving $1,000 on account thereof, with a mortgage for $5,850, upon which appellants subsequently paid $4,400. On May 28, 1917, appellants discovered that the property was burdened with certain building restrictions. The restrictions provided: (1) That the building should be used only as a residence; (2) that no building should be erected on the premises to cost less than $3,000, nor nearer than 20 feet to the street frontage; (3) that no saloon or mercantile business should be maintained or conducted thereon.

These restrictions were to remain in force until the 29th day of November, 1917, and in the case of any violation thereof the property was to revert to the original grantor. There was also a sewer right of way across the property. Appellants first learned of the existence of the restrictions and conditions above set forth on May 28, 1917. None of them were contained in the deed from respondent to appellants. The former had purchased the property at a foreclosure sale, and they too knew nothing concerning their existence at the time of the conveyance to appellants. The form of deed adopted by the respondents in making the conveyance of the property to appellants was one of grant, bargain, and sale.

These facts appellants claim show that the property was burdened with incumbrances that the form of deed adopted by the parties insured against, for which reason they claim the right of rescission.

We are of the opinion that there is no merit in the contention. By section 1113 of the Civil Code the word "grant," in any conveyance by which an estate is to be passed, insures to the purchaser an implied covenant, unless restrained, of (1) that previous to the time of the execution of such conveyance the grantor has not conveyed the same; (2) that such estate is at such time free from incumbrances done, made, or suffered by the grantor.

[2] Assuming that the building restrictions here involved constitute incumbrances under the implied covenants contained in the statute, and that they are enforceable against appellants, such incumbrances were upon the property at the time the grantor acquired the title to it, and they are therefore not within the covenant against incumbrances "done, made, or suffered" by the grantor, for the reason that he has not created or caused them to exist. "Suffered," as used in the statute, implies reasonable control, and it cannot be held to apply to an incumbrance not caused by the act of the party nor within his power to prevent. Smith v. Eigerman, 5 Ind. App. 269, 31 N. E. 862, 51 Am. St. Rep. 281; Polak v. Mattson, 22 Idaho, 727, 128 Pac. 89.

Conceding therefore, that this question is properly before us, it can avail appellants nothing.

For the reasons given the judgment is affirmed.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷330(1)—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSONS—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION —EVIDENCE.

The prima facie case made by one damaged by negligent driving of an automobile, when he proves that the automobile belonged to defendant and that the driver was the employé of defendant, is based on an "inference," and not on any "presumption" declared by law, that the employé was acting within the scope of his employment.

2. EVIDENCE ⚷53—"INFERENCE."

When we say that a certain "inference" is warranted by certain facts proved, we mean no more than that jury is reasonably warranted in making that deduction from those facts, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1958.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Inference.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚷330(3)—INJURIES TO THIRD PERSONS—EVIDENCE—INFERENCES.

Where plaintiff shows that he was damaged by defendant's automobile through the negligence of defendant's employé in driving, an inference arises that the employé was acting within the scope of his employment, but such inference disappears upon the introduction of uncontradicted evidence that the employé was not acting within the scope of his employment, and a verdict for plaintiff, under such circumstances, would be contrary to the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by J. L. Maupin against B. Solomon and M. A. Gunst & Company, Incorporated. Judgment for plaintiff, and the last-named defendant appealed. Judgment reversed in appellate court, and petition for rehearing denied in Supreme Court.

Short & Sutherland, of Fresno, for appellant.

M. M. Dearing, of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the corporation defendant from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action for damages arising through the destruction of an automobile belonging to plaintiff as a result of a collision alleged to have been due to the negligence of the defendants.

At the time of the collision the defendant Solomon was in the employ of his codefendant, M. A. Gunst & Co., as a traveling salesman, with headquarters in the city of Fresno, and whose duties embraced the solicitation of customers for the purpose of selling the merchandise of his employer. To facilitate the discharge of that duty he was furnished by his employer with an automobile, which he was instructed to use only in the course of his employment. In the forenoon of February 22, 1917, being a public holiday, Solomon called on several customers, but in the afternoon he transacted no business, spending most of that time at the Elks' Club. In the early part of the evening, in pursuance of his personal recreation, he took two of his friends for a ride in the aforesaid automobile, intending thereafter to dine in a public café in Fresno. During this ride, and while the automobile was being driven by Solomon at a high rate of speed in said city, it collided with plaintiff's car, which was standing near or alongside of a street sidewalk, with its tail light burning. Plaintiff's car was practically demolished by the force of the collision.

It is not denied, as testified to by the witnesses introduced by appellant, and corroborated by the surrounding circumstances, that at the time of the accident Solomon was engaged in a pursuit wholly his own, and that such use of the automobile was without the consent of and against the instructions of the appellant. Nor is it disputed that the accident was the result of the negligence of Solomon. But plaintiff's contention in support of the judgment is that when he proved that the automobile belonged to the appellant and was being operated by its employé at the time of the collision, a presumption arose that the employé was acting within the scope of his employment, and that such presumption remained in the case in spite of the clear, positive, and uncontradicted evidence that Solomon was not so acting, and created a substantial conflict in the evidence, with the result that the action of the court in denying a motion for a new trial must be sustained upon appeal.

With this position we cannot agree. The inference relied upon by respondent cannot be indulged under the circumstances of this case. It must yield to the direct and unequivocal evidence rebutting such inference. "Presumptions," such as the one relied on here, "are allowed to stand, not against the facts they represent, but in lieu of proof of them," and when "the fact is proven contrary to the presumption, no conflict arises; the presumption is simply overcome and dispelled." Savings, etc., Soc. v. Burnett, 106 Cal. 514, 39 Pac. 922. The authorities in this state abundantly support this view. Freese v. Hibernia, etc., Soc., 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; King v. Hercules Powder Co., decided by this court December 20, 1918, 178 Pac. 531; Mullia v. Ye Planry Building Co., 32 Cal.

App. 6, 161 Pac. 1008; Mauchle v. Panama Int. Exp. Co., 174 Pac. 400.

The very recent case of Brown v. Chevrolet Motor Co. of Cal., 179 Pac. 697, in an essential respect is like this case. There a traveling salesman employed by the defendant borrowed its automobile for a pleasure excursion, and while so using it injured the plaintiff. There, as here, the plaintiff contended that he had made out a prima facie case when he had shown that the automobile belonged to the defendant, and that it was the province of the jury to weigh any evidence in conflict therewith; but the court held that a nonsuit had been properly granted, and, quoting from the case of Matter of Carroll v. Knickerbocker Ice Co., 218 N. Y. 435, 113 N. E. 507, Ann. Cas. 1918B, 540, said:

> "The presumption growing out of a prima facie case * * * remains only so long as there is no substantial evidence to the contrary. When that is offered the presumption disappears, and, unless met by further proof, there is nothing to justify a finding based solely upon it."

In the last analysis respondent's position is in effect that, granting the evidence introduced by appellant rebutting the presumption relied upon is convincing and uncontradicted, it merely creates a conflict in the evidence, and that a finding of the jury in accordance with the presumption is under those circumstances supported thereby. This, we think, is not the law.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

On Rehearing in Supreme Court.

PER CURIAM. [1-3] In denying the petition for hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First appellate district, division 1, we desire to point out that respondent's prima facie case was based solely on an "inference," and not on any "presumption" declared by law. When we say that a certain inference is warranted by certain facts proved, we mean no more than that the jury is reasonably warranted in making that deduction from those facts. Section 1958, Code Civ. Proc. In this case the direct uncontradicted evidence introduced in response to the prima facie case as to the circumstances under which the employé of appellant was driving appellant's automobile was of such a nature as to leave no reasonable ground for an inference, based solely on the fact of appellant's ownership of the automobile, and the further fact that the person driving was an employé of appellant, that the driver was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident. The verdict therefore was contrary to the evidence, and this is all we understand the opinion of the District Court of Appeal to decide.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

All concur.

BANKRUPTCY ⟹186(1)—CORPORATE ASSETS—RECOVERY.

A purchaser of corporate property within four months prior to adjudication in bankruptcy who complied with a request of the seller's president and general manager by applying a portion of the purchase price toward discharging personal debts incurred for the corporation's benefit cannot be required to make such payments a second time to the corporation's trustee in bankruptcy.

HAVEN, J. Plaintiff is the trustee in bankruptcy of the Electric & Garage Company, a corporation. As such trustee he brought this suit to recover from the defendant an alleged balance of the purchase price of certain real property, improvements thereon, and equipment of a garage business, agreed to be purchased by the defendant from said corporation within four months prior to its adjudication in bankruptcy. The judgment was for the defendant, from which plaintiff appeals. It is alleged in the complaint that the defendant agreed to buy the real and personal property above referred to for the sum of $9,192.93, of which the sum of $5,500 had not been paid, and for which latter sum plaintiff prayed judgment. The court found that, with the exception of the formal denials of the corporate character and bankruptcy of the corporation, and the appointment of plaintiff as trustee, all the allegations of defendant's answer were true, and all denials therein contained were true denials. Among these are allegations that the consideration for the agreement of purchase, referred to in plaintiff's complaint, was not the payment of $9,192.93 in cash, as alleged by plaintiff, but was an assumption by the defendant of an indebtedness against the real property purchased in the sum of $3,600, an agreement by the defendant to pay $2,000 in cash, a further agreement by defendant to release one Armstrong from an obligation to said defendant in the sum of $2,000, and a still further agreement by the defendant whereby he guaranteed payment of a promissory note in the sum of $1,500, which had theretofore been executed by C. W. Crouch and J. R. Clark. The said C. W. Crouch was the president and general manager of the corporation whose property was purchased by the defendant, and was also the owner of all its capital stock, with the exception of one share. The dealings of the defendant were all had with said Crouch as such president and general manager. The answer further alleges that the defendant paid to the corporation all sums of money agreed by him to be paid and fully performed all of the undertakings which he agreed to perform in consideration of the transfer by said corporation to him. The finding of the trial court that these allegations are true is supported by sufficient evidence.

Appellant concedes that there is no material dispute as to the facts of the case, but insists that, inasmuch as the defendant testified that he was purchasing the property from the corporation, it was his duty to make payment to that corporation, and that payments made by him on personal obligations of the officers of the corporation cannot be credited on account of the purchase price. It is not alleged that the defendant knew at the time of his purchase, that the corporation was insolvent. Waiving the question as to the right of a purchaser from a corporation, without knowledge of its insolvency, to apply the agreed purchase price in accordance with the terms of a contract made with its president and general manager, it appears from the testimony that both of the payments to which objection is made by appellant were made in discharge of debts of the president and manager, Crouch, and covered moneys borrowed by him for the use of the corporation. Under such circumstances, it would indeed be a harsh rule which would compel the purchaser of corporate property to make a second payment to the trustee of a bankrupt corporation, for the reason that in making his first payment he had complied with the request of the president and general manager, and applied a portion of the purchase price to the discharge of personal debts incurred for the benefit of the corporation. The fact that one of the amounts of the indebtedness so discharged was a note payable to the defendant himself does not make him liable a second time to the plaintiff in this action.

The complaint contains no charge of fraud, and does not attempt to rescind the contract of sale. On the contrary, the demand of plaintiff for the payment of an alleged balance of the purchase price is an express affirmance of the contract. The finding of the trial court is specific to the effect that defendant has fully performed all obligations resting upon him under the contract as made. This finding is not assailed, and cannot be under the evidence. Having once performed, defendant cannot be held liable a second time to a trustee in bankruptcy who does not seek to set aside the contract.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. SALES ⚷81(5) — CONTRACT — IMPLICATION AS TO TIME.

Where a contract of sale merely provided that deliveries were to be taken before September 1st, in the absence of statement as to when the orders for and specifications of the goods should be given, the law will presume they were intended to be given within a reasonable time before the date fixed for delivery, especially under Civ. Code, §§ 1655, 1657, providing stipulations necessary to make a contract reasonable or conformable to usage are implied, and that if no time is specified for performance of an act required, reasonable time is allowed.

2. SALES ⚷88—ACTION FOR PRICE—QUESTION FOR COURT.

In action to recover for goods sold and delivered to defendant, it was the duty of the trial court to find what was a reasonable time for defendant to give orders for and specifications of the goods before the date fixed by the contract for delivery; the contract having been silent as to when the orders should be given.

3. SALES ⚷87(2)—ACTION FOR PRICE—EVIDENCE.

In an action for goods sold and delivered, evidence of the usual time required and allowed for the filling of orders given plaintiff by defendant, and of the previous dealings of the parties with respect to the time allowed for the filling of orders, and of similar matters, held relevant on the issue of what was a reasonable time for the giving of orders and specifications before the time for delivery fixed by the contract.

Gavin McNab and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an action to recover $778.76 for goods sold and delivered to the defendant. The defendant answered, admitting this amount due, and set up a counterclaim and cross-complaint against plaintiff, alleging damages for breach of contract. The trial court held that the defendant was not entitled to damages against the plaintiff upon its cross-complaint, and gave judgment for plaintiff for the full amount of its claim. Defendant appeals from this judgment and the question presented to this court is in regard to the cause of action set up in the cross-complaint. This arose out of a contract for the sale and delivery to the cross-complainant of certain "skeletons" for bottling whisky, consisting of boxes, bottles, cartons, etc. The contract is evidenced by certain letters and telegrams introduced in evidence. It calls for 15,000 cases at specified prices, delivery of the entire number to be taken by September 1, 1917. The cases were to be marked in a certain way as per directions from the cross-complainant, who was also to have the privilege of specifying sizes, the contract providing different prices for different sizes. Up to August 27, 1917, about 7,000 "skeletons" had been delivered. On that date, defendant telegraphed plaintiff, asking for an extension of 90 days within which to take delivery. This was refused by telegram, and on August 28th, defendant telegraphed for the balance of the cases called for by the contract, specifying sizes, etc., and saying that it would specify distillery markings in a day or so. On August 29th, the cross-defendant telegraphed, refusing to deliver because the order came too late to allow of delivery before September 1st. On August 31st, the cross-complainant telegraphed the cross-defendant, giving the balance of the directions necessary to fill the order and demanding delivery. This was a night letter, and arrived September 1st.

[1-3] The contract between the parties, as evidenced by the letters and telegrams, is silent as to when the orders for the "skeletons" were to be sent to the cross-defendant. The contract merely provides that deliveries are to be taken before September 1st. In the absence of any statement in the contract as to when the orders should be given, we think the law will presume that they were intended to be given within a reasonable time before the date fixed for delivery. Especially is this true, under Civil Code, §§ 1655, 1657. Section 1655 provides that stipulations which are necessary to make a contract reasonable or conformable to usage are implied in respect to matters concerning which the contract manifests no contrary intention. Section 1657 provides that if no time is specified for the performance of an act required to be performed, a reasonable time is allowed. Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. 280, 25 Am. St. Rep. 123. It was the duty of the trial court to find what was a reasonable time under all the circumstances. Evidence of the usual time required and allowed for the filling of such orders, of the previous dealings of the parties with respect to the time allowed, and similar matters, to which the cross-complainant objects, seems to us relevant upon this issue of what was a reasonable time; and such evidence is sufficient to justify the finding made by the court that "no additional skeleton cases were requested for delivery of and from plaintiff and cross-defendant by the defendant and cross-complainant reasonably in advance of and prior to the 1st day of September, 1917."

We think the evidence objected to was properly admitted. The judgment is affirmed.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought in claim and delivery to recover three mules. The complaint alleged that on or about November 22, 1917, the defendants, without the consent of plaintiff, took said mules from his possession, and have ever since retained possession of them. It also alleged that the plaintiff at the time of the commencement of said action was the owner and entitled to the possession of the mules in question, and that he had demanded their delivery prior to the institution of the action. The court found these allegations of the complaint to be true, and gave judgment accordingly in plaintiff's favor for the possession of the animals.

[1, 2] The only contention of the defendants upon appeal is that the evidence does not sustain the findings and judgment of the trial court.

There is no merit in this contention. The facts of the case, as testified to by the plaintiff and his witnesses, and which the court believed and based its findings upon, were these: On November 20, 1917, the plaintiff, who was engaged in purchasing mules for the purpose of selling them to the United States government, went with one Veach, who was a salaried employé of the government, to the defendant's ranch, located about 20 miles from Fresno, and there arranged to buy 24 head of mules, 19 of which were at the time being used in plowing the fields of the defendants, the rest of them being elsewhere about their premises. Plaintiff and Veach inspected all of these mules but one, which was described to them, and offered to buy the lot at $150 per head, which offer being accepted, the plaintiff paid a deposit of $1,000 upon the purchase price, and it was agreed that the mules should be delivered to him at the Southern Pacific stockyards in Fresno a few days later. Upon the date of delivery, the plaintiff went with Veach to the stockyards, and, according to their testimony, they there found 20 of the mules they had theretofore seen, together with 4 other mules which had been substituted for 4 of the best of those inspected and purchased. The evidence shows that this substitution was deliberately made by the defendants, and that their conduct in that behalf was reprehensible. The plaintiff rejected the four substituted animals, and with reference to them had a separate transaction with the defendants, by which he agreed to buy two of the latter mules for $75 each, and one of them for $2. He gave the defendants the $2 in cash and a check for $2,300, and then received 18 of the mules he had originally bought, returning the rejected animals.

It would thus appear that he paid the defendants upon the original transaction $3,150, which would have entitled him to 21 mules at the price of $150 each. Having received but 18 of these, he thus became entitled to the other three, which, the evidence showed, were at the time upon the defendants' ranch, where, prior to the institution of this action, the plaintiff made his demand for said three mules, which are the subject of this action.

From this statement of the facts of the case it would seem that the averments of the plaintiff's complaint to the effect that the defendants had, without the consent of the plaintiff, taken said mules from his possession, and also the finding based upon said averment, do not find support in the evidence in the case. The defendants, however, expressly concede in their brief that "the complaint contains sufficient, in addition to these useless allegations, to sustain a judgment if there was sufficient evidence of right of possession at the time the case was commenced." By this admission whatever error the court may have made in the finding above referred to is cured; and the evidence otherwise is amply sufficient to sustain the averment of the complaint and the finding of the court that at the time of the institution of this action plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the animals in question.

The judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by M. Arendt against Emmett W. McConnell. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hugo D. Newhouse, of San Francisco, and Milton Shepardson, of Oakland, for appellant.

Wise & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HAVEN, J. This action was brought for the purpose of obtaining a decree annulling an agreement of exchange between plaintiff and defendant. Plaintiff and one Edward A. Lesser were the owners in common of a certain tract of land in the county of Tulare. They jointly agreed with the defendant, McConnell, to exchange the above referred to tract of land for 3,250 shares each of the preferred and common capital stock of the Consolidated Concessions Company, and certain other considerations hereinafter referred to. The agreement was consummated by the execution and delivery to McConnell of a deed of the real property and the delivery by McConnell to the plaintiff and Lesser of certificates for the required number of shares of the capital stock of the corporation referred to. Plaintiff alleged in his complaint that the defendant made certain false representations to him with regard to the value of said stock and the assets and indebtedness of the corporation which had issued such stock; that plaintiff believed said statements were true, and relied upon them, and by reason thereof was induced to enter into the agreement of exchange; that he later discovered that the assets and affairs of the corporation were not as represented by the defendant; that defendant knew the said representations were false, and that if plaintiff had known the same, he would not have entered into the agreement of exchange; that upon the discovery of the falsity of said statements plaintiff rescinded the agreement, and so notified the defendant, and then and there tendered and offered to return to the defendant the 1,625 shares of the corporate stock which he had received as his portion of the consideration exchanged for the deed of the land; that the said shares of stock constituted everything of value which he had received in the exchange; that the defendant had refused to comply with plaintiff's demand for rescission; and that the title of the real property still stood in the name of defendant. The prayer was for a decree canceling, annulling, and setting aside the agreement of exchange, requiring defendant to account for the rents, issues, and profits of the real property, and further requiring him to execute and deliver to plaintiff a deed for his undivided interest in the real property, and for the recovery of damages. The findings of the trial court were all in favor of the defendant, and expressly negatived the making of any false or fraudulent representations by him, or the reliance by plaintiff on any such representations.

[1] Appellant concedes that these findings cannot be disturbed, in so far as they are based upon conflicting evidence, but claims that there is no evidence to support at least one of the findings. As a part of a long recital of representations which were found not to have been made by defendant, it is found that the defendant did not state or represent:

> "That said corporation owned shares of the capital stock of other corporations which owned or had or would conduct concessions at the Panama Pacific International Exposition to be held in the city and county of San Francisco, state of California, in the year 1915."

The contention of appellant that the above portion of the finding is contrary to the evidence is well founded, as it was proved without conflict that such representation was made by the defendant. It was necessary, however, for the plaintiff to show, not only that said representation was made, but that the same was false, and that plaintiff relied thereon. With regard to the latter matter, the court found:

> "That plaintiff did not rely on any representations made to him by defendant nor was he induced thereby to enter into the exchange of property above referred to."

This finding was supported by the evidence, and is not attacked by appellant. As reliance by plaintiff upon the representations alleged to have been made by defendant was a necessary part of his cause of action, proof that certain admitted representations were made, and that the same were false or fraudulent, would not have entitled plaintiff to a judgment, in view of the above finding that he did not rely upon such representations.

Appellant contends that the evidence in the record shows that the Consolidated Concessions Company did not own the shares of capital stock of the other corporations referred to in the findings, for the reason that the transaction under which said shares were purported to have been acquired by that corporation was fraudulent and void. It is also urged that the illegality and fraudulent character of this transaction would have been more clearly established if certain additional evidence offered by the plaintiff and erroneously excluded by the trial court had been admitted. Discussion of these contentions is unnecessary, for the reason that, if all that is contended for by appellant with regard thereto be conceded, his cause of action still fails on account of the above referred to finding as to lack of reliance by him upon any of the representations made.

[2] It is further contended that it is shown without conflict that the stock of the Consolidated Concessions Company never had any value, and that therefore there was no consideration for the agreement of exchange, for which reason it may be canceled without regard to a rescission on the part of plaintiff.

The evidence disclosed that, in addition to the corporate stock delivered by defendant to plaintiff and his co-owner, the sum of $1,500 was paid by defendant to Mr. Lesser, the co-owner of plaintiff, who acted as plaintiff's agent throughout the transaction. This sum was retained by Lesser and claimed by him as a commission for negotiating the exchange, but it was, nevertheless, paid by the defendant as a part of the consideration moving from him for the single agreement here sought to be set aside. It also appeared that as further consideration the defendant assumed certain indebtedness upon the real property conveyed to him by plaintiff and his co-owner, and agreed to hold them harmless from such indebtedness. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that there was a failure of consideration for the contract of exchange.

The judgment is affirmed.

Action by E. L. Roos against Robert L. Loeser. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Andrew Thorne, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wise & O'Connor, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by plaintiff by reason of the killing of her dog, of the variety known as Pomeranian, by an Airedale belonging to the defendant. A jury trial was had, and judgment went for the plaintiff in the sum of $500. Defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he now appeals from the judgment.

The complaint alleges that on the 16th day of May, 1907, the plaintiff was the owner of a Pomeranian dog of the value of $1,000; that the defendant was the owner of an Airedale, of vicious disposition and dangerous character, which on said date and for a long time prior thereto was evilly disposed towards other dogs, and was accustomed to attack them without provocation, all of which matters were well known to the defendant; that nevertheless, the defendant carelessly and negligently permitted said Airedale to go upon the public streets of San Francisco unleashed and free from restraint, and that on the day mentioned, without provocation, and while the plaintiff's dog was proceeding peaceably along the public street, said Airedale attacked it from behind, the attack resulting in breaking the neck of the Pomeranian, from which its death immediately ensued.

From the evidence it appears that on said day the Pomeranian, attended by two maids, was pursuing the even tenor of its way upon the street, "tarrying" now and then and occupied with matters entirely his own, when the Airedale, an arrogant bully, domineering and dogmatic, being beyond the reach of the sound of his master's voice and having evaded the vigilance of his keeper (for the maids and the man were vigilant), dashed upon the scene, and with destruction in his heart and mayhem in his teeth pounced upon the Pomeranian with the result already regretfully recorded; the plaintiff's dog had had its day. It crossed to that shore from which none, not even a good dog, ever returns.

[1] Leaving this painful subject and turning to the considerations elaborately discussed in the briefs of able counsel, we remark that there was a time in the history of the law when, as is said in one of the early cases, "dog law" was as hard to define as "dog Latin." As Blackstone puts it, dogs were the subject of property to a very limited and qualified degree; they had no intrinsic value, and were regarded as being kept only through the whim or caprice of their owner. They were not the subject of larceny. 2 Blackstone's Comm. 393. But that day has passed, and dogs now have a well-established status before the law. Considerable sums of money are invested in dogs, and they are the subject of extensive trade. Aside from their pecuniary value their worth is recognized by writers and jurists. Cuvier has asserted that the dog was perhaps necessary for the establishment of civil society, and that a little reflection will convince one that barbarous nations owe much of their subsequently acquired civilization to the dog. From the building of the pyramids to the present day, from the frozen poles to the torrid zone, wherever man has wandered there has been his dog. In the case of State v. Harriman, 75 Me. 562, 46 Am. Rep. 423, he is eulogized in the following language:

> "He is the friend and companion of his master, accompanying him on his walks; his servant, aiding him in his hunting; the playmate of his children, an inmate of his home, protecting it against all assailants."

In his well-known tribute to the dog United States Senator Vest characterizes him as "the one absolutely unselfish friend a man may have in this selfish world, the one that never deserts him, never fails him, the one that never proves ungrateful or treacherous." See, also, Sabin v. Smith, 26 Cal. App. 676, 679, 147 Pac. 1180.

The Pomeranian was small, weighing about 4½ pounds, but history discloses that the small dog, perhaps oftener than his bigger brother, has rendered modest but heroic service, and by his fidelity has influenced the course of history.

As already indicated, the law now recognizes that dogs have pecuniary value, and constitute property of their owners, as much so as horses and cattle or other domestic animals. Ten Hopen v. Walker, 96 Mich. 236, 55 N. W. 657, 35 Am. St. Rep. 598. It may be the market value, or some special or peculiar value to its owner to be ascertained by reference to its usefulness or other qualities. Heiligmann v. Rose, 81 Tex. 222, 16 S. W. 931, 13 L. R. A. 272, 26 Am. St. Rep. 804. Its amount is a question for the jury, after hearing evidence directed to those points. Parker v. Mise, 27 Ala. 480, 62 Am. Dec. 776. The plaintiff's dog was the proud possessor of the kennel name Encliffe-Masterpiece; his pedigree and reputation entitled him to be regarded in dog circles as possessing the bluest of blood; in short, in canine society he belonged to the inner circle of the 400. In West and East he had won the first prize in every bench show at which he had been exhibited. He was middle-aged and in good health. Experts testifying placed his monetary value at $1,000.

[2, 3] The owner of a dog is not liable for the injuries caused by it unless it is vicious and the owner has notice of that fact. 3 Corp. Juris, p. 89, § 330. But we think the evidence in this case shows, by inference at least, that while the defendant's dog was an estimable animal in many respects, he was, nevertheless, prone to attack without provocation other dogs irrespective of size, and that such an assault upon a dog of the weight and physical characteristics of that owned by the plaintiff was likely to prove harmful, if not fatal, to the object of the attack. As to the defendant's prior knowledge of the vicious propensities of his Airedale, while the evidence may not clearly show that he was personally aware of them, it sufficiently demonstrates that his employé, in charge of it at the time of the attack, and whose custom it was to exercise it on the public streets, knew of its dangerous character, which knowledge the law charges to the employer. The knowledge of a servant or agent of an animal's vicious propensity will be imputed to the master when such agent or servant has charge of or control over the animal. 3 Corp. Juris, p. 96, § 328.

[4] It is urged by the appellant that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury, as requested, that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence arising from the fact that her dog was upon the public streets without being licensed—unlike the defendant's Airedale, whose master had ornamented his favorite with a tag entitling him to roam the city's streets secure from interference by the poundkeeper or his myrmidons. The appellant's contention in this respect would be well grounded if the plaintiff's omission to comply with the ordinance requiring dogs to be licensed had contributed to the incident resulting in the Pomeranian's untimely end. But for aught that appears the absence of a tag from the collar of plaintiff's dog was unnoticed by the Airedale, and was not the matter that aroused his ire or induced him to make the attack. His was the canine point of view, and not that of the license collector. When the violation of an ordinance has no causal connection with the injury, as contributing thereto, the rule contended for by appellant has no application. This was held in the case of Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 Pac. 109, where, in its discussion of the subject, the court says:

> "One who violates an ordinance wherein a penalty is fixed for noncompliance with its provisions, may be subjected to the penalties therein prescribed, but he cannot, in addition thereto, be deprived of his civil rights to recover damages, perhaps in many thousands of dollars, sustained by reason of the negligence or wrong of another, when such violation bore no relation to the injury, and did not contribute in the remotest degree thereto."

Judgment affirmed.

FROST v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR MODOC COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2019.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 13, 1919.)

1. CERTIORARI 🔑16 — QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—FINAL DETERMINATION.

Certiorari will not issue to review a proceeding by an inferior tribunal prior to court's final adjudication.

2. CONTEMPT 🔑67—REVIEW—CERTIORARI.

Statutory contempt proceedings by superior court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 714 or 715, will not be reviewed by certiorari until a final order has been made, although the court may have made jurisdictional mistakes during the proceedings.

Application for writ of review by Herman Frost against the Superior Court in and for the County of Modoc and Clarence A. Raker, Judge of said court. Writ dismissed.

Milton S. Hamilton, of San Francisco, and Driver & Driver and Frank Tade, all of Sacramento, for petitioner.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. In an action previously instituted by Sallie C. Turner against the petitioner and one Patrick L. Flanigan, a judgment for the sum of $8,166.60 was entered by the clerk of the above-named respondent court against petitioner and said Flanigan on the 13th day of March, 1919. On the same day a writ of execution was issued in said action by the clerk of said court (respondent herein), directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco. Said writ was returned to said clerk partially satisfied, and on the 10th day of April, 1919, was filed by said clerk with the papers in said action. The petition here alleges that—

> "On the 10th day of April, 1919, an oral application was made by said plaintiff (Sallie C. Turner) to said Hon. Clarence A. Raker, in his chambers and not while he was holding court, for an order directing said petitioner to appear before John McCallan, a notary public in and for the said city and county of San Francisco, as a referee, to answer on oath concerning his property; that said judge thereupon, in compliance with such application, made in said action the following order" —and then follows the order made by the judge, commanding the petitioner to appear before the said John McCallan, notary public, a referee, etc., in room 1012, Mills building, San Francisco, on the 23d day of April, 1919, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, to answer on oath concerning his property, etc.

It is made to appear that the said McCallan, as referee, made and signed a return to the respondent superior court, setting forth the fact:

> That the order above mentioned was served in due time on the petitioner by the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco; that petitioner "did not appear before me at room 1012, Mills building, * * * on the 23d day of April, 1919, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m., or at all; and I hereby recommend that the said Herman Frost be punished for contempt in failing to obey the said order, and that the court take such steps as may seem meet and proper in the premises to punish the said Herman Frost for his contempt of this referee and the order of the court."

Upon receiving and the filing of the said return or report of the said referee, the respondents, it is alleged, ordered the issuance of and the clerk of said court issued—

> "a writ of attachment for contempt against your petitioner and directed to the sheriff of said county of Modoc; that the time for the return of said writ of attachment has by order of said superior court been continued to the 16th day of May, 1919, at the hour of 10 o'clock a. m."

The petition further alleges, and thus are stated two of the grounds upon which a writ of certiorari is herein prayed for to annul the proceedings thus far in the contempt matter inaugurated against the petitioner:

> "That no affidavit or other verified application was presented to said judge or filed in said action as the basis for said order so issued by said judge in his chambers. That it was not made to appear to the said judge at the time of said application and at the time of the issuance of said order, or at all, that the petitioner was at that time a resident of the said city and county of San Francisco, or of any other county, * * * or had a place of business therein. That there is no paper or document filed in said action or with said court or in the office of the clerk thereof showing or tending to show the residence of your petitioner at the time said order was made, and that the only paper referring to said matter is the order set forth hereinabove."

It is further contended that it nowhere appears that the court ever made an order appointing the said McCallan a referee to take the testimony of the petitioner concerning his property; the only reference to a referee in said proceeding being in the order of the court requiring petitioner to appear before the said McCallan, "a referee by me appointed," etc. It is also maintained that the statute requires that the order compelling a judgment debtor to appear before a referee to answer on oath concerning his property shall be made in court as a court order and not in chambers by the judge, as was the fact in this case.

There was some discussion in the oral argument before the court of the question whether the order requiring the petitioner to appear before the referee was the one authorized by section 715 or that authorized by section 714 of the Code of Civil Procedure; the respondent contending that the order was based on the last-named section and the petitioner contending that upon the provisions of the section first named the order was made. But a consideration of this as well as the other points made by the petitioner is, as we view the matter as it stands before us now, foreign to any requirement imposed upon us in the determination of what we conceive to be the controlling question submitted by this petition.

[1] Counsel for petitioner, in his brief, states that—

> "Section 1068, Code Civ. Proc. subd. 4, provides that a petition for writ of review must show that there is a final determination or judgment the subject of the attack."

We have found no such provision in section 1068, nor, after some investigation, have we found such a provision in any other part of said Code, nor of any other of our Codes. But we think the rule as thus stated is the correct one, and that no review of a proceeding had by an inferior tribunal through the writ here asked for should be allowed unless in such a proceeding there has been a final adjudication or determination of the subject-matter thereof.

[2] The petitioner declares that the order requiring him to appear before the referee to answer on oath concerning his property is a final order, and that therefore the same is subject to review and annulment, if illegal, through the writ of certiorari. It is undoubtedly true that said order was in a sense, if not entirely, final. Its purpose merely was to direct the petitioner to appear before the referee for the purpose therein stated. It was final as to that matter because there was nothing further to be done in that particular. But the question which we are asked to review herein is whether or not the proceedings instituted against petitioner for contempt are legal, or within the jurisdiction of the respondent court to hear and determine, although therein there has been no final determination or adjudication. It is true that the order directing the petitioner to appear before the referee is the basis of said proceedings, but it does not constitute a final order in said proceedings. Of course, counsel will not attempt to dispute the proposition that, whether the proceedings in contempt were inaugurated under the provisions of section 714 or those of section 715 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the superior court nevertheless has jurisdiction to hear and determine such proceedings. Both sections expressly invest superior courts with such jurisdiction. It follows that those courts, on all proper occasions, are to be permitted without interruption to exercise such jurisdiction until their judgments, following from the employment of the power given them by the statute in that respect, have become final. In other words, error may be committed in the steps essential to the starting in operation of the jurisdiction vested by law in superior courts of certain proceedings, yet, notwithstanding that error, such court must be permitted to proceed to a final determination of the matter, and then, if it should appear that the court has not correctly followed the course marked out by the statute to put in motion its jurisdiction, and it appears that there is no adequate remedy at law, the party suffering from the final adjudication may have the proceeding reviewed through a writ of certiorari. It certainly cannot be held to be the law that the proceeding before a court may be arrested at any particular time in the progress thereof to determine whether the court has committed error either in the matter of putting its jurisdiction in motion or in ruling upon some proposition arising during the course of the hearing of the proceeding.

Counsel for the petitioner, however, maintains that the proceeding authorized by either section 714 or 715 of the Code of Civil Procedure is special, and that therefore every step necessary to its consummation is jurisdictional. He argues from this premise that if the court omits to observe any of the essential facts necessary to start its jurisdiction in motion the proceeding may be stopped and the error reviewed through the writ prayed for here. Of course, the statute must be followed with substantial strictness, but the same is true of statutes authorizing other proceedings in the superior court. Indeed, the same argument may be advanced as to a proceeding in eminent domain. That is a special proceeding, and the action authorized for the purpose of the exercise of the right of eminent domain is distinctly different in many respects from that of the ordinary action at law or in equity. Would counsel contend that, notwithstanding that the statute specially invests superior courts with jurisdiction to hear and determine eminent domain proceedings, a writ of review would be available to determine whether the complaint in such an action stated a good cause of action or was sufficient in the statement of facts to put the court's jurisdiction of such a proceeding in motion? We think that no such contention would be made. The contention of counsel for the petitioner in this case, however, in substantial effect, involves the same proposition.

We think that the petition here is premature; that if the objections to the proceedings thus far had in the contempt matter against the petitioner are in any sense legally valid the same may be urged before the superior court having jurisdiction of the proceeding; and that the writ here should therefore be dismissed. It is so ordered.

CRENSHAW BROS. & SAFFOLD v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (Civ. 1950.)*

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 1, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1221, 1222—AMENDMENT OF REMITTITUR.

After regular issuance of remittitur by the appellate court which has modified a judgment for plaintiffs and reduced their recovery, such remittitur having gone down, the appellate court cannot amend it and correct the judgment, having lost jurisdiction of the cause except in case of mistake, fraud, or imposition.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1218—AMENDMENT OF REMITTITUR — MISAPPREHENSION OF COUNSEL.

A misapprehension of counsel as to the effect of the judgment of the appellate court modifying the judgment of the trial court for plaintiffs by reducing the recovery furnishes no ground for recalling the remittitur after it has gone down and for setting aside the judgment and amending it in any particular.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR 🔑1221—RELIEF FROM JUDGMENT—LOSS OF JURISDICTION.

The wide discretion of the appellate court, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, to relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or inexcusable neglect, cannot be exercised where the court has lost jurisdiction, as by the going down of its remittitur.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; D. M. Young, Judge.

Action by Crenshaw Bros. & Saffold, a partnership consisting of John A. Crenshaw and others, against the Southern Pacific Company. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appealed; the appellate court modifying judgment by reducing the amount of recovery (181 Pac. 252). On application for order recalling remittitur and to correct the judgment. Application denied.

Arthur L. Levinsky, of Stockton, for appellant.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an application for an order recalling the remittitur, and also to correct the judgment of this court in the action made on the 8th day of April, 1919. The judgment of the lower court from which the appeal was taken was for the principal sum of $3,163.50, with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, as follows: ———. In reviewing the case, this court reached the conclusion that the amount of recovery should be the sum of $1,528.06. with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, as follows: ———, thus modifying the judgment and reducing the principal in the sum of $1,635.44. The plaintiff in the action petitioned the Supreme Court for a hearing in that court, which was on June 5, 1919, denied. No petition for rehearing in this court was filed, and no motion made to correct the judgment of this court, either as to the amount found to be due plaintiff from defendant or as to the matter of costs on the appeal. The matter stood thus until June 13, 1919, when the present application was filed.

It appears from the application that after the remittitur was received and filed by the clerk of the lower court appellant served its cost bill upon respondents' attorney, who thereupon came to this court for the relief asked.

Section 1027, Code of Civil Procedure, provides as follows:

> "The prevailing party on appeal shall be entitled to his costs excepting when judgment is modified, and in that event the matter of costs is within the discretion of the appellate court. * * *"

Rule 23 provides (176 Pac. xi) that:

> "In all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is reversed or modified, and the order of reversal or modification contains no directions as to the costs of appeal, the clerk will enter upon the record, and insert in the remittitur, a judgment that the appellant recover the costs of appeal. In all cases in which the judgment or order appealed from is affirmed, the clerk will enter upon the record, and insert in the remittitur, a judgment that the respondent recover the costs of appeal."

The clerk of this court acted in obedience to this rule in issuing the remittitur, and the rule itself is authorized by the statute. The Supreme Court, in Granger v. Sheriff, 140 Cal. 190, 195, 73 Pac. 816, 818, said:

> "'Under the Constitution, by the lapse of time and the issuance of the remittitur, the judgment has become a finality beyond the power of the court to modify or amend' (Martin v. Wagner, 124 Cal. 204 [56 Pac. 1023]), and the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court ends (Herrlich v. McDonald, 83 Cal. 505 [23 Pac. 710]. In re Levinson, 108 Cal. 450 [41 Pac. 483, 42 Pac. 479]). When the remittitur is filed with the clerk 'with whom the judgment roll is filed,' the jurisdiction of the superior court attaches."

In the case In re Levinson, supra, a motion was made to recall the remittitur for the purpose of securing a modification of the direction made therein for the payment of the costs of the appeal. The court said (108 Cal. 459, 42 Pac. 479):

> "Without reference to the merits of the motion, it comes too late. The remittitur was regularly issued on September 6, 1895, and this motion was not noticed until October 18th following. If respondent desires a modification of the judgment in any respect, the proper application should have been made before the going down of the remittitur. Gray v. Palmer, 11 Cal. 341. When the remittitur has been duly and regularly issued, without inadvertence, we have no power to recall it. This court thereupon loses jurisdiction of the cause, except in a case of mistake, or fraud, or imposition practiced upon the court, neither of which elements appear in this case. People v. Sprague, 57 Cal. 147; Rowland v. Kreyenhagen, 24 Cal. 52."

See Trumpler v. Trumpler, 123 Cal. 248, 55 Pac. 1008.

In Martin v. Wagner, 124 Cal. 204, 56 Pac. 1023, cited in Granger v. Sheriff, supra, the court said:

> "Where fraud or imposition has been practiced upon this court in procuring its judgment, the remittitur will be recalled, and jurisdiction will be reasserted upon the ground that the judgment so procured is a nullity. But in this case no charge of fraud is made. In its legal aspect it stands in no different position from that of any other case in which an erroneous decision may chance to have been made by this court. Under the Constitution, by the lapse of time and the issuance of the remittitur, the judgment has become a finality, beyond the power of this court to modify or amend."

[1, 2] Obviously we cannot amend the remittitur should we recall it without first amending the judgment, and, as we have seen, this we cannot do. It is not claimed that there was fraud, or that the court was imposed upon, or that, by its judgment, it inadvertently failed to state which party should pay the costs of the appeal. The mistake alleged was on the part of counsel for respondent, as counsel stated, in assuming that the judgment reading, "and, as thus modified, the judgment is affirmed," meant that the judgment of the superior court was "affirmed in every particular, except the amount recovered thereunder." The misapprehension of counsel as to the effect of the judgment furnishes no ground for recalling the remittitur and setting aside the judgment and amending it in any particular. As we understand the decisions in the cases cited, we must hold that this court, under the circumstances shown, is without jurisdiction to afford the relief prayed for.

[3] Section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure gives the court wide discretion to "relieve a party or his legal representative from a judgment, order, or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect." But this discretion cannot be exercised in a case where the court has lost its jurisdiction.

The application is denied.

PEOPLE v. PATTERSON. (Cr. 475.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 30, 1919.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑1036(1)—APPEAL—OBJECTION TO EVIDENCE.

The introduction of evidence received without objection in a criminal case cannot be urged as error upon appeal.

2. FALSE PRETENSES 🔑49(1) — DRAWING CHECK WITHOUT FUNDS — CORPORATE EXISTENCE OF BANK.

In a prosecution for drawing a check upon a banking corporation in which accused had insufficient funds, it is sufficient to prove the de facto existence of the banking corporation.

3. CRIMINAL LAW 🔑400(6) — PAROL EVIDENCE—CORPORATE CHARACTER.

In a prosecution for drawing a check upon a banking corporation in which accused had insufficient funds, the bank's corporate character may be proved by parol.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

B. C. Patterson was convicted of drawing a check upon a bank in which he had insufficient funds, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was charged by information with the crime of uttering and delivering a certain bank check for $15 to one George Carlton; it being alleged that the check was drawn November 11, 1918, upon the California National Bank of Sacramento, a banking corporation existing under the laws of the United States, and that at the time of the uttering of said check defendant had neither funds nor credit in said bank.

[1-3] No attack is made upon the information, the instructions, or any of the rulings of the court. The only contention is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict in two particulars; that is, as to the bank being a corporation, and that defendant had insufficient funds in the bank at or about the time the check was uttered and presented for payment. Appellant is, however, totally in error in this contention, as will be seen from the following quotation from the testimony of Charles S. King, the assistant cashier of the California National Bank of Sacramento:

"Q. The California National Bank of Sacramento is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the United States? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it has its principal place of business in the City of Sacramento, state of California? A. Yes, sir."

After stating how long he had been assistant cashier of said institution and that an account was opened with B. C. Patterson on October 16, 1918, with a deposit of $20 to his credit, and that the largest balance he had to his credit during November and December, 1918, was $3, he further testified that at no time during the said month of November did the defendant have any arrangements with the bank for credit.

But appellant contends that said evidence was incompetent, especially as to the incorporation of the bank; the claim being that the articles of incorporation should have been introduced. As to this, it may be said in the first place that no objection was made to the introduction of the evidence, and it is now too late to urge the point. Again, in such cases it is sufficient to prove the de facto existence of the corporation, and its corporate character may also be proved by parol.

In People v. Barric, 49 Cal. 342, the defendant was convicted of stealing certain property of a corporation, and the Supreme Court said:

> 'The prosecution proved by the witness Rondel that the company known by the name given in the indictment was a corporation de facto, doing business as such. This was sufficient. People v. Frank, 28 Cal. 507; People v. Hughes, 29 Cal. 257; People v. Ah Sam, 41 Cal. 645."

In the Ah Sam Case it was held that proof of the bank being a corporation may be made by "general reputation" and by showing that the bank was known and acted as an incorporated company, and as such issued bank bills. There are many cases to the same effect, but we need cite no further. Indeed, there seems to be no merit in the appeal. The evidence is abundantly sufficient to support the verdict and the defendant had a fair and impartial trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

STOUFFER v. EYMANN et al. (Civ. 2028.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 12, 1919.)

1. BROKERS ⟹38(3) — LAND EXCHANGE TRANSACTION — MISREPRESENTATION — OWNERS' RIGHT TO DAMAGES.

Owners cannot recover from their broker who effected real estate exchange transaction, damages for misrepresentation of value of property received by them in exchange, without alleging and proving that such property was of a less market value than their own land.

2. BROKERS ⟹82(2) — LAND EXCHANGE TRANSACTION—MISREPRESENTATION BY BROKER—PLEADING.

In land broker's action on commission notes, in which owners seek to avoid liability and counterclaim for damages upon ground of broker's misrepresentation as to value of property received in exchange, held, that answer failed to plead that property received in exchange was not worth as much as property transferred in return therefor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by H. A. Stouffer against Dorothea H. Eymann and another. From judgment for plaintiff and an order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Appeal from order denying motion for new trial dismissed, and judgment affirmed.

Andrew J. Copp, Jr., of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Minor Moore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Appeal by defendants from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial.

[1] The complaint stated in the ordinary form causes of action upon two promissory notes admitted to have been executed by the defendants and made in favor of the plaintiff. The notes were given as the result of an agreement made between plaintiff and defendants; the amount represented thereby being for commissions to be paid to the plaintiff by defendants in consideration of services rendered. Plaintiff was a real estate broker and was instrumental in effecting an exchange of certain property of the defendants in the county of Riverside, Cal., for real property in the state of Colorado. Defendants in their answer sought to avoid liability on the notes by setting up the defense that their agent had been guilty of fraud in that he had misrepresented the value of the Colorado property which was received by them in exchange for the California real estate. It should be remembered, then, that this is not an action against the other party to the exchange for falsely representing the value of his property, but is an action based solely upon an alleged breach of confidence committed by an agent toward his principals. In such a case it was incumbent upon the complaining principals to allege and prove that the property received by them in exchange for their own land was of a less market value than was the latter property; in other words, if the Colorado property was worth as much in the market at the time of the alleged transaction as the Riverside property, no damage would be shown, regardless of the fact that the Colorado property might have been represented to be of a value greatly in excess of its actual market worth. The trial judge, after permitting an amended answer to be filed, announced that he did not consider that this amended answer stated any defense to the causes of action pleaded by the plaintiff on the notes, but allowed the defendants to introduce evidence as to what representations were actually made by the plaintiff. This evidence having been introduced, the court denied the defendants the right to introduce other offered evidence not going to the point mentioned, and ordered judgment for the plaintiff. The evident conclusion of the trial judge was that the facts shown in evidence did not establish a case where the defendants either relied upon, or were warranted in relying upon, statements made by their agent, that the latter were, as to the question of the value of the Colorado property, mere opinions, and that the defendants, having pursued an inquiry independent of that in which the plaintiff took a part, showed that they did not rely upon his statements, and hence the injury, if any, could not be attributed to the plaintiff. Upon an examination of the evidence we are inclined to agree with the trial judge upon this proposition. However, whether that question was correctly resolved or not, we find exhibited in the record an insurmountable obstacle to the defense claimed on the part of the defendants.

[2] Nowhere in the answer is there any allegation showing what the market value of the Riverside property owned by the defendants was; hence it is not made to appear by that pleading but that the Colorado property was worth as much, if not more, than the equity owned by the defendants in the Riverside property; the latter property having been exchanged subject to a large incumbrance by way of trust deed. We find in paragraph 1 of the answer, this clause:

> "That on said last-mentioned date said real property was of the reasonable exchange value of $60,000, subject to a lien of deed of trust thereon for the principal sum of $20,000. * * *"

This allegation referred to the Riverside property. It contains no statement at all of what the market value of that property or the equity was. In an alleged counterclaim set up in the answer the defendants seek to recoup damages in the sum of $35,663, which they allege as being "the difference between the value of said Colorado property as represented and the actual value of said property on or about the said 24th day of January, 1914." In the preliminary paragraphs of the alleged counterclaim the allegations of the answer, including that which we have quoted, are made a part thereof by reference. It will be at once discerned that there is nothing in the counterclaim, added to the allegations of the main answer, which shows what the value of the Riverside equity was; and the allegation as to the amount of damages does not help the case of defendants any, for, as we have stated hereinabove, if the value of the Colorado property equaled the value of the Riverside property, no damage would be shown for which recovery could be had against the agent. In point generally on this proposition are the cases of Baker v. Brown, 82 Cal. 64, 22 Pac. 879; Holton v. Noble, 83 Cal. 7, 23 Pac. 58; and London, etc., Fire Ins. Co. v. Liebes, 105 Cal. 203, 38 Pac. 691.

For the reasons given, we conclude that the appeal is without merit. At the time the order denying a new trial was made the law did not authorize an appeal to be taken therefrom. Hirsch v. All Persons, 173 Cal. 268, 159 Pac. 712. The questions sought to be raised thereby are all presented on the appeal from the judgment.

The appeal from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial is dismissed. The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

DOI v. McMURRY. (Civ. 1860.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 10, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 7, 1919.)

Landlord and Tenant 🔑49(1) — Care of Premises—Election of Remedies.

A lease provision, authorizing lessor to employ men to properly care for the premises, etc., is for lessor's benefit, and does not prevent a damage recovery against lessee for failure to maintain premises, nor does the lessor's employment of men constitute an election of remedies precluding recovery of damages from lessee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by M. Doi against J. B. McMurry. Judgment for defendant and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Fred J. Harris, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Ben P. Tabor, of Auburn, for respondent.

nual sum of $1,000. The lease provided that "all of the fruit produced upon the premises hereby leased must be delivered to the Auburn Fruit Exchange in the name of the party of the first part (J. B. McMurry), all transactions, accounts, statements, account sales, and checks to be issued in the name of the party of the first part." The complaint alleged that the fruit crop of 1917 was so delivered, and the defendant received therefor the sum of $4,493.36, that a portion of this was paid to plaintiff, but that the defendant withheld the sum of $639.92, which, together with an unknown amount for rebate, is due the plaintiff. The prayer was for an accounting and a judgment for whatever amount was found due. The answer claimed that no amount was due plaintiff in consequence of certain services performed for him by defendant and his wife and by reason of damage done to the orchard through the want of proper care and attention on the part of plaintiff. Affirmative relief was, indeed, therein demanded, and the same matters were set up by way of cross-complaint, and therein it was sought to have the lease rescinded and defendant restored to the possession of the land, together with damages for said injury. However, it appeared at the trial that an agreement had been reached by the parties for the restoration of the premises, and that feature was consequently eliminated from the case. The court found that the value of the services performed for plaintiff as aforesaid and the amount of the damages suffered by defendant equaled the amount due plaintiff under said lease, and rendered judgment for defendant for costs. After an examination of the record, we may say that there is substantial support for the finding that said services were rendered as claimed and were of the value charged against the plaintiff. The doubtful proposition relates to the sum of $481.59, which was allowed as an offset for injuries done to the premises. While the answer refers to several particulars in which plaintiff failed to comply with his agreement as to the care of the place, it is quite apparent that said award was made principally for his failure to thin the growing fruit, and thereby allowing many limbs to be broken and the trees greatly injured.

When the case was first before us we gained the impression, and so decided, that because the lease provided that the lessor had the right to employ one or more men properly to care for the premises (which we assumed included the right to thin the fruit) and charge the expense to the lessee, the lessor was "thereby charged with the ultimate responsibility for the proper thinning of the fruit." This view was somewhat contributed to by the fact that the lessor had caused some thinning to be done, and had done some other work in the orchard, and that he seemed to be aware of the necessity for better thinning being done than the lessee was doing. Upon further reflection we think we were in error. This right of supervision to some extent and the right himself to assist in harvesting the crop or thinning the fruit was, we think, for the lessor's benefit, and was not intended to nor did it have the effect of relieving the lessee from the duty of performing his covenants, nor acquit him of liability for damages caused by his breach of the contract. While by an abandonment of the work by the lessee or by his doing the work in such a way as to cause great damage the lessor might for his protection have elected to do all the work, he was under no obligation to do so, and his failure to do it would not relieve the lessee from the performance of his contract obligations. Any other view would make it to the lessee's possible advantage to neglect his work, sit idly by while the lessor is performing the duties of the lessee, and at the same time claim the fruits of the lease, thus casting upon the lessor the entire burden of the lease.

Appellant thus states his position:

> "We do not mean to contend that there is not available an election of remedies to the injured party in proper cases, but we do say that an election, once made, binds the person making it to the exclusion of all others. Particularly is this the case when the election is made in conformity to the written terms of the lease to which he is a party. And where a party has an election of two remedies, each being inconsistent with the other, the plaintiff may elect which he will pursue, but he cannot have both."

As we understand, appellant's application of this statement is this: That in assuming to do some of the work in the orchard which he deemed necessary for its protection against damage respondent made an election of remedies open to him, and thereby released appellant from all claims for damages caused by appellant's breach of his contract.

That we may have a clear view of appellant's position we quote further from his brief:

> "By solemn agreement he (respondent) stipulated therein what the remedy for a breach of its terms would be. This remedy is exclusive of all others. If the premises were not being conducted according to the stipulations in the lease he was bound under it to take charge of the orchard, and if any damage resulted while he was in charge, the loss would be the result of his own negligence. If he elected not to take charge of the place, knowing that waste was being suffered or injury done thereto, then he waived his right and remedy under the lease, and cannot complain if he chose not to protect his interest."

The court found upon sufficient evidence, though not free from conflicting evidence, that the work done by respondent was at appellant's request and in the accounting respondent was given credit for it. The court also found, upon sufficient evidence, that, through the negligence of appellant to do certain work, which the contract provided he was to do, certain damages resulted to the trees. These damages arose partly from improper pruning, but chiefly from failure properly to thin the fruit, thus causing the limbs to break and to injure the trees and to diminish materially their productiveness. We do not think that because respondent, as he had the right to do, hired one or more boys for a short time to assist in thinning the fruit, he thereby elected to take the full responsibility of this branch of the work. He was all the time urging appellant to do this work, and at no time did he give appellant cause for assuming that he was relieved from his obligations in this regard.

In considering the evidence, conflicting as it was, as to the various matters the subject of the accounting, appellant's argument harks back to his construction of the lease, which we think is not warranted. We can discover no place for the application of the doctrine of election as was applied in Holt Mfg. Co. v. Ewing, 109 Cal. 353, 42 Pac. 435, and similar cases cited by appellant. In the Holt Case plaintiff made a conditional sale of a machine. The purchaser died, leaving the last payment unmade. Plaintiff filed a claim against the estate for the amount, and it was allowed by the administrator and the court, and thereby became in effect a judgment. Plaintiff subsequently brought an action to recover the machine for breach of the contract of sale. Said the court:

> "The so-called lease was in fact a conditional sale, under the terms of which the seller had either one of two remedies for the violation of the contract by the purchaser. It might, upon the default of the purchaser in meeting the stipulated payments, or any of them, have retaken the property or recovered its possession in an action of claim and delivery, or, on the other hand, treated the sale as an absolute one, and brought its action upon the notes to recover the contract price of the property sold. These remedies being inconsistent, the plaintiff could elect which he would pursue, but he could not have both. Parke v. White River Lumber Co., 101 Cal. 37 [35 Pac. 442] and cases there cited."

Obviously plaintiff could not have a judgment against the property of the deceased for the amount due him and also have the machine. No such inconsistency of remedies as was present in that case exists here. Indeed, according to appellant's view, as we understand it, respondent had no choice in the matter. If he took charge of the orchard he thereby relieved appellant of responsibility, and if he failed to do so he thereby waived all right to damages. In point of fact he made no election.

The case is by no means complicated. The fruit grown by appellant was marketed as the lease provided, and certain of the proceeds paid over to appellant, respondent withholding his rentals, also the amount due for services rendered, and also an amount claimed as damages to the premises. The court, upon the evidence submitted at the trial, found the balance due appellant in the accounting, and also found that the amount due respondent for services and the damages caused by appellant's failure to care for the orchard equaled the amount due to appellant and rendered judgment for respondent for costs.

We can discover no just ground for arriving at a different decision. The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: HART, J.

BURNETT, J. I concur. After more deliberate consideration, I am satisfied that the controlling principle is as stated by the presiding justice.

If the parties had intended to relieve the lessee from liability for any default in case the lessor with knowledge thereof failed to avail himself of the privilege of doing the work himself, it is fair to assume that they would have expressed such intention. We must gather their intention from the language of the instrument itself, and, so viewing the situation, it seems reasonable to hold that the lessor did not, by his inaction, waive his right to claim damages from the lessee. As a matter of equity it is to be remembered that the proposition involves the willful violation of his covenant on the part of the lessee and no more than the failure to exercise a privilege on the part of the lessor. It is therefore morally as well as legally right that the latter, on the showing made, should be permitted to recover the amount of the damage actually suffered by him.

NORTON v. NORTON'S ESTATE.
(Civ. 2746.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 16, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Aug. 14, 1919.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚷453(4) — ADMINISTRATRIX'S CLAIM AGAINST ESTATE—EFFECT OF JUDGMENT.

Where an administratrix's claim against the estate is reduced to judgment pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1510, the judgment is not personal, but merely establishes a claim against the estate.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚷202 (2)—CLAIMS AGAINST ESTATE—WHEN PROVABLE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1493, 1494, making claims not due or contingent provable against a deceased's estate, a debt contingent upon the claimant living with decedent as his wife until his death became due upon decedent's death and provable against his estate.

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS ⚷202 (1)—CLAIMS—CONTRACT.

A claim against an estate based upon an instrument executed with the formalities required of contracts may be enforced, although the instrument has been admitted to probate as a will; since a writing may be both a will and a contract.

4. WILLS ⚷792(4)—ELECTION OR ESTOPPEL BY PROBATE OF WILL.

The fact that an administratrix offered an alleged will for probate, as she was required to do by Code Civ. Proc. § 1298, did not constitute an estoppel or election precluding her from claiming the instrument gave her contractual rights against deceased's estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Frances E. Norton against the Estate of G. N. Norton, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Peirce Coombes, of San Francisco, for appellant.

W. W. Allen, of San Francisco, and J. W. Henderson, of Eureka, for respondent.

BRITTAIN, J. Frances E. Norton, the surviving widow of G. N. Norton, appeals from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining a demurrer to her complaint in a suit against the estate of G. N. Norton, upon a claim rejected by the judge sitting in probate.

The essential allegations of the complaint are summarized as follows:

On July 4, 1915, leaving an estate in excess of $10,000, G. N. Norton died testate and indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 per year, in monthly installments of $83.33, commencing July 4, 1915, under a contract set forth as an exhibit to the claim, which by proper reference is made part of the complaint. July 21, 1915, the plaintiff was appointed and qualified as special administratrix of the estate, and served as such until September 17, 1915, when she was appointed, and since which time she was, and continued to be at the time of filing suit, the administratrix of the estate with the will annexed. On March 16, 1916, within the time required by, and in accordance with, sections 1493, 1494, and 1510 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the plaintiff filed her verified claim with the clerk of the court in which the probate proceedings on the estate were pending. No payments were made on the claim, allowance of which was opposed by the children of the decedent, and the claim was rejected. In the claim appended to the complaint it was averred that the contract on which the claim is based was written and signed by Norton in December, 1911, and thereupon delivered to the claimant; that it was executed because the claimant had obtained, after the appearance of her husband and trial, an interlocutory decree of divorce against him for cruelty, and he desired a reconciliation, and to induce her thereafter to live with him as his wife until his death, and in reliance upon the writing she did live with him as his wife until his death, and had her interlocutory decree of divorce set aside; that the writing was in her possession until December 30, 1912, when at Norton's request she gave it to him for the purpose of rewriting it; that he did rewrite it, after which he destroyed the original; that the rewritten document was continuously thereafter in her possession until it was filed by her as the will of the decedent; and that it has been admitted to probate as a will, and as such is on file in the office of the clerk of the court in which probate proceedings on the estate are pending. The document is in the words and figures following:

"This instrument made and dated at San Francisco, California, on the thirtieth day of December in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and twelve by me the undersigned is intended to be not only a contract but also an irrevocable olographic will (the same being an instrument that is entirely written, dated and signed by the hand of myself) to the extent of the provisions thereof, it being my purpose by virtue of the provisions of this instrument to secure to my wife, Frances E. Norton, the payments hereinafter specified out of my estate for and during her natural life if she shall continue to be my wife and be living with me as such at the time of my death. Making reference to the foregoing I hereby promise, agree, undertake and guarantee that after my decease my personal representatives shall and will pay out of my estate to my wife, Frances E. Norton, for and during her natural life the sum of one thousand dollars ($1,000.00) per year in monthly installments of eighty-three dollars and thirty-three cents ($83.33) each if she shall continue to be my wife and be living with me as such at the time of my death, but not otherwise. I hereby expressly provide that upon my death all of my estate of every name, nature, character and description and wheresoever situated shall stand charged for the payments aforesaid if my said wife shall then be entitled to such payments according to the provisions aforesaid.

"In witness whereof I have written, dated and signed the foregoing by my own hand as above stated. G. N. Norton."

Since the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, the grounds of ambiguity and uncertainty may be disregarded. The other three grounds of demurrer were that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, that there was a defect of the party defendant, and that facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action were not stated.

In the brief on behalf of the respondent the demurrer is sought to be sustained. No consideration can be given to statements of fact not shown by the complaint, but made in the brief. They may be pertinent, if proved, on a trial of the case, but upon the demurrer ruling the court is confined to the facts stated in the complaint.

[1] In regard to the claimed defect of parties, it is said: "There is no entity or being in the defendant, and respondent submits that the court could not render a judgment against respondent." The statute provides that if the administrator is a creditor of the decedent, his authenticated claim shall be filed with the clerk, who is required to present it to the judge, and if it is rejected, "action thereon may be had against the estate by the claimant, and summons must be served upon the judge, who may appoint an attorney, at the expense of the estate, to defend the action." Code Civ. Proc. § 1510. A judgment rendered for the plaintiff in such a case is not personal, but merely establishes the claim against the estate. Estate of More, 121 Cal. 635, 54 Pac. 148.

[2] The question of jurisdiction of the subject-matter and the sufficiency of the statement of facts appear to be merged in the respondent's brief. Reliance is placed on the application of sections of the old practice act to a claim upon a mortgage lien, in a case where it was held that the word "claims," as used in the act, referred only to such debts as might have been enforced against the decedent in his lifetime by a personal action for the recovery of money. Fallon v. Butler, 21 Cal. 32, 81 Am. Dec. 140. The present statute provides for claims not due or contingent. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1493 and 1494; Verdier v. Roach, 96 Cal. 471, 31 Pac. 554; Crocker-Woolworth Nat. Bank v. Carle, 133 Cal. 409, 65 Pac. 951. The debt was contingent upon the performance of the condition to live with the decedent as his wife until his death. Civ. Code, § 1439. Upon the death, if the condition was performed by the plaintiff, the debt became due, and was provable as a claim.

[3, 4] The only other matter relied on by respondent is that the instrument on which the claim is based is a will and not a contract. Cases are cited in support of the rule "that where an instrument does not operate inter vivos, but is made to depend for its whole operation upon the event of the death of the maker to consummate it, then it can only take effect as testamentary." Carey v. Dennis, 13 Md. 1. The instrument under consideration here did operate inter vivos. In reliance upon it the plaintiff caused her interlocutory decree of divorce to be set aside and resumed marital relations with her husband, faithfully performing on her part all the obligations of the contract, and she seeks in this action to establish her right to receive the consideration for her performance. Such a contract is one favored by the law. Bowden v. Bowden, 175 Cal. 711, 167 Pac. 154, L. R. A. 1918A, 380. The instrument was admitted to probate as a will. The decedent in the writing declared it was "intended to be not only a contract but also an irrevocable olographic will * * * to the extent of the provisions thereof." A writing may be both a will and a contract. For the purpose of the present appeal it is immaterial whether it is operative for testamentary purposes or not. It is executed with all the formalities required in the execution of a contract, and suit may be maintained upon it without regard to its testamentary character. Adams v. Lansing, 17 Cal. 640. No question of election is presented by the demurrer, nor could it be determined on this appeal. As the custodian of the instrument, it was the duty of the plaintiff to present it for probate. Code Civ. Proc. § 1298. She could not attack the validity of the instrument on which she relied. Under such circumstances there is neither election nor estoppel thereafter to make her election to rest on her contractual rights. In re Gwin, 77 Cal. 313, 19 Pac. 527. In reaching the conclusion that the demurrer should have been overruled, the facts stated in the complaint are necessarily taken as true, and the law is declared upon that assumption. Nothing in this opinion is intended to determine any matter of fact upon which evidence may be adduced upon proper issues being framed in the trial court.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter an order overruling the demurrer to the complaint, and for such further proceedings as are not inconsistent herewith.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; HAVEN, J.

LA CHANCE v. BROWN et al. (Civ. 2828.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 9, 1919.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑187—Time of Payment—Waiver.

Vendors' acceptance of payments while purchaser was in arrears held to constitute waiver of time as an essential condition for the payment of installments due under the contract.

2. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑95(2), 101—Forfeiture—Acceptance of Overdue Payments—Suspension of Right of Forfeiture.

Where contract provided for forfeiture of purchaser's rights thereunder upon failure to make payments when due, vendors' acceptance of payments while purchaser was in arrears created a temporary suspension of right of forfeiture, which could be restored only by a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce it.

3. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑109, 203—Destruction of Improvements — Rights of Purchaser—Rescission of Contract.

Where there exists an executory contract for the sale and conveyance of real property, and improvements which constitute a material part of the consideration have been destroyed, the loss falls upon the vendor, and purchaser has the right to rescind the contract.

4. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑101—Forfeiture for Nonpayment—Waiver—Notice to Purchaser.

Vendors, after waiving right of forfeiture for purchaser's failure to make payments when due, could revive right only by giving purchaser reasonable time within which to make payments in compliance with contract.

5. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑101—Forfeiture — Waiver — Demand for Payment — Making of Repairs.

Where contract provided for forfeiture of payments upon purchaser's failure to pay installments when due, and required vendor to make repairs in case of fire, vendor, after having waived right of forfeiture by acceptance of overdue payments, and after having undertaken to repair building after partial destruction by fire, could not revive right of forfeiture by notice demanding payment before completion of repairs.

6. Vendor and Purchaser 🔑102—Sale by Vendor—Rescission.

Sale of premises by vendor to persons other than purchaser without purchaser's knowledge or consent does not constitute an attempt to rescind contract, since vendor may sell property subject to purchaser's rights under the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Milton T. Farmer, Judge.

Action by O. J. La Chance against C. D. Brown and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

W. W. Kaye and Alfred Siemon, both of Bakersfield, for appellants.

N. E. Conklin, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Action to recover the sum of $1,071 paid by the plaintiff to the defendants on account of a contract for the purchase of real property, which contract it is alleged was abandoned by the defendants, and rescinded. From a judgment awarding to the plaintiff the sum of $411, the defendants appeal.

The complaint alleged that immediately after the signing of the contract the plaintiff and defendants entered into a supplemental agreement to the effect that a certain policy of insurance upon the improvements on the land was for the benefit of the plaintiff, and that in case of loss of the premises by fire any sum paid upon the insurance would be paid to the defendants, in case of total loss, and that the plaintiff was to be credited upon the purchase price of the property for whatever amount was recovered on the policy, and in case of a partial loss whatever money was paid by the insurance company so much of it as necessary was to be used to repair the damage by fire, and whatever remained over and above such expenditure would be credited to the plaintiff on the purchase price of the property; that after the fire by which the house was partially destroyed and after the repairs were completed there remained the sum of $850 paid by the insurance company, which sum the defendants retained to their own use and refused to pay over or credit to the plaintiff. No evidence was introduced in support of the foregoing allegations (all of which were denied), and no finding of fact was made thereon.

The contract price was $3,500, of which $400 was paid at the execution of the contract. The contract provided that the remainder of the purchase price should be paid as follows: $1,500 by assuming a mortgage indebtedness held by the Producers' Savings Bank against the property, which sum of $1,500, together with the interest thereon, it was agreed should be paid by the plaintiff. The remaining $1,600 was to be paid in certain monthly installments. The interest on the mortgage was payable quarterly. It was agreed that, if the plaintiff failed to make any of the payments provided within the time or according to the terms of the contract, the vendors should be released from all obligations in law or equity to convey the premises, and the purchaser should forfeit the same and his rights under the contract, and the vendors should be entitled to possession of the premises and to remove the vendee therefrom.

The court found that the fire occurred on the 15th day of February, 1912, and that the monthly average of payments theretofore made were up to and in accordance with the terms of the contract. These two findings are not sustained by the evidence. The fire occurred on the 15th day of January, 1912, and the payments theretofore made were several hundred dollars less in their aggregate amount and in their monthly average than the requirements of the contract.

[1, 2] The court found that the repairs, which the defendants made upon the property after the fire and without cost to the plaintiff, were completed on the 7th day of March, 1912; that the deviation in times and amounts of payments as made by the plaintiff were made with and by the consent of the defendants; that the defendants had waived time as an essential condition for the payment of the amounts provided by the terms of the contract; and that such failure to pay the amounts required by the contract at the times specified therein was with the consent of the defendants. Appellants claim that the evidence is insufficient to support these findings, but we do not agree with this contention. The evidence shows that the defendants accepted payments on account while the plaintiff was in arrears with respect to payments due, and also that at the same time defendants knew that the plaintiff had not paid any interest on the mortgage. This was sufficient to constitute waiver. It created "such a temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture as could only be restored by giving a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce it." Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 285, 128 Pac. 751, 753.

Appellants claim further that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's finding that the date of completion of the repairs after the fire was the 7th day of March, 1912. They claim that the repairs were completed on the 15th day of February, 1912. However, we find in the record testimony tending to show that some of the repair work was still going on after the 7th day of March. Immediately after the fire occurred it was orally agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants that the defendants should proceed to make repairs of the premises, and pursuant to that agreement the plaintiff removed therefrom. At that time neither party claimed that the contract was not in force, and by mutual consent they proceeded upon the theory that the removal of plaintiff was temporary, and that defendants would proceed and complete the repairs on the understanding that the contract remained in force. The court made the following finding of fact, the truth of which is not challenged:

> "That on the 16th day of February, 1912, the defendants demanded of plaintiff that he meet and perform every condition specified in said contract by the 25th day of February, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon, or defendants would immediately have all of plaintiff's interest forfeited to defendants without further notice, that on the 15th day of February, 1912, defendants demanded of plaintiff that he perform all of the conditions of said contract required of him to such date, and offered in writing to give the plaintiff ten days' time within which to comply with such demand, which were served on plaintiff on February 16, 1912, at 4:30 p. m., and promised and agreed in writing that, if said plaintiff should within ten days perform all of the terms of said contract by him to be performed to such date, they would reinstate the plaintiff under said contract, and allow him to enter in and upon the possession of the said property, but that the said plaintiff failed, refused, and neglected to pay any further or other sum to the defendants under said contract, or on account thereof."

Evidently this notice was intended to put an end to the temporary suspension of the right of forfeiture by giving "a definite and specific notice of an intention to enforce" such right of forfeiture. Stevinson v. Joy, supra. This the vendors were entitled to do, and the vendee's failure to comply with the demand would place him in default, unless such failure was excused by the fact that, when the time limit fixed by the notice expired, the repairs by which the house was being restored to a condition fit for occupancy had not been completed.

[3-5] When there exists an executory contract for the sale and conveyance of real property, and improvements which constituted a material part of the consideration have been destroyed, the loss falls upon the vendor, and the vendee has a right to rescind the contract. Conlin v. Osborn, 161 Cal. 659, 120 Pac. 755. Let it be assumed that the damage by fire to the house on the land covered by the contract was of such consequence that the vendee might have established his right to rescind. In fact, he elected that the contract remain in force, and concurrently the vendors agreed to restore the premises, and proceeded to the performance of their agreement. That they were proceeding in good faith is not denied. This being so, the obligation of the vendee to pay the installments named in the contract remained an obligation in force. Certain installments were due. The right of the vendors, by reason of their nonpayment, to insist upon forfeiture of the plaintiff's rights, was in suspension because of their acts of waiver. But this right they could revive at any time by giving notice and demanding payment. Under such circumstances, however, they could not demand instant payment, but must allow a reasonable time. They allowed nine days—a time which expired before the repairs of damage caused by the fire had been completed. The court found that this was not a reasonable time. We are of the opinion that the court was justified in this finding or conclusion from the evidence. In view of the vendee's waiver of his right to rescind, which waiver was concurrent with the promise of the vendors to make the necessary repairs, it was not reasonable that the vendors should attempt to revive their right of forfeiture until first they completed those repairs. We conclude, therefore, that the contract remained in force until a time subsequent to the 25th day of February, and that the vendee never was in default.

[6] Early in March the defendants rented the premises to tenants selected by them, and thereafter sold the property to persons other than the plaintiff, all without plaintiff's knowledge or consent. Thereupon the plaintiff elected to treat these acts as an abandonment and repudiation by defendants of the contract of sale, and accepted the same as constituting a rescission. The fact that the defendants made such sale of the property was not alleged in the complaint. Assuming, however, that this fact had been alleged, or that evidence thereof was received without objection, and that the court was justified in finding as it did that after the 1st day of March, 1912, the defendants "sold said premises to persons other than plaintiff and without plaintiff's knowledge or consent," this fact alone did not constitute an attempt to rescind. The vendor may part with his title "subject to the rights of the vendees under the executory contract of sale, and thus not put it beyond his reasonable power to make title to his vendees under the executory contract of sale when in due time it may be demanded of him. * * * A pleading merely that during the life of such an executory contract of sale the vendor has parted with the title is not sufficient to put the vendor in default or to show an abandonment by him of the contract. It must further be pleaded that the vendor did this without reserving and protecting his vendee's rights under the executory contract." Brimmer v. Salisbury, 167 Cal. 522, 527, 140 Pac. 30, 32.

Applying the law, as thus declared, to the facts found in the present case, it appears that neither party was in default, and that the contract has not been abandoned or otherwise rescinded. Under such circumstances no cause of action exists entitling the vendee to recover the moneys which have been paid by him on account of said contract. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

The judgment is reversed.

CORMOND v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 2426.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 20, 1919. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 18, 1919.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚿502(4) — RECORD — NOTICE OF MOTION.

A copy of notice of intention to move for new trial incorporated in the transcript, but not made a part of the judgment roll or a part of the bill of exceptions, cannot be considered as a part of the record on appeal from order granting the motion.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚿714(6) — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SUBSTITUTE.

Neither a stipulation as to the correctness of the transcript nor the certificate of the trial clerk that the papers in the transcript are true copies of the originals can supply what the law requires should be made to appear in the bill of exceptions.

3. NEW TRIAL ⚿128(5)—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—SPECIFICATION.

Plaintiff's specification of particulars in which the evidence was claimed to be insufficient to support verdict for defendant that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict was an insufficient specification under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, before its amendment in 1915.

4. NEW TRIAL ⚿139—DEFECT IN NOTICE OF INTENTION—WAIVER.
